"When two great nations make peace, is it for the purpose of reciprocally exciting troubles, or to engage and pay for crimes? Is it for the purpose of giving money and protection to all men who wish to trouble the state? And as to the liberty of the press, is a country to be at liberty to speak of a nation, friendly, and newly reconciled, in a manner which they durst not speak of a government against whom they were prosecuting a deadly war?

"Is not one nation responsible to another nation for all the acts and all the conduct of its citizens? Do not acts of parliament even prohibit allied governments, or their ambassadors, to be insulted?

"It is said that Richelieu, under Louis XIII. assisted the revolution in England, and contributed to bring Charles the First to the scaffold. M. de Choiseul, and, after him, the ministers of Louis XVI. doubtless excited the insurrection in America. The late English ministry have had their revenge; they excited the massacres of September, and influenced their movements, by means of which Louis XVI. perished on the scaffold, and by means of which our principal manufacturing cities, such as Lyons, were destroyed.

"Is it still wished that this series of movements and influence, which has been productive of such calamitous consequences to both states, for so many ages, should be prolonged? Would it not be more reasonable, and more conformable to the results of experience, to make use of the reciprocal influence of proper commercial relations, as the means of protecting commerce, of preventing the fabrication of false money, and opposing a refuge to criminals?

"Besides, what result can the English government expect from fomenting the troubles of the church? from receiving and vomiting back upon our territory the brigands of the Cotes-du-Nord and Morbihan, covered with the blood of the best and richest proprietors of those unfortunate departments—from spreading by every means, instead of severely repressing, all the calumnies circulated by English writers, or by the French press at London? Do they not know that the French government is now more solidly established than the English government? And do they think that reciprocity will be difficult for the French government?

"What would be the effect of such an exchange of injuries, of the influence of insurrectional committees, of the protection and encouragement granted to assassins? What would be gained to civilization, to the commerce and the happiness of both nations?

"Either the English government authorises and tolerates those public and private crimes, in which case it cannot be said that such conduct is consistent with British generosity, civilization, and honor; or it cannot prevent them, in which case it does not deserve the name of a government; above all, if it does not possess the means of repressing assassination and calumny, and protecting social order!"

Events which led to a Renewal of the War with France.—Meeting of the Imperial Parliament.—Debates on his Majesty's Speech.—Sentiments of the War Party.—Delays attending the Surrender of Malta to France.—Complaints against the Liberty of the English Press.—An offensive Paper in the Moniteur.—Fatal Consequences of the same.—Lord Whitworth's Conversation with Bonaparte.—The Consular Address and its Effects.—Insolence of Bonaparte, &c. &c.

THAT the reader may form a just and complete view of the foreign policy of that memorable administration, in and over which Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury possessed the chief direction, it will be necessary, in this chapter, impartially to pursue those measures adopted by them and by the consular government which led to a renewal of hostilities.

The new imperial parliament met on the 16th of November, 1802. His majesty, in his opening speech, expressed himself in language, respecting foreign affairs, well calculated to keep alive the spirit of uncertainty and anxiety. "In my intercourse with foreign powers," said he, "I have been actuated by a sincere disposition for the maintenance of peace. It is nevertheless impossible for me to lose sight of that established and wise system of policy by which the interests of other states are connected with our own; and I cannot, therefore, be indifferent to any material change in their relative condition and strength. My conduct will be invariably regulated by a due consideration of the actual situation of Europe, and by a watchful solicitude for the permanent welfare of my people."

The address was moved in the house of lords by Lord Arden, and seconded by Lord Nelson, who declared his approbation of a plan of government, which promised to maintain the ancient dignity of the country, without hastily throwing away the blessings of peace. "War," added he, "had not exhausted our resources; our national industry had not been slackened, nor had it been frustrated of its rewards. The condition of the country's unexampled prosperity immediately after the war, was such as would render the English inexcusable, were they to sacrifice its honor. He had himself seen much of the miseries of war, BOOK VI. which had made an indelible impression on his heart; he was therefore, in his inmost soul, a man of peace; yet could he not consent for any peace, however fortunate, to sacrifice one jot of England's honor. Honor was the most valuable of her interests; it was that which always procured her the respect and regard of the nations on the continent. The nation had been satisfied with the sincere spirit of peace in which the British government had negotiated the treaty; and if a restless and unjust ambition in those with whom Britons desired a sincere amity, gave a new alarm, the country, doubtless, would rather press the government to assert its honor, than shrink from the supplies which a vigorous state of preparation would require."

During the debate upon the address, some very severe animadversions took place upon the general policy and conduct of the new ministers. Lord Grenville declared, "that the measures of vigilance and preparation now proposed, were necessary in consequence of a peace in which all concern for the interest of the rest of Europe, and all regard to the honor of this country, were abandoned. Subsequent to the period of signing the preliminaries, ministers had seen the first consul extort new concessions from Portugal, contrary to the spirit of his engagements with Great Britain. The King of Sardinia had kept his faith with this country inviolate; and yet he was suffered to be stripped of his dominions at a time, when, if the restitution of Piedmont had been insisted on, it would scarcely have been denied. Why did France hesitate to annex Piedmont to its departments till after the conclusion of the definitive treaty, but that she might not preclude herself from that restitution if resolutely demanded? The treaty of Amiens gave Piedmont to France, and with Piedmont the sovereignty of Italy. Martinico, Malta, the Cape; every thing was resigned; and did we now presume to remonstrate against the fortune of Parma, or of Switzerland? It was the want of energy, of plan, of foresight, that subjugated the genius of Britain before the first consul of France. It was as if ministers had conspired with the adversary to bind Great Britain hand and foot. The ruin they had prepared was upon us." His lordship concluded by expressing his opinion, that Great Britain might still be able to rouse the powers of Europe, if its councils were under the direction of a leader of courage and capacity; of the man (Mr. Pitt) to whom Europe looked up for the preservation of its dearest rights and liberties.

In the house of commons the address was moved by the Hon. Mr. French, member for Galway, and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Curzon, who remarked "that the acquisitions of France upon the continent, and her extended line of maritime frontier, directly opposite Britain's eastern coasts, required a much stronger defensive system than was ever before deemed necessary."

Mr. Fox wished to know whether France was for ever to be considered England's rival? Whether Englishmen were to be always, even when apparently at peace, in such a state of rivalry as bordered upon hostility? England appeared to him never to have a fairer chance of superiority than at the epoch of the present peace. As to the French navy, the most timid had ceased to dread it. The general objects of the French government were, it appeared to him, to revive commerce and improve its commercial and manufacturing system, by imitating the means which had raised Great Britain. Such rivalry should give no alarm. He acknowledged the power of France to be greater than he or any Englishman could wish it, but that was no ground for going to war; and he hoped the sense of the nation might be, to retain the advantages of the peace they had made.

Mr. Windham declared "Destruction was impending over Englishmen. Europe might be said to be in ruins. This country seemed to touch the moment of dissolution; and he thought, upon the present system of amity with France, her fall inevitable. What was become of Holland? of Genoa? of Switzerland? of Modena and Parma? all swallowed up in the inordinate encroachments of the first consul. Germany was no longer Germany; and England would soon be in the same melancholy situation. In times past, France was formidable with a population of twenty-four millions, but now her power was gigantic and tremendous. He was astonished at the indifference of the honorable gentleman, (meaning Mr. Fox,) who seemed to have lost his feelings when he spoke of the French revolution. For his own part, he must exclaim with MACBETH—

Can such things be,
And overcome us, like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder? You make me strange
Even to the disposition that I owe,
When now I think you can behold such sights,
And keep the natural ruby of your cheek,
When mine is blanch'd with fear.—

He cautioned ministers to weigh well the situation this country would be in when war comes, which he thought could not be far off; and he believed it was much safer to anticipate the blow than to defer it. That, however, must be left to the responsibility of ministers; but, in his opinion, they ought not to part with any measures or means which chance or circumstances may have left in their hands, even though keeping them should risk an immediate war. "We were," he said, "at present in so awful a crisis, that it brought into play all the strongest impulses that could actuate the heart of man. The country could not be saved without the co-operation of the majority of the nation; and he advised ministers to appeal to the high-minded and proud of heart, to those susceptible of an ardent love of their country: and he hoped that the heroic spirit for which England had been so long and so deservedly celebrated, would be found much more general than is now supposed. At all events, whether ministers succeeded or not in their efforts to save the nation, they would at least save their characters: they would not go down like the AUGUSTULI, but would show that they dared to adopt those vigorous measures which the danger they saw rising up on all sides, and threatening to overwhelm them, so loudly called for."

In this debate, ministers argued as strongly in favor of peace, as if they had made every effort for its preservation, instead of having exerted, in the recent instance of Switzerland, all the means which they possessed, futile and feeble as indeed they eventually proved, to renew the war on the continent. Lord Hawkesbury declared, "that he could not coincide with those who would have this country the knight-errand, or Drawcansir, in every case of contest on the continent." He maintained that the interference of France was to be expected in the affairs of Switzerland. He allowed that this interference had been attended with gross partiality; but nothing had occurred which could warrant a renewal of hostilities: and he assured the house, that no excitement in the first instance, or encouragement in the second, had ever been lent to the people of Switzerland from this country.

Mr. Addington professed himself proud to say, “ that at no period of our history had despondency so little to fear, or hope so much to expect. He could truly assert, that if he were to take a retrospect of his past life, and fix on that portion of it which could afford him most gratification, he should always consider the share he had in making the late peace as the most fortunate part of it. He acknowledged the political aggrandisement of France; but it must be something more than the arguments he had then heard, which would induce him to think that war would now tend to the reduction of her power.” The address was at length voted without a division.

It was reasonably to be expected, as perfectly consonant with the general tenor of their policy, that the Grenville party should appear the zealous opponents of the peace, and the severe accusers of the first consul. The concessions made on the part of England to France by the treaty of Amiens, were indeed such, that, if a mutual spirit of amity did not accompany the return of peace, it was impossible not to allow that they were far too great: and the most undeviating wisdom of conduct was requisite, on the part of ministers, to prove to the world, that the sacrifices they had consented to were not the result of intimidation and pusillanimity, but of moderation and equity. So problematic, however, had been the conduct of administration, in the whole of their transactions with France since the peace, imperfectly known as they were to the public at this period, that the most intelligent persons began to augur very disastrous consequences. As long, nevertheless, as ministers professed themselves, from whatever motives, adverse to the policy of involving the nation in a second war with the French republic, upon any grounds which had yet been stated, it was necessary to give them every practicable support.

At this time, the Grenville party received a great addition of force from a quarter where they had least right to expect it, viz. from divers individuals of the old or whig opposition, who had so meritoriously contended against the late system, and who had approved the treaty of peace as the best, or nearly the best, which circumstances would permit the new ministers to obtain from France; but who now, from a sudden aversion to the first consul, whom they publicly stigmatised and denounced as a tyrant and usurper, seemed no less eager than the avowed impugnors of the peace, to plunge the country into a new war. The most distinguished person of this, by no means small or insignificant party, was Mr. Sheridan, who, in direct contradiction to the arguments of Mr. Fox, took every occasion of uttering vehement invectives against the government of France, and the person and character of the first consul, not to be exceeded by the rage of those who were more emphatically, though not more justly, designated by the appellation of the war party. BOOK VI.

On the 8th of December, Mr. Yorke, secretary at war, proposing an enormous peace-establishment of 130,000 men, Mr. Sheridan supported the motion, in a speech which was not at all in unison with those formerly delivered by him in that house. “ I find,” said this gentleman, “ a disposition in some gentlemen to rebuke any man who shall freely declare his opinion respecting the first consul of France. I will abstain from offending them if I can—I say if I can, because I feel that even a simple narrative may be construed into invective. I perfectly agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Fox), that war ought to be avoided; though he does not agree with me on the means best calculated to produce that effect. From any opinion he may express, I never differ but with the greatest reluctance. For him, my affection, my esteem, and my attachment are unbounded, and they will end only with my life. He (Bonaparte) has discovered that we all belong to the western family. I confess I felt a sentiment of deep indignation when I heard that this scrap of nonsense was uttered to one of the most enlightened of the human race. To this family party I do not wish to belong. He might invite persons, if he pleased, to dinner; and, like Lord Peter, say, ‘ that this tough crust is excellent mutton.’ He might toss a sceptre to the King of Etruria to play with, and keep a rod to scourge him in the corner: but my humble apprehension is, that, though in the tablet and volume of his mind there might be some marginal note about cashiering the King of Etruria, yet the whole text was occupied with the destruction of this country. This was the first vision that broke upon him through the gleam of the morning; this was his last prayer at night, to whatever deity he addressed it, whether to Jupiter or to Mahomet, to the goddess of battles, or the goddess of reason. He said he was an instrument in the hands of Providence; I believe he was so; to make the English love their constitution better—to cling to it with more fondness, and to render them determined, with one hand and heart, to oppose to any aggression that might be made upon them a prompt, resolute, and determined resistance, be the consequences what they might. We ought to meet the hostility of France with a conviction of the truth of this assertion, that the country, which, like England, had achieved such greatness, could have no retreat in littleness; that if Englishmen could be content to abandon every thing, they should find no safety in poverty, no security in abject submission. The Bourbons were ambitious; but it was not so necessary for them to feed their subjects with the spoils and plunder of war; but I see, in the very situation and composition of the power of Bonaparte, a physical necessity for him to go on in this barter with his subjects, and to promise to make them masters of the world if they will consent to be his slaves. I certainly looked to the rejoicings at the peace as an unmanly and irrational exultation. Was the danger from France diminished by that event? Russia, if not directly in his power, was within the sphere of his influence; Prussia was at his beck; Italy was his vassal; Holland was in his grasp; Spain at his nod; Turkey in his toils; Portugal at his foot. I mark him taking positions calculated to destroy English commerce; I see him anxious to take possession of Louisiana, and to use the ports of St. Domingo to carry thither our West India and Jamaica trade. If the French republicans have experienced the mighty force of Britain, they, who have been everywhere else successful, cannot but view the only power the superiority of whose arms they have felt, with warm resentment and sentiments of mortified pride. Look at the map of Europe, and see nothing but France! It was in our power to measure her territory, to reckon her population, but it was scarcely within the grasp of any man's mind to measure the ambition of Bonaparte. Why, when all Europe bowed down before him; why, when he had subdued the whole continent, he should feel such great respect for England, I am at a loss to discover. If it be true that his ambition was of that immeasurable nature, there were abundant and obvious reasons why it must be progressive."

This speech was highly applauded by the majority of people, but condemned by some as a dangerous incentive to precipitate hostility.

The consular government, extremely displeased at the delays which had occurred relative to the restoration of Malta, adopted every possible measure to add facility to this favorite object. We have, in the preceding Book, (Chap. IX.) mentioned the conditions on which this surrender was agreed to by Great Britain. In the beginning of July Mr. Paget, resident at Vienna, having solicited M. de Champagny, the French ambassador, to concur in an invitation to the emperor for the imperial guarantee, it was most readily acceded to; although the ambassador acknowledged that he had received no specific orders respecting the guarantee in question; professing to act entirely from his own knowledge of the intentions of his government. In consequence of this step, the emperor's guarantee was without difficulty obtained, and formally signed on the 20th of August ensuing.

On the 3d of August Lord St. Helens wrote from St. Petersburg, that the French minister there was still without instructions authorising him to join the English ambassador in demanding the guarantee of the court of Russia; but they soon arrived, and in the following month a joint invitation was made by the French and English ministers to the Emperor of Russia for that purpose. But an immediate and unreserved compliance with this request could not be obtained. Difficulties and delays, such as might reasonably be expected, took place. In a conference held by the two ministers with the Russian chancellor Woronzof, on the 3d of November, General Hedouville entered into various arguments, to induce the Russian government to grant this guarantee; and on the 24th of the same month, Russia, by a formal declaration, signified her readiness to accede to the arrangements of the treaty of Amiens, including the obnoxious article establishing a Maltese langue, on condition that the rights of the King of the Sicilies, as sovereign of the island, should be recognised; but admitting that these rights should not cause a departure from its neutrality, as guaranteed by the present act. Two months subsequent to the date of this declaration, Lord Hawkesbury instructed the English minister at Petersburg, Sir John Borlase Warren, who had succeeded Lord St. Helens, to decline the imperial proposition, unless some additional stipulations were introduced, such as would amply satisfy the Maltese; for which purpose it would be necessary to consult the inhabitants themselves, who were equal to the defence of the island; adding, that the revenues belonging to the Spanish and Portuguese langues, which had been sequestered, must be restored previous to the surrender.

On the 31st of August the British resident at Berlin informed Lord Hawkesbury, that M. Bignon, the French minister, had received instructions from his government, conjointly with him, to invite the King of Prussia to accede to the guarantee of Malta. But this monarch was of opinion that he had nothing to do in this business; and after many weeks had passed, Count Haugwitz frankly told the English minister, "that Prussia took a very slight interest in the fate of this island, and that the king his master was countenanced in withholding his guarantee by the example of Spain."

About the time of General Andreossi's arrival in England, Sir Robert Wilson's "History of the Expedition to Egypt" was published, containing an elaborate exposure of the crimes of the first consul; and quotations from this work were given in the diurnal prints.

On the 27th of January, Lord Whitworth, the British ambassador at Paris, transmitted a dispatch to Lord Hawkesbury, containing the report of a conversation with M. Talleyrand, in the course of which the French minister pronounced, after his long silence on this head, a most bitter philippic against the English newspapers, declaring "that the first consul was extremely hurt to find that his endeavours to conciliate had hitherto produced no other effect than to increase the abuse with which the papers in England continually loaded him; the more so, as it came from a country of whose good opinion he was so very ambitious." Lord Whitworth endeavouring to palliate the offence, by alleging the little controul which the English government possessed over the productions of the English press, M. Talleyrand, in reply, enumerated the names and supposed connections of the papers published in London with great precision, and urged, "that his majesty's ministers might so far controul those at least which depended upon them, as to prevent their inserting that abuse which must be considered as having their sanction."

Lord Whitworth engaged to report the substance of M. Talleyrand's complaints to his own court, assuring him, however, "that nothing could be added to the explanations on this head already given."

M. Talleyrand, then, by the express order of the first consul, in the most serious manner required to know what were his majesty's intentions with regard to the evacuation of Malta. He said that another grand-master would now be very soon elected; that all the powers of Europe, invited so to do, with the exception of Russia, whose difficulties it was easy to remove, and without whom the guarantee would be equally complete, were ready to come forward, and that consequently the time would very soon arrive, when Great Britain could have no pretext for keeping longer possession. Lord Whitworth replied, "that he would report his conversation to the English secretary, Lord Hawkesbury."

Three days after this conference, a very singular paper appeared in the French official paper called the Moniteur, purporting to be a report made to the French government by a Colonel Sebastiani, who had been sent a few months before, when differences ran high between England and France, on a mission commercial, political, and military. Sebastiani embarked at Toulon on the 16th of September, 1802, for the East. What the precise motives of the first consul were for publishing this crude and ill-digested composition, equally puerile and pompous, cannot be ascertained. It is possible that he might have expected it to counteract, in some degree, the injurious impressions recently made by Sir Robert Wilson's book. It is possible that he might have hoped to intimidate the English ministers, and deter them from the thought of renewing the war, by the magnitude of his provisional projects and speculations. It is possible that it was the mere effect of spleen and passion, and intended to show the court of London the contemptuous opinion he entertained of the counsels by which it was governed.

calculated to give just offence to the English government; if indeed such a medley of inconsistency, vanity, and absurdity, merited any serious notice. The author of it stated, that he arrived at Alexandria on the 16th of October, and finding the English still in possession, he demanded of General Stuart, agreeably to his instructions, the speedy evacuation of that city. General Stuart, whom he described with oracular sagacity, on this transient acquaintance, as a man of mediocre talents, "told him that the place would be shortly evacuated, but that he had as yet received no orders from his court to quit Alexandria." He then made a visit to the Pacha of Alexandria, and the Capoutan Bey, "who expressed great partiality for the French, and did not conceal that they saw with grief the stay of the English in the country." On the 20th he set out for Cairo, receiving from the various places and persons visited by him in his route, protestations of attachment to the first consul. On the 26th he arrived at the metropolis, having been met at Boulah by an honorary escort of 300 cavalry and 200 infantry, sent by the Pacha of Cairo, who, in his subsequent conferences with M. Sebastiani, professed himself penetrated with gratitude for the first consul, engaging to his commercial agents the most friendly reception. In return for which, M. Sebastiani declared "the lively interest which the first consul took in the prosperity of Egypt," offering, by his express command, the mediation of the French government, in order to establish a peace with the beys. But this the pacha declined, saying, "that he had the most positive orders from Constantinople to make a war of extermination upon the beys."

In an assembly of the principal scheiks of Cairo, the conversation turned upon the interest which the first consul took in Egypt, on his power, his glory, and on his esteem for the learned scheiks. Their answers expressed an enthusiastic attachment to his person. The inhabitants of Cairo saluted the agent Sebastiani and his suite when passing along the streets. A trivial incident, however, served to prove the futility of these flattering representations. On the 29th, in returning to Fort Dupuy, Mustapha Oukel, one of the chiefs of the city, passing accidentally on horseback, reproached the guides who attended Sebastiani with marching before a Christian, and above all a FRENCHMAN! and menaced them with the bastinado after his departure. Having demanded redress of the pacha for this insult, he found that Mustapha was strongly favored and protected by him: and Sebastiani was compelled formally to declare, that if reparation was not made, he would leave the city, and transmit his complaint to Paris and Constantinople. Upon which, Mustapha, at the instance of the pacha, thought proper to ask his pardon. Also,

BOOK VI. to reinstate himself in the favor of the French agent, the pacha showed him a letter he had just received from General Stuart, who was no doubt apprehensive of the ill effect of Sebastiani's intrigues. "This letter inclosed an order of the first consul, dated August, 1799, and which recalled to the recollection of the Egyptians that Constantinople was once tributary to Arabia, and that the time was now come to restore Cairo to its supremacy, and to destroy the eastern empire of the Ottomans. General Stuart begged the pacha to consider the spirit of that order, and to judge from it of our attachment and of our peace with the Turks. I was indignant to find that a soldier of one of the most polite nations of Europe should degrade himself so far as to instigate assassination by means of such an insinuation."

From this preposterous charge of assassination, the agent Sebastiani made a sudden transition to the monks of Mount Sinai, from whom he received a deputation; and to those of the Propaganda at Cairo, who performed a solemn Te Deum for the prosperity of the first consul, at which M. Sebastiani assisted.

On the 3d of November he set out for Damietta, and had the good fortune to meet in his route with none but persons extremely attached to France. "In Egypt," said he, "chiefs, merchants, people, all liked to talk of the first consul; all offered prayers for his happiness. All the news which concerned him spread from Alexandria or Damietta to the pyramids with astonishing rapidity."

On the 14th, Sebastiani left Damietta, and arrived in five days at Acre. He immediately addressed a letter to D'jezzar Pacha, stating, "that peace being concluded between France and the Porte, the relations of commerce should be re-established on the footing they stood on before the war; and that he was charged by the first consul to confer with him on these subjects. I begged of him," said M. Sebastiani, "to answer me in writing, if he was inclined to treat with me. In some hours the messengers returned. D'jezzar had received them coldly. He expressed his desire to see me personally." Very soon after, the dragoman of the pacha came to conduct the French agent to the palace of D'jezzar: the apartment in which he gave audience had no other furniture than a carpet. He had on one side of him a pistol with four barrels, a small air-gun, a sabre, and a hatchet. "After inquiring," said M. Sebastiani, "as to my health, he asked me, whether I was not persuaded that our end is pre-ordained in heaven, and that nothing could change our destiny? I answered, that I believed, as he did, in predestination. He continued to speak for some time on that subject. He repeated several times, 'it is said that D'jezzar is barbarous: this is false; he is but just and severe.'

Soon after he said, 'I desire that the commissary you may send shall reside at Seide, as that is the most commercial port in my dominions. I highly esteem the French. In stature Bonaparte is small, but he is nevertheless the greatest of mankind. I know that he is greatly regretted at Cairo, where they wish to see him again. D'jezzar, perhaps, will soon finish his career; not that he is old, as his enemies report'—he then performed some of the manœuvres of the Mamelukes with surprising adroitness and agility—but because most likely God will have it so.' Our conversation was interrupted for some moments by a kind of military music, which he performed in a very agreeable style. The palace of D'jezzar is built with much taste and elegance: but at the foot of the staircase is situated a prison; I saw a number of the unfortunate inhabitants. This monster has imprinted the mark of his atrocious character upon every thing within the limits of his power. D'jezzar occupies all Palestine, with the exception of Jaffa, where Aboumarak Pacha has been besieged nearly five months by a force of 9000 men."

M. Sebastiani quitted Acre the 21st of November, and set sail for Zante, where he arrived the 4th of December. Having learnt that the isle and the republic were divided into different parties, he assembled the constituted authorities, and other principal persons, at the house of the governor. "After having represented to them," said he, "the interest which the first consul took in their welfare, I induced them to lay aside that spirit of party which distracted them, and to wait without passion and in silence the new constitution. These few words were received with enthusiasm, and all of them exclaimed, 'France for ever! Bonaparte for ever!' I do not stray from the truth in assuring you, that the islands of the Ionian sea will declare themselves French as soon as opportunity shall offer itself."

The rest of this famous report consisted merely of a statement of the English, Mameluke, and Turkish forces in Egypt, with those under the command of D'jezzar Pacha in Syria. He said, "that a great misunderstanding reigns between General Stuart and the Pacha of Cairo; that the Mamelukes are entirely masters of Upper Egypt; and that 6000 French would, at present, be enough to conquer the whole country."

This idle and impertinent report would deserve little attention, were it not for the very serious consequences of which it was almost immediately productive.

In the reply of Lord Hawkesbury, dated February 9th, to the last dispatch of Lord Whitworth, a new and very surprising scene was opened, threatening a renewal of the war in a more hideous and horrid form, and with an inconceivable increase of rage and animosity. The English secretary set out with advancing a political maxim, tending to the eventual abrogation of the late engagements: viz. "that every treaty or convention being negotiated with reference to the actual state of possession of the different parties, and of the treaties of public engagements by which they were bound at the time of its conclusion, if that state of possession and of engagements be so materially altered by the act of either of the parties, as to affect the nature of the compact itself, the other party has a right, according to the law of nations, to interfere, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction or compensation for any essential difference which such acts may have subsequently made in their relative situation."

Lord Hawkesbury declared, "that his majesty, desirous of consolidating the general peace of Europe, was willing to have waved the pretensions he might have had a right to advance of this nature; and, as the other articles of the definitive treaty had been in a course of execution on his part, so he would have been ready to have carried into effect the true intent and spirit of the tenth article, the execution of which, according to its terms, had been rendered impracticable by circumstances which it was not in his majesty's power to controul. A communication to your lordship would, accordingly," added the English secretary, "have been prepared, conformably to this disposition, if the attention of his majesty's government had not been attracted by the very extraordinary report of Colonel Sebastiani to the first consul. This report contains the most unjustifiable insinuations and charges against the officer who commanded his majesty's forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter: insinuations and charges wholly destitute of foundation, and such as would warrant his majesty in demanding that satisfaction which, on occasions of this nature, independent powers, in a state of amity, have a right to expect from each other. It discloses, moreover, views in the highest degree injurious to the interests of his majesty's dominions, and directly repugnant to, and utterly inconsistent with, the spirit and letter of the treaty of peace concluded between his majesty and the French government; and his majesty would feel that he was wanting in a proper regard to the honor of his crown, and to the interests of his dominions, if he could see with indifference such a system developed and avowed. His majesty cannot, therefore, regard the conduct of the French government, on various occasions, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, the insinuations and charges contained in the report of Col. Sebastiani, and the views which that report discloses, without feeling it necessary for him distinctly to declare, that it will be impossible for him to enter into any further discussion relative to Malta, unless he receives satisfactory explanation on the subject of this communication."

On the receipt of this fatal letter, Lord Whitworth demanded a conference with M. Talleyrand, in which, recapitulating the arguments of Lord Hawkesbury, he appealed to the French minister, whether the report of Colonel Sebastiani, exclusive of the personal allusions which it contained, was not of a nature to excite the utmost jealousy in the minds of his majesty's ministers, and to demand on their part every measure of precaution. The ambassador concluded "with the distinct declaration, that it was impossible for his majesty to enter into any further discussion relative to Malta, unless he received satisfactory explanations on the subject of the first consul's views."

M. Talleyrand, in answer, admitted, that the jealousy of England, in relation to Egypt, as connected with the British possessions in India, was natural: but he denied that any thing in the conduct of the French government justified the alarm expressed by the ambassador. He asserted, that Sebastiani's mission was strictly commercial, meaning, probably, that he was not vested with political powers; and he expatiated largely on the sincere desire of the first consul to maintain inviolate the peace which had been so lately concluded, adding, that the situation of the French finances was such, that were not this desire of peace in the first consul an effect of system, it would be most imperiously dictated to him by the total impossibility in which this country found itself, of carrying on that extensive state of warfare which even a partial rupture would naturally lead to. And, finally, he desired to know what was the nature and degree of satisfaction which his majesty would require? Lord Whitworth answered, in discreet and judicious terms, "that he could not pretend to say by what means the apprehensions raised in England were to be allayed; but that, in the discussion of them, the English should be animated solely by a sincere desire to be convinced of the truth of his assertions, since on that depended the peace and happiness of Europe;" adding, "that such was his majesty's sincere desire of maintaining peace, that nothing but absolute and unavoidable necessity would ever induce him to deprive his subjects of the blessings which they begin to enjoy."

On Friday, the 18th of February, the ambassador received a message from the first consul, requesting to see him at the Thuilleries that evening at nine o'clock. At this audience, M. Bonaparte informed the ambassador that he felt it necessary, in the most clear and authentic manner, to make known his sentiments to him, in order to their being communicated to his majesty. He said that it was a matter of infinite disappointment to him, that the treaty of Amiens, instead of being followed by conciliation and friendship, the natural effects of peace, had been productive only of continual and increasing jealousy and mistrust, and that this mistrust was avowed in such a manner as must bring the point to an issue. He then enumerated the various provocations he had received from England, placing at the head of them the non-evacuation of Malta, agreeably to the treaty of Amiens. "In this," he said, "that no consideration on earth should induce him to acquiesce; and, of the two, he had rather see the English in possession of Fauxbourg St. Antoine than Malta." He then adverted to the abuse thrown out against him in the English public papers; but this, he said, he did not so much regard as that which appeared in the French papers published in London. This he considered as much more mischievous, since it was meant to excite this country against him and his government. He complained of the protection given to Georges, and others of his description, who, instead of being sent to Canada, as had been repeatedly promised, were permitted to remain in England, handsomely pensioned, and constantly committing all sorts of crimes on the coasts of France and in the interior. "In confirmation of this, he said," wrote the ambassador, "that two men had, within these few days, been apprehended in Normandy, and were now on their way to Paris, who were hired assassins, and employed by the Bishop of Arras, by the Baron de Rolle, by Georges, and by Dutheil; as would be fully proved in a court of justice, and made known to the world." He acknowledged that the irritation he felt against England increased daily, because every wind which blew from England brought nothing but enmity and hatred against him. He then went back to Egypt, and observed, "that if he had felt the smallest inclination to take possession of it by force, he might have done it a month ago by sending 25,000 men to Aboukir, who would have possessed themselves of the whole country, in defiance of the 4000 British in Alexandria. That instead of that garrison being a means of protecting Egypt, it was only furnishing him with a pretence for invading it. This he should not do, whatever might be his desire to have it for a colony, because he did not consider it worth the risk of a war, in which he might perhaps be considered as the aggressor, and by which he should lose more than he could gain; since, sooner or later, Egypt would belong to France, either by the falling to pieces of the Turkish empire, or by some arrangement with the Porte."

As a proof of his desire to maintain peace, he wished to know what he had to gain by going to war with England. A descent was the only means of offence he had, and that he was determined to attempt, by putting himself at the head of the expedition. But how could it be supposed that, after having gained the height on which he stood, he would risk his life and reputation in such a hazardous attempt, unless forced to it by necessity, when the chances were that he and the greatest part of the expedition would go to the bottom of the sea? He talked much on this subject, but never affected to diminish the danger. He acknowledged that there were one hundred chances to one against him, but still he was determined to attempt it, if war should be the consequence of the present discussion; and such was the disposition of the troops, that army after army would be found for that enterprise. He then expatiated much on the natural force of the two countries. France, with an army of 480,000 men, (for to this amount it was, he said, to be immediately completed), all ready for the most desperate enterprises; and England with a fleet that made her mistress of the seas, and which he did not think he should be able to equal in less than ten years. Two such countries, by a proper understanding, might govern the world, but by their strifes might overturn it. He said, that if he had not felt the enmity of the British government on every occasion since the treaty of Amiens, there would have been nothing that he would not have done to prove his desire to conciliate—participation in indemnities, as well as influence on the continent; treaties of commerce; in short, any thing that could have given satisfaction, and have testified his friendship. Nothing, however, had been able to conquer the hatred of the British government, and therefore it was now come to the point, whether it should be peace or war. To preserve peace, the treaty of Amiens must be fulfilled; the abuse in the public prints, if not totally suppressed, at least kept within bounds, and confined to the English papers; and the protection so openly given to his bitterest enemies (alluding to Georges, and persons of that description) must be withdrawn. If war, it was necessary only to say so, and to refuse to fulfil the treaty."

Lord Whitworth appeared, in this extraordinary conversation, to have conducted himself with prudence and temper. "He dwelt strongly on the sensation which the publication of Sebastiani's report had created in England, where the views of France towards Egypt must always command the utmost vigilance and jealousy. The first consul, in reply, maintained, that what ought to prove his desire of peace was, on the one hand, the little he had to gain by renewing the war; and on the other, the facility with which he might have taken possession of Egypt, with the very ships and troops which were now going from the Mediterranean to St. Domingo, and that with the approbation of all Europe, and more particularly of the Turks, who had repeatedly invited him to join with them for the purpose of forcing the English to evacuate their territory."

"With regard to the mistrust and jealousy which had," as the first consul said, "constantly prevailed since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens," Lord Whitworth properly and seasonably observed, "that after a war of such long duration, so full of rancour, and carried on in a manner of which history has no example, it was but natural that a considerable degree of agitation should prevail; but this, like the swell after a storm, would gradually subside, if not kept up by the policy of either party; that he would not pretend to pronounce which had been the aggressor in the paper war of which he complained, and which was still kept up, though with this difference, that in England it was independent of government, and in France its very act and deed." To this the ambassador added, "that it must be admitted, that the English had such motives of mistrust against France as could not be alleged against them;" and he was going to instance the accession of territory and influence gained by France since the treaty, when the first consul interrupted him by saying, 'I suppose you mean Piedmont and Switzerland: ces sont des bagatelles;' and it must have been foreseen whilst the negotiation was pending; 'vous n'avez pas le droit d'en parler à cette heure.'

Much more conversation passed, of which the ambassador, in his official dispatch, made a very fair and faithful report. It is evident that the first consul conceived himself in some danger of being again attacked by England, as soon as a favorable opportunity offered; and, under this apprehension, he had directed his views to Egypt, as to a country which might once more become the scene of military operation. Anxious to avert the impending quarrel, he endeavoured to intimidate the English ministers (whom he seems to have regarded as men destitute of energy and capacity) by his wonted menaces of invasion.

Lord Whitworth, in the conclusion of his official letter, remarked, that the first consul did not, as M. Talleyrand had done, affect to attribute Colonel Sebastiani's mission to commercial motives only, but as one rendered necessary in a military point of view by the infraction on the part of the English of the treaty of Amiens. The specific powers with which Colonel Sebastiani was invested might be strictly commercial, but he had, without a doubt, a further commission of a general nature, which M. Talleyrand could not mean to deny; viz. to take a military and political survey of the country, and to report the state of it to his own government.

Previous to the transmission of this dispatch,

Lord Whitworth had another conference with M. Talleyrand, in which an intimation was given by the French minister, "that a project was in contemplation, by which the integrity of the Turkish empire would be so effectually secured as to do away every cause of doubt or uneasiness, either with regard to Egypt or any part of the Turkish dominions."

On the 22d of February the annual exposé, or view of the state of the French republic, was presented by order of the executive government to the legislative body. It declared, "that the inhabitants of France in the departments recently visited by the first consul, hail with blessings the restoration of peace, and that it is the duty of government to cherish these auspicious dispositions. On the continent every thing," said this official statement, "offers us pledges of repose and tranquillity. A French ambassador is at Constantinople, charged with renewing and fortifying the ties which attach us to a power apparently threatened with destruction, but which it is our interest to sustain, and to support the foundations by which it is upheld. The British forces are still in Alexandria and Malta. The government had a fair right of complaint, but it has received intelligence that the vessels which are to convey them to Europe are already in the Mediterranean."

"The government guarantees to the nation the peace of the continent, and it is permitted to entertain a hope of the continuance of maritime peace. This peace is the want as well as the desire of all nations. For its preservation the government will do every thing compatible with national honor, essentially connected with the strict execution of treaties. But in England two parties maintain a contest for power. One of those parties has concluded peace, and appears desirous of maintaining it. The other has taken an oath of eternal hatred to France—hence that fluctuation of opinion and of counsels which prevails; hence that attitude at the same time pacific and menacing. While this contest of party continues, measures of precaution are what the government is called upon to adopt. Five hundred thousand men ought to be, and shall be, ready, to undertake its defence and avenge its injuries. Strange necessity which miserable passions impose on two nations whom interest and inclination mutually prompt to the cultivation of peace!

"Whatever success intrigues may experience in London, no other people will be involved in new combinations: the government says, with conscious pride, that ENGLAND, single-handed, cannot maintain a conflict against FRANCE! But we have better hopes, and we believe that in the British cabinet nothing will be listened to but the counsels of wisdom and the voice of humanity.

"Yes, doubtless the peace will daily be more consolidated. The relation of the two governments will assume the character of good-will, which is suitable to their mutual interests. A happy repose will bury the recollection of the long calamities of a disastrous war, and France and England, rendering their happiness reciprocal, will deserve the gratitude of the whole world."

Great was the indignation of every class of society in the British empire on the publication of this consular address: it was the signal of universal ferment, which not the love of peace nor the inertness of a commercial people, nor the dread of fresh burthens, nor even the worst consequences that could be apprehended from unsuccessful warfare, could allay. The consul had in his conversation with Lord Whitworth, allowed Great Britain and France to be the two greatest nations in the world; but in this exposé he impudently asserted, that the former was not a match for the latter.

On the 28th of February, Lord Hawkesbury replied to Lord Whitworth's dispatches of the 21st. The English Secretary affirmed, "that the language used by the first consul tended to strengthen and confirm the suspicions which Colonel Sebastiani's report was calculated to excite." He complained, "that nothing approaching to explanation or satisfaction had been offered by the first consul, in answer to the representations of his majesty on this head." Towards the close of his letter, his lordship thus expressed himself: "when it is considered how greatly the dominion, power, and influence of France have of late been extended, his majesty must feel that he has an incontestible right, conformably to the principles on which the treaty of peace was negotiated and concluded, to demand additional securities in any new arrangement which it might be necessary to make, with a view of effecting the real objects of that treaty. And these considerations, sufficient as they might be in themselves to justify the line of conduct he had determined to adopt, have received additional force from the views which have been recently and unreservedly manifested by the French government respecting the Turkish dominions, and the islands in the Adriatic, and which have been in a great degree admitted by the first consul in his interview with your excellency."

Lord Whitworth, in a postscript to his dispatch, dated February 21, said, he saw M. Talleyrand, who assured him, "that a project was in contemplation, by which the integrity of the Turkish empire would be effectually secured." The English Secretary, in the abovementioned reply, observed, "that his majesty would consider the communication of such a project as indicating a disposition, on the part of the French government, to afford him explanation and satisfaction respecting some of the points which had been the subject of his representations. But after all that had passed, his majesty could not consent that his troops should evacuate the island of MALTA, until substantial security had been provided for those objects which, under the present circumstances, might be materially endangered by their removal."

Some uninteresting chicane on the part of the French minister took place at Paris on the 4th of March, when Lord Whitworth pressed for an explanation as to the nature of the projected arrangement for the security of the Turkish empire, to which no satisfactory answer was given. On the 10th, General Andreossi, the French ambassador to the court of London, in a note to Lord Hawkesbury, again pressed for the execution of the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens. He made the distinction of the positive and conditional clauses of that article, and insisted that the guarantee was not essential to the evacuation, which was to take place in three months, provided the Neapolitan troops were arrived in the island who were to compose its future garrison—that these troops being actually at Malta, no farther pretext for delay existed—and that Austria having acceded to become a guarantee, and Russia being equally accordant, with the exception of one point only, which might easily be modified, the immediate execution of the article must be looked for. The reply to this note by the English government, was, in substance, the same as the answer returned by Lord Whitworth to M. Talleyrand on that subject; also a reiteration of the demand for satisfaction in the affair of Sebastiani, and fresh security for the fulfilment of any new arrangement that should be made on the subject of Malta, between the two countries.

On the 8th of March, a message from his majesty was brought down to both houses of parliament, which was received all over Europe as the signal of the approach of war between Great Britain and France. This message was as follows:

"G. R.

"His majesty thinks it necessary to acquaint the house of commons, that as very considerable military preparations are carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, he has judged it expedient to adopt additional measures of precaution for the security of his dominions; though the preparations to which his majesty refers, are avowedly directed to colonial service, yet as discussions of great importance are now subsisting between his majesty and the French government, the result of which must at present be uncertain, his majesty is induced to make this communication to his faithful commons, in the full persuasion that whilst they partake of his majesty's earnest and unvarying solicitude for the continuance of peace, he may rely with perfect confidence on their public spirit and liberality, to enable his majesty to adopt such measures as circumstances may appear to require for supporting the honor of his crown, and the essential interests of his people."

Lord Whitworth, on receiving intelligence of the royal message from the English secretary of state, early on the morning of the 11th, repaired at two o'clock to M. Talleyrand, whom he found "already apprised of it, and preparing, in an agitation he could not disguise, to communicate the news to the first consul." He listened, nevertheless, attentively to the story told by Lord Whitworth, who, with great prudence "endeavored to make him sensible that this measure was merely precautionary, and not in the least intended as a menace"—that it was, in short, "merely a measure of self-security."

M. Talleyrand repeated anew his assurances, "that there was no foundation for alarm—that the first consul was pacific—that he had no thoughts whatever of attacking his majesty's dominions, unless forced by the commencement of hostilities on our part; but that a refusal to evacuate Malta would be regarded by him as such a commencement." At seven o'clock the same evening M. Talleyrand informed Lord Whitworth that he had seen the first consul; that although highly irritated at the unjust suspicions entertained by the English government, yet he would not allow himself to lose sight of the calamities which the present discussion might entail upon humanity—saying, that if England wished to discuss fairly, he wished the same—that if England prepared for war, he would do the same.

M. Talleyrand then produced a paper, not absolutely official, but a memorandum, which might facilitate the ambassador's communication of the first consul's sentiments. This paper was very ill-calculated to alter the disposition of the English government, as the object of it was evidently to intimidate, by implied threats, which could only tend to excite additional irritation. It stated,

"I. That if his Britannic majesty in his message meant to speak of the expedition of Helvoetsluys, all the world knew that it was destined for America, and that it was on the point of sailing for its destination, but in consequence of his majesty's message, the embarkation and putting to sea were about to be countermanded.

"II. That if satisfactory explanations were not received respecting the English armament, it was natural that the first consul should march 20,000 men into Holland, since Holland was mentioned in the message.

"III. That in this case it was, also, to be expected, that an encampment should be formed on the frontiers of Hanover, &c.

"IV. Likewise, that the first consul should order several camps to be formed at Calais, and on different points of the coast.

"V. That the first consul, who was on the point of evacuating Switzerland, should be under the necessity of continuing a French army in that country.

"VI. It was the natural consequence of all this, that the first consul should send a fresh force into Italy, in order to occupy, in case of necessity, the position of Tarentum.

"VII. England arming, and with so much publicity, would compel France to put her armies on the war establishment; a step so important as could not fail to agitate all Europe."

The exasperation and fury of Bonaparte, which had already manifested itself in the note, broke out into an ungovernable rage at his own court, on his public day (Sunday, March 13), and in the presence of the diplomatic body of Europe there assembled—thus violating every principle of hospitality, of decorum, of politeness, (the once distinguishing trait of the court of France!) and of the privileges of ambassadors, ever before held sacred. On the appearance of Lord Whitworth in the circle, he approached him with uncommon agitation and ferocity—proceeded to descant in the bitterest terms on the conduct of the English government—summoned the ministers of some of the foreign courts to be the witnesses of this vituperation, and concluded by expressions of the most angry and menacing hostility. The English ambassador did not think it advisable to make any answer to this ungentlemanly attack, and it terminated by the first consul retiring to his apartment, repeating his last phrases, till he had shut himself in, leaving nearly 200 spectators of this wanton display of arrogant impropriety in amazement and consternation.

The notice taken by the English ambassador of the strange impropriety which had occurred, was temperate and judicious. He embraced the first opportunity of stating to M. Talleyrand, "that he had been placed, by the first consul, in a situation which could neither suit his public nor his private feelings; that he went to the Thuilleries to pay his respects to the first consul, and to present his countrymen, but not to treat of political subjects; and that unless he had an assurance from him, that he should not be exposed to a repetition of the same disagreeable circumstances, he should be under the necessity of discontinuing his visits to the Thuilleries." M. Talleyrand assured the ambassador, "that it was very far from the first consul's intention to distress him; but he had felt himself personally insulted by the charges which were brought against him by the English government; and that it was incumbent upon him to take the first opportunity of exculpating himself in the presence of the mi-ministers of the different powers of Europe. He assured him that nothing similar would occur."

In consequence of the first consul's instructions to General Andreossi, in London, on the subject of the king's message, an elaborate official note was presented to the English minister on the 29th of March, the tone and language of which was of the most imperious and insulting nature. By command of the first consul, he positively denied "that Great Britain was menaced by preparations made in the ports of France and Holland. 'The first consul has made no preparation. How,' exclaimed the ambassador, "can his Britannic majesty's ministers have been deceived on facts so evident?—The first consul knows that a great nation can never be terrified. He believes that good policy and the feelings of true dignity ever inspire the sentiment of esteem for a rival nation, and never the design of menacing her. The second part of his majesty's message consists of another assertion no better founded: his Britannic majesty makes mention of discussions, the success of which is doubtful. What are these discussions?—Can a state of difficulties which leads to an alternative of PEACE or WAR spring up unawares, without commencement, without progression, and lead, without distinction, to an appeal to arms, before all the means of conciliation have been exhausted? The first consul places his glory, in an affair of this nature, wholly in being taken in an unprovided state. In Lord Hawkesbury's note an opinion is expressed, that the French republic has increased in power since the peace of Amiens. This is a decided error. Since that epoch France has evacuated a considerable territory. The French power has received no degree of augmentation. If his Britannic majesty is determined to make war, he may allege all the pretences he pleases; he will find few less founded."

The ambassador then recapitulated the causes of complaint, on the part of his government, against England: and, in order to put an end to the reciprocation of abuse, he made a proposal utterly incompatible with the genius of the English constitution, viz. "that means should be adopted to prevent, in future, any mention being made of what is passing in France, either in official discussions, or in polemical writings, in England; as in like manner in the French official discussions and polemical writings, no mention whatever should be made of what is passing in England." "Lord Hawkesbury," the ambassador proceeded to state, "mentions an article in a journal containing the report of a French colonel." An answer on this point, he declared to be neither long nor difficult. "A colonel in the English army has published a work in England, filled with the most atrocious and disgusting calumnies against the French army and its general. The LIES it contains have been contradicted by the reception which Colonel Sebastiani has experienced. The publicity of this report was at once a refutation and a reparation which the French army had a right to expect. Egypt has since been restored to the dominion of its lawful sovereign: there remains, therefore, but one object worthy of fixing the attention of the two nations—the execution of the treaty of Amiens, as far as concerns Malta. His majesty has engaged to restore it to the order, and to entrust it to the Neapolitan army till the order should be in a condition to guard it. His majesty will reject all sophistry, every distinction, every mental reservation, which might be offered to him, to put in doubt the force and the validity of his engagement. His Britannic majesty's equity, his conscience, in this respect, are guarantees for the French republic. Were it otherwise, what means in future would the two nations have for coming to an understanding? Would not all be chaos? This would indeed be adding another calamity to those which have menaced social order. The undersigned is directed to declare, in short, that the FIRST CONSUL will not take up the defiance given by ENGLAND to FRANCE; that as to Malta, he sees no subject of discussion, the treaty having provided for every thing, and settled every thing."

In Lord Hawkesbury's reply, the merit of moderation and forbearance was claimed, in abstaining from any detailed observations on the note of General Andreossi. The former complaint was urged anew, that the French government continued to withhold all satisfaction and explanation on the points on which his majesty had complained; and the general was informed, that "his majesty's ambassador at Paris was instructed to ascertain distinctly from the French government, whether they were determined to persevere in this course of proceeding, or whether they were disposed, without delay, to give such satisfaction and explanations as might lead to a final arrangement of differences."

Agreeably to this intimation, a letter was written nearly at the same time (April 4th) by the English secretary, to Lord Whitworth, declaring it to be essential that the subsisting discussions should be brought to an issue—if the French government, evading all discussion, should confine themselves to a categorical demand that Malta should be immediately evacuated; in that case it was his majesty's pleasure that the ambassador should declare the impossibility of the relations of amity continuing to subsist between the two countries, and the necessity he would be under of leaving Paris within a certain time. If, on the other hand, they showed a readiness to enter into discussion, and to give reasonable satisfaction and explanation, the ambassador was directed to present to them the project of an arrangement, which, under the present circumstances, would meet the ideas of his majesty's ministers, and, at the same time, entirely save the honor of the French government!"

The project in question consisted of four articles; the first and principal of which imported that the island of Malta should remain in perpetuity with the King of Great Britain. The second article demanded farther that Holland and Switzerland should be immediately evacuated by the French troops. By the third, his Britannic majesty was pleased to confirm the isle of Elba to France, and to acknowledge the King of Etruria. By the fourth, the Italian and Ligurian republics were also acknowledged by his majesty, provided an arrangement was made in Italy for the King of Sardinia, which should be satisfactory to that monarch.

It must be confessed, that the conduct of the English ministers was at this time extraordinary, as the latest advices from Lord Whitworth announced that the object of Bonaparte was to delay the event of a rupture, not being prepared to commence hostilities; and that on the subject of Malta he would not hear of any compromise. By proposing, therefore, fresh terms of treaty to France, it afforded to that power the delay which was so essential to its views, without the least probability of being successful on an essential point connected with the views of Great Britain. We may add to this, the impropriety of proposing another treaty, after the treaty of Amiens had been signed.

In pursuance of his instructions, Lord Whitworth transmitted to M. Talleyrand a note requiring a distinct answer to the demand of satisfaction stated by Lord Hawkesbury. In the conference to which this note gave occasion, M. Talleyrand said, "that in order to proceed regularly, it would be necessary that the French government should be informed precisely what were the objects which had created such uneasiness, and on which it was alleged all explanation had been refused." But Lord Whitworth declined compliance, alleging that such a specification "could be productive of no advantage:" for "that it would only serve to provoke such a recapitulation of the system and conduct which France had pursued since the treaty of Amiens, as would have all the appearance of a manifesto; that, if the French government exercised a right of extending its influence and territory, in violation of the spirit of the treaty of Amiens, Great Britain had an undoubted right, if she chose to avail herself of it, to seek a counterpoise."

As to the main point in question, M. Talleyrand repeated, that the first consul had nothing more at heart than to avoid the necessity of going to war; and that there was no sacrifice he would not make, short of his honor, to obtain this end.

"Is there," said M. Talleyrand, "no means of satisfying both parties? for, at the same time that the first consul insists, and will always insist, on the full execution of the treaty, he will not object to any mode by which you may acquire the security you think so necessary." He then submitted a paper to the ambassador, drawn up in his presence, as affording a proper basis of accommodation, earnestly requiring him to transmit it to England. It was precisely as follows: "The conversation with M. Talleyrand to-day has led us to this result. Every thing which may tend to violate the independence of the order of Malta, will never be consented to by the French government. Every thing which may tend to put an end to the present difficulties, or be agreeable to the English government, and which shall not be contrary to the treaty of Amiens, the French government have no objection to make a particular convention respecting it. The motives of this convention shall be inserted in the preamble, and shall relate to the respective grievances concerning which the two governments shall think it advisable to come to an understanding with each other."

Lord Hawkesbury, in his reply, April 13, directed Lord Whitworth, without delay, to communicate to the French government the project in question; observing, "that the exclusion of the article relative to Malta was become impracticable, from causes which it had not been in his majesty's power to controul. That the greatest part of the funds assigned to the support of the order, and indispensably necessary for the independence of the order, and the defence of the island, had been sequestered since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, in direct repugnance to the spirit and letter of that treaty; and that two of the principal powers who were invited to accede as guarantees to the arrangement, had refused their accession, except on the condition, that the part of the arrangement, which was deemed so material, relative to the Maltese inhabitants, should be entirely cancelled."

His lordship concluded his letter with some concessions, the last of which afforded a faint prospect of accommodation. "In the first place, his majesty would be willing, for the preservation of peace, that the civil government of the island should be given to the order, and the fortifications garrisoned for ever by British troops. 2dly, his majesty might, as an ultimatum, be disposed to consent to an arrangement, by which the island of Malta would remain in his possession for a limited number of years; and to wave, in consequence, his demand for a perpetual occupation; provided, that the number of years was not less than ten, and that his Sicilian majesty could be induced to cede the sovereignty of the island of Lampedosa for a valuable consideration. If the proposition is admitted, the island of Malta should be given up to the inhabitants at the end of that period; and it should be acknowledged as an independent state. In this case his majesty would be ready to concur in any arrangement for the establishment of the order of St. John in some other part of Europe."

On the receipt of this letter, Lord Whitworth exerted himself with fresh alacrity for the laudable purpose of effecting an accommodation; and Joseph Bonaparte was now nominated to conduct the negotiation on the part of the first consul.

After exhausting his arguments, in a conference of two hours with this minister, in support of the two first projects, without gaining the least ground, the ambassador was at length told by the French negotiator, of his own accord, "that he was not without hope that he might be authorized to propose to him the occupation of the fortresses for a term of years." On which Lord Whitworth, who was solicitous that this proposal should not originate with himself, told the French negotiator, "that he wished too sincerely to avoid the fatal extremities to which he saw the discussion was tending, not to give any reasonable proposal, which might be made on their part, every assistance in his power."

On the evening of the 18th, Joseph Bonaparte assured Lord Whitworth, "that a meeting would speedily be appointed, in order to settle the term of years for which the first consul might be induced to consent to the cession of Malta." But he declared, "that, in order to gain his consent to the cession, it would be necessary to hold out the advantages which the British government was willing to offer in return," meaning the acknowledgment of the new government in Italy. The ambassador told him, "that this offer was made only with a view to the possession of Malta in perpetuity;" but, after some conversation, he gave the French minister to understand, "that he would not refuse to admit the demand sub sperati, on the condition that the cession should be made for a considerable term of years; that Holland and Switzerland should be evacuated, and that a suitable provision should be made for the King of Sardinia."

This proposal, it seems, gave great offence to the first consul; for the ambassador informed Lord Hawkesbury, in his dispatch, dated April 20, "that he was sorry to say that no summons had been received by him, or any further notice taken of the business. He therefore desired, that he might be furnished with an ultimatum; and that, at the expiration of the period allowed for deliberation, he might be authorized to leave Paris."

Lord Hawkesbury, in reply, April 23, intimated that there was no occasion for this reference, and that it was his majesty's pleasure the ambassador should communicate officially to the French government, "that he had gone in point of concession to the full extent of his instructions; and that if an arrangement, founded upon one of the propositions already transmitted, could not be concluded without further delay, he had received his majesty's commands to return to England;" and in no case was he to remain at Paris more than seven days.

Lord Whitworth, in order to obtain the decisive answer of the French government, had called (April 21) on M. Talleyrand, who now, in very explicit language, told him that "no consideration on earth would induce the first consul to consent to the cession in perpetuity of Malta in any shape whatever." The English ambassador then stated his majesty's willingness to waive his pretensions to a possession in perpetuity, and his consent to hold Malta for a certain number of years to be agreed upon, on condition that the French government should not oppose any negotiation his majesty might set on foot with his Sicilian majesty for the acquisition of the island of Lampedosa. Lord Whitworth, in the conversation which ensued, "begged M. Talleyrand particularly to recollect that England was in actual possession of the object, and that therefore every modification tending to limit that possession was in fact a concession on the part of his majesty."

This argument was little calculated to mollify the untoward disposition of the first consul. Accordingly, on the next day, M. Talleyrand, having seen the first consul, again declared "that he would on no terms hear either of a perpetual or a temporary possession of Malta: that his object was the execution of the treaty of Amiens; and that rather than submit to such an arrangement as that last proposed, he would even consent to his majesty's keeping the object in dispute for ever, on the ground that in the one there was an appearance of generosity and magnanimity, but in the other nothing but weakness and the effect of coercion; that therefore his resolution was taken, and what he had to propose was the possession the English required of the island of Lampedosa, or of any other of the small isles of which there were three or four between Malta and the coast of Africa; that such a possession would be sufficient for the object Britain had in view, which was a station in the Mediterranean, as a place of refuge and security for any squadron she might find it convenient to keep in that sea."

A third conversation took place on Saturday, the 23d of April, but with no material variation; the French minister offering Lampedosa, and Lord Whitworth peremptorily requiring the cession of Malta. On the arrival of Lord Hawkesbury's dispatch, dated the 23d of April, on the 26th, the ambassador communicated without delay the ultimatum of the English court verbally to M. Talleyrand, who desired the ambassador to state the demands of his government in writing; but this, Lord Whitworth replied, "that he was not authorized to do, and that he would not take the responsibility upon himself." The French minister urged, "that verbal and fugitive conversations were insufficient for the discussion of such immense interests, in which no expression could be indifferent." He at length, however, consented to receive the verbal notification of Lord Whitworth, who desired M. Talleyrand to recollect, that Tuesday, May 3, must be the day of his departure.

On the morning of the 29th of April the ambassador was given to understand, that he would receive, in the course of the day, a letter from M. Talleyrand, of such a nature as might be sufficient to induce him to delay for a short time his resolution of departure. The letter not arriving, the ambassador repaired in person at four in the afternoon to M. Talleyrand, to learn whether he had any thing favorable to communicate; and if not, to request passports for himself and family.

M. Talleyrand appeared embarrassed, and said, "he could not suppose that Lord Whitworth would really go away. At all events the first consul never would recal his ambassador." Lord Whitworth replied, "that he was recalled on the principle, that even actual war was preferable to the state of suspense in which England, and indeed all Europe, had been kept for so long a space of time." The French minister, at parting, repeatedly said to the ambassador, "J'ai encore de l'espoir."

Saturday and Sunday passed over, and no letter arrived. On Monday the ambassador went once more to the house of M. Talleyrand, and delivered to that minister a letter, containing a formal and positive demand of passports for the next day. "At this he appeared somewhat startled, and lamented that so much time had been lost, but said that enough remained if the ambassador was authorised to negotiate upon other terms." Lord Whitworth assured him, "that he had no other terms to propose."

On the same evening a specific answer from the French government was given to all the articles of the final propositions of the English court. With respect to Lampedosa, the first consul alleged that, as it did not belong to France, he could neither accede to nor refuse the desire of the acquisition of that island by his Britannic majesty. That as the demand made respecting Malta by the court of England would materially alter a formal disposition of the treaty of Amiens, it should be previously communicated to the King of Spain and the Batavian republic, who were contracting parties to that treaty; and that, by a parity of reasoning, all the contracting parties were bound to submit it to the Emperors of Germany and Russia and the King of Prussia, as the guaranteeing powers to the 10th article of the peace. That this concert the first consul was willing to admit, but certainly would not propose, as it was not from him the objections to the execution of the article in question originated.—Finally, that as soon as the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens were executed in every quarter of the globe, Holland should be evacuated by the French troops.

The English ambassador found himself under the necessity of replying (Tuesday, May 3) to the last communication, that it being the object of the king "to relieve as soon as possible the two countries the most interested, and Europe in general, from the state of suspense in which they were placed, it was with great regret he perceived nothing in the note of M. Talleyrand which could correspond with this intention, and consequently nothing that could justify him in delaying to obey the orders of his court."

On the same day, which was that fixed for the departure of the ambassador, another note came from M. Talleyrand, acquainting Lord Whitworth that he had a communication to make to him of the greatest importance. He would therefore postpone sending him the passports, and requested him to call the next day at half-past four at the foreign department. The proposition then made was of such a nature, as most decisively to evince the extreme solicitude of France to avoid a war with Great Britain on account of Malta, if but a salvo was left for her honor. The note delivered on this occasion contained the following expressions: "After the last communication addressed to his excellency the ambassador, it was more difficult than ever to conceive how a great, powerful, and enlightened nation could be willing to take upon itself to declare a war which would be accompanied by such heavy calamities, and the cause of which would be so insignificant, the object in question being a miserable rock. The first consul, accustomed for two months to make every species of sacrifice for the maintenance of peace, was ready to consent that the island of Malta should be placed in the hands of one of the three powers who had guaranteed its independency, either Austria, Russia, or Prussia, with a proviso, that as soon as France and England should have come to an agreement upon this article, they should unite in their requisitions to engage other powers either contracting or acceding to the treaty of Amiens to consent to it."

On Monday, May 3, the final dispatch of the English secretary, dated May 7, was received at Paris. In it he declared to Lord Whitworth, "that the propositions which had been made on the part of the first consul, were, in every respect, so loose, indefinite, and unsatisfactory, and fell so short of the just pretensions of his majesty, that it was impossible the French government could have expected them to have been accepted. If his majesty could be disposed to wave his demand for a temporary occupation of the island of Malta, the Emperor of Russia would be the only sovereign to whom, in the present state of Europe, he could consent that the island should be assigned; and his majesty had certain and authentic information, that the Emperor of Russia would on no account consent to garrison Malta. Under these circumstances his majesty persevered in his determination to adhere to the substance of his third project as his ultimatum." A modification was, however, admitted, viz. that the term of years for which England should be allowed to retain possession of Malta might be inserted in a secret article; and if this was not acceded to, the ambassador was peremptorily ordered to leave Paris in thirty-six hours.

On the receipt of this dispatch, Lord Whitworth wrote to M. Talleyrand to request an interview. No answer arriving, the ambassador the next day (May 10) transmitted officially to the French minister the ultimatum of Lord Hawkesbury, accompanied by a judicious note of his own, stating the orders which he had just received—"The minister for foreign affairs," he said, "would not fail to observe to what degree his majesty had endeavoured to conciliate the security of his interests with the dignity of the first consul. The undersigned flattered himself that the first consul, doing justice to these sentiments, would adopt, in concert with his majesty, an expedient so suitable for restoring permanent tranquillity to both nations, and to all Europe."

The project referred to was literally as follows:

I. The French government shall engage to make no opposition to the cession of the island of Lampedosa to his majesty by the King of the Two Sicilies.

II. In consequence of the present state of the island of Lampedosa, his majesty shall remain in possession of the island of Malta until such arrangements shall be made by him as may enable his majesty to occupy Lampedosa as a naval station, after which period the island of Malta shall be given up to the inhabitants, and acknowledged as an independent state.

III. The territories of the Batavian republic shall be evacuated by the French forces within one month after the conclusion of a convention founded on the principles of this project.

IV. The King of Etruria, and the Italian and Ligurian republics, shall be acknowledged by his majesty.

V. Switzerland shall be evacuated by the French forces.

VI. A suitable territorial provision shall be assigned to the King of Sardinia in Italy.

No answer, after an anxious and fruitless expectation of several hours, being transmitted to the ambassador, he repaired in person about four in the afternoon to the house of M. Talleyrand, and was informed that the minister was in the country; and in a short time the packet, inclosing the ultimatum, left at the foreign office, was returned to the ambassador with the same excuse. Mr. Talbot, secretary to the embassy, then took it himself to M. Talleyrand's country residence at Meudon: but was told that the minister was at St. Cloud, and would not be back till late. At length, about one in the morning, a note came from M. Talleyrand, with an apology, stating, that he had been the whole day with the first consul, and requesting to see the ambassador at noon the following day. At this meeting (May 11) much conversation passed, and the discussion appeared to have been calm and temperate. At length M. Talleyrand asked the ambassador if he felt himself authorized by his instructions to conclude a convention founded on the basis of his project, viz. the perpetual possession of Malta to England in return for a consideration. Lord Whitworth told him, "that he was not authorized to enter into any engagement which would make the negotiation one of exchange, instead of satisfaction and security."

The French minister urged a counter-project, and, after much contest, it was agreed that the proposal should be submitted to Lord Whitworth in the course of a few hours, and that he should then determine whether to sign it, to transmit it to England, or to leave Paris.

The remainder of the day passed, nevertheless, without receiving any communication from M. Talleyrand: on the morning, therefore, of May the 12th, the ambassador renewed his demand of passports; but they were again delayed, nor were they sent till after three successive messages on Lord Whitworth's part.

What chiefly gave umbrage to the British court was the extraordinary and unprecedented conduct of the French minister at Hamburgh, who being refused by the senate permission to insert a most gross and scandalous libel upon the government of the King of Great Britain, claimed of it, in his official capacity, the privilege of so doing; with which, under this species of compulsion, the senate of Hamburgh thought it prudent to comply. The publication in question affected to take a review of the conduct of England and France since the peace; in which the bad faith, ambition, and violence of the former was contrasted on every occasion with the opposite qualities of the latter. It also entered into an elaborate vindication of the French government during the period of negotiation; dwelt with the bitterest rancour on the aggressive measure of the message to parliament from the King of Great Britain; and concluded by detailing, in terms of satisfaction and complacency, the particulars of the outrage committed at the Thuilleries by Bonaparte, in his paroxysm of fury, directed through the medium of Lord Whitworth against the English government. This artful manifesto, calculated to depreciate Great Britain in the eyes of all Europe, excited just displeasure; but the first consul, in reply to the notification of that displeasure, thought proper to disclaim the conduct of the French minister, and promise every satisfaction that the nature of the case would afford.

From this impartial review of circumstances it will be seen that hostilities were unavoidable; and, after a peace of barely one year and sixteen days, Europe again saw her quiet disturbed, and her tranquillity threatened by the renewal of a contest between her greatest continental, and her greatest maritime powers.

CHAPTER II.

His Majesty's Declaration of War.—Copies of the Correspondence between Great Britain and France laid before Parliament.—Important Debates on the Negotiation and Correspondence.—Resolutions for the Censure of Ministers negatived.—Observations.

On the night of the 19th of May, Lord Whitworth arrived in London, and on the day preceding, the following declaration of war against France was issued by the King of Great Britain:

"His majesty's earnest endeavours for the preservation of peace having failed of success, he entertains the fullest confidence that he shall receive the same support from his parliament, and that the same zeal and spirit will be manifested by his people, which he has experienced on every occasion when the honor of his crown has been attacked, or the essential interests of his dominions have been endangered.

"During the whole course of the negotiations which led to the preliminary and definitive treaties of peace between his majesty and the French republic, it was his majesty's sincere desire, not only to put an end to the hostilities which subsisted between the two countries, but to adopt such measures, and to concur in such propositions, as might effectually contribute to consolidate the general tranquillity of Europe. The same motives by which his majesty was actuated during the negotiations for peace, have since invariably governed his conduct. As soon as the treaty of Amiens was concluded, his majesty's courts were open to the people of France for every purpose of legal redress; all sequestrations were taken off their property; all prohibitions on their trade, which had been imposed during the war, were removed, and they were placed, in every respect, on the same footing with regard to commerce and intercourse, as the inhabitants of any other state in amity with his majesty, with which there existed no treaty of commerce.

"To a system of conduct thus open, liberal, and friendly, the proceedings of the French government affords the most striking contrast.

The prohibitions which had been placed on the commerce of his majesty's subjects during the war, have been enforced with increased strictness and severity; violence has been offered in several instances to their vessels and their property; and, in no case has justice been afforded to those who may have been aggrieved in consequence of such acts, nor has any satisfactory answer been given to the repeated representations made by his majesty's ministers or ambassador at Paris. Under such circumstances, when his majesty's subjects were not suffered to enjoy the common advantages of peace within the territories of the French republic, and the countries dependant upon it, the French government had recourse to the extraordinary measure of sending over to this country a number of persons, for the professed purpose of residing in the most considerable sea-port towns of Great Britain and Ireland, in the character of commercial agents or consuls. These persons could have no pretensions to be acknowledged in that character, as the right of being so acknowledged, as well as all the privileges attached to such a situation, could only be derived from a commercial treaty; and as no treaty of that description was in existence between his majesty and the French republic.

"There was consequently too much reason to suppose, that the real object of their mission was by no means of a commercial nature; and this suspicion was confirmed, not only by the circumstance that some of them were military men, but by the actual discovery, that several of them were furnished with instructions to obtain the soundings of the harbours, and to procure military surveys of the places where it was intended they should reside. His majesty felt it to be his duty to prevent their departure to their respective places of destination, and represented to the French government the necessity of withdrawing them; and it cannot be denied, that the circumstances under which they were sent, and the instructions which were given to them, ought to be considered as decisive indications of the dispositions and intentions of the government by whom they were employed.

"The conduct of the French government, with respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, must, therefore, be considered as ill-suited to a state of peace, and their proceedings in their more general political relations, as well as in those which immediately concern his majesty's dominions, appears to have been altogether inconsistent with every principle of good faith, moderation, and justice. His majesty had entertained hopes, in consequence of the repeated assurances and professions of the French government, that they might have been induced to adopt a system of policy, which, if it had not inspired other powers with confidence, might, at least, have allayed their jealousies. If the French government had really appeared to be actuated by a due attention to such a system; if their dispositions had proved to be essentially pacific, allowances would have been made for the situation in which a new government must be placed after so dreadful and extensive a convulsion as that which has been produced by the French revolution. But his majesty has, unfortunately, had too much reason to observe and to lament that the system of violence, aggression, and aggrandizement which characterised the proceedings of the different governments of France during the war, has been continued with as little disguise since its termination. They have continued to keep a French army in Holland against the will, and in defiance of the remonstrances, of the Batavian government, and in repugnance of the letter of three solemn treaties. They have, in a period of peace, invaded the territory, and violated the independence of the Swiss nation, in defiance of the treaty of Lunéville, which had stipulated the independence of their territory, and the right of the inhabitants to choose their own form of government. They have annexed to the dominions of France, Piedmont, Parma, and Placentia, and the island of Elba, without allotting any provision to the King of Sardinia, whom they have despoiled of the most valuable part of his territory, though they were bound, by a solemn engagement to the Emperor of Russia, to attend to his interests, and to provide for his establishment. It may, indeed, with truth, be asserted, that the period which has elapsed since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, has been marked with one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult on the part of the French government.

"In the month of October last, his majesty was induced, in consequence of the earnest solicitation of the Swiss nation, to make an effort, by a representation of the French government, to avert the evils which were then impending over that country. This representation was couched in the most temperate terms; and measures were taken by his majesty for ascertaining, under the circumstances which then existed, the real situation and wishes of the Swiss cantons, as well as the sentiments of the other cabinets of Europe. His majesty learned, however, with the utmost regret, that no disposition to counteract these repeated infractions of treaties and acts of violence was manifested by any of the powers most immediately interested in preventing them; and his majesty, therefore, felt that, with respect to these objects, his single efforts could not be expected to produce any considerable advantage to those in whose favor they might be exerted.

It was about this time that the French government first distinctly advanced the principle, that his majesty had no right to complain of the conduct, or interfere with the proceedings of France, on any point which did not form a part of the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens. That treaty was unquestionably founded upon the same principle as every other antecedent treaty or convention, on the assumption of the state of possession and of engagements subsisting at the time of its conclusion; and if that state of possession and of engagements is materially affected by the voluntary act of any of the parties, so as to prejudice the condition on which the other party has entered into the contract, the change so made may be considered as operating virtually as a breach of the treaty itself, and as giving the party aggrieved a right to demand satisfaction or compensation for any substantial difference which such acts may have effected in their relative situations; but, whatever may be the principle on which the treaty is to be considered as founded, there is indisputably a general law of nations, which, though liable to be limited, explained, or restrained by conventional law, is antecedent to it, and is that law or rule of conduct to which all sovereigns and states have been accustomed to appeal, where conventional law is admitted to have been silent. The treaty of Amiens, and every other treaty, in providing for the objects to which it is particularly directed, does not, therefore, assume or imply an indifference to all other objects which are not specified in its stipulation, much less does it adjudge them to be of a nature to be left to the will and caprice of the violent and the powerful. The justice of the cause is alone a sufficient ground to warrant the interposition of any of the powers of Europe in the differences which may arise between other states, and the application and extent of that just interposition is to be determined solely by considerations of prudence. These principles can admit of no dispute; but if the new and extraordinary pretensions advanced by the French government, to exclude his majesty from any right to interfere with respect to the concerns of other powers, unless they made a specific part of the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens, was that which it was possible to maintain, those powers would have a right, at least, to claim the benefit of this principle, in every case of difference between the two countries. The indignation of all Europe must surely then be excited by the declarations of the French government, that, in the event of hostilities, these very powers, who were no parties to the treaty of Amiens, and who were not allowed to derive any advantage from the remonstrances of his majesty in their behalf, are nevertheless to be made the victims of a war, which is alleged to arise out of the same treaty, and are to be sacrificed in a contest, which they not only have not occasioned, but which they have had no means whatever of preventing.

“His majesty judged it most expedient, under the circumstances which then affected Europe, to abstain from a recurrence to hostilities, on account of the views of ambition, and acts of aggression, manifested by France on the continent; yet an experience of the character and dispositions of the French government could not fail to impress his majesty with a sense of the necessity of increased vigilance in guarding the rights and dignity of his crown, and in protecting the interests of his people.

“Whilst his majesty was actuated by these sentiments, he was called upon by the French government to evacuate the island of Malta. His majesty had manifested, from the moment of the signature of the definitive treaty, an anxious disposition to carry into full effect the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens relative to that island. As soon as he was informed that the election of a grand master had taken place, under the auspices of the Emperor of Russia, and that it had been agreed by the different priories assembled at St. Petersburg, to acknowledge the person whom the court of Rome should select out of those who had been named by them to be grand master of the order of St. John, his majesty proposed to the French government, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise in the execution of the arrangement, to acknowledge that election to be valid; and when, in the month of August, the French government applied to his majesty to permit the Neapolitan troops to be sent to the island of Malta, as a preliminary measure for preventing any unnecessary delay, his majesty consented, without hesitation, to this proposal, and gave directions for the admission of the Neapolitan troops into the island. His majesty had thus shewn his disposition not only to throw no obstacle in the way of the execution of the treaty, but, on the contrary, to facilitate the execution of it by every means in his power. His majesty cannot, however, admit, that, at any period since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, the French government have had a right to call upon him, in conformity to the stipulations of that treaty, to withdraw his forces from the island of Malta. At the time when this demand was made by the French government, several of the most important stipulations of the arrangement respecting Malta remained unexecuted: the election of a grand master had not been carried into effect. The tenth article had stipulated, that the independence of the island should be placed under the guarantee and protection of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. The Emperor of Germany had acceded to the guarantee, but only on condition of a like accession on the part of the other powers specified in the article. The Emperor of Russia had refused his accession, except on the condition that the Maltese langue should be abrogated; and the King of Prussia had given no answer whatever to the application which had been made to him to accede to the arrangement. But the fundamental principle, upon the existence of which depended the execution of the other parts of the article, had been defeated by the changes which had taken place in the constitution of the order since the conclusion of the treaty of peace. It was to the order of St. John of Jerusalem that his majesty was, by the first stipulation of the tenth article, bound to restore the island of Malta. The order is defined to consist of those langues which were in existence at the time of the conclusion of the treaty; the three French langues having been abolished, and a Maltese langue added to the institution. The order consisted, therefore, at that time, of the following langues, viz. the langues of Arragon, Castile, Germany, Bavaria, and Russia.—Since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, the langues of Arragon and Castile have been separated from the order by Spain, a part of the Italian langue has been abolished by the annexation of Piedmont and Parma to France. There is strong reason to believe, that it has been in contemplation to sequester the property of the Bavarian langue, and the intention has been avowed of keeping the Russian langues within the dominions of the emperor.

“Under these circumstances, the order of St. John cannot now be considered as that body to which, according to the stipulation of the treaty, the island was to be restored; and the funds indispensably necessary for its support, and for the maintenance of the independence of the island, have been nearly, if not wholly, sequestered. Even if this had arisen from circumstances which it was not in the power of any of the contracting parties to the treaty to control, his majesty would nevertheless have had a right to defer the evacuation of the island by his forces, until such time as an equivalent arrangement had been concluded for the preservation of the independence of the order and of the island. But if these changes have taken place in consequence of any acts of the other parties to the treaty; if the French government shall appear to have proceeded upon a system of rendering the order whose independence they had stipulated, incapable of maintaining that independence, his majesty's right to continue in the occupation of the island, under such circumstances, will hardly be contested. It is indisputable, that the revenues of the two Spanish languages have been withdrawn from the order by his catholic majesty; a part of the Italian language has, in fact, been abolished by France, through the unjust annexation of Piedmont and Parma, and Placentia, to the French territory. The Elector of Bavaria has been instigated by the French government to sequester the property of the order within his territories; and it is certain that they have not only sanctioned, but encouraged the idea of the propriety of separating the Russian languages from the remainder of the order.

"As the conduct of the governments of France and Spain have, therefore, in some instances directly, and in others indirectly, contributed to the changes which have taken place in the order, and thus destroyed its means of supporting its independence, it is to those governments, and not to his majesty, that the non-execution of the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens must be ascribed.

"Such would be the just conclusion, if the 10th article of that treaty were considered as an arrangement by itself. It must be observed, however, that this article forms a part only of a treaty of peace, the whole of which is connected together, and the stipulations of which must, upon a principle common to all treaties, be construed as having a reference to each other.

"His majesty was induced, by the treaty of peace, to consent to abandon, and to restore to the order of St. John, the island of Malta, on condition of its independence and neutrality. But a further condition, which must necessarily be supposed to have had considerable influence with his majesty, in inducing him to make so important a concession, was the acquiescence of the French government in an arrangement for the security of the Levant, by the eighth and ninth articles in the treaty, stipulating the integrity of the Turkish empire, and the independence of the Ionian islands.—His majesty has, however, since learned, that the French government have entertained views hostile to both these objects; and that they have even suggested the idea of a partition of the Turkish empire.—These views must now be manifest to all the world, from the official publication of the report of Colonel Sebastiani: from the conduct of that officer, and of the other French agents in Egypt, Syria, and the Ionian islands, and from the distinct admission of the first consul himself, in his communication with Lord Whitworth. His majesty was, therefore, warranted in considering it to be the determination of the French government to violate those articles of the treaty of peace, which stipulated for the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire, and of the Ionian islands, and consequently he would not have been justified in evacuating the island of Malta, without receiving some other security, which might equally provide for these important objects. His majesty accordingly feels that he has an incontestible claim, in consequence of the conduct of France since the treaty of peace, and with reference to the objects which made part of the stipulations of that treaty, to refuse, under the present circumstances, to relinquish the possession of the island of Malta.

"Yet, notwithstanding this right, so clear and so unquestionable, the alternative presented by the French government to his majesty, in language the most peremptory and menacing, was the evacuation of Malta, or the renewal of war.

"If the views of ambition and aggrandizement, which have thus been manifested by the French government since the conclusion of the treaty of peace, have in so very particular a manner attracted the attention of his majesty, it has been equally impossible for him not to feel, and not to notice, the repeated indignities which have been offered by that government to his crown and his people.

"The report of Colonel Sebastiani contains the most unwarrantable insinuations and charges against his majesty's government, against the officer who commanded his forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter. This paper cannot be considered as the publication of a private individual; it has been avowed, and indeed bears evidence upon the face of it, that it is the official report of an accredited agent, published by the authority of the government to which it was addressed, who thereby have given it their express sanction.

"This report had been published a very short time, when another indignity was offered to this country in the communication of the first consul of France to the legislative body. In this communication, he presumes to affirm, in the character of chief magistrate of that country, "That Great Britain cannot singly contend against the power of France;" an assertion as unfounded as it is indecent, disproved by the events of many wars, and by none more than by those of the war which has been recently concluded. Such an assertion, advanced in the most solemn official act of a government, and thereby meant to be avowed to all the powers of Europe, can be considered in no other light than as a defiance publicly offered to his majesty, and to a brave and powerful people, who are both willing and able to defend his just rights and those of their country, against every insult and aggression.

"The conduct of the first consul to his majesty's ambassador at his audience in presence of the ministers of most of the sovereigns and states of Europe, furnishes another instance of provocation on the part of the French government, which it would be improper not to notice on the present occasion, and the subsequent explanation of this transaction may be considered as having the effect of aggravating instead of palliating the affront.

"At the very time when his majesty was demanding satisfaction and explanation on some of the points above-mentioned, the French minister at Hamburgh endeavoured to obtain the insertion in a Hamburgh paper of a most gross and opprobrious libel against his majesty, and when difficulties were made respecting the insertion of it, he availed himself of his official character of minister of the French republic, to require the publication of it, by order of his government, in the gazette of the senate of that town. With this requisition, so made, the senate of Hamburgh were induced to comply; and thus has the independence of that town been violated, and a free state made the instrument, by the menace of the French government, of propagating throughout Europe, upon their authority, the most offensive and unfounded calumnies against his majesty and his government. His majesty might add to this list of indignities, the requisition which the French government have repeatedly urged that the laws and constitution of his country should be changed relative to the liberty of the press. His majesty might, likewise, add the calls which the French government have, on several occasions, made upon him to violate the laws of hospitality, with respect to persons who had found an asylum within his dominions, and against whose conduct no charge whatever has at any time been substantiated. It is impossible to reflect on these different proceedings, and the course which the French government have thought proper to adopt respecting them, without the thorough conviction that they are not the effect of accident; but that they form a part of a system which has been adopted for the purpose of degrading, vilifying, and insulting his majesty and his government.

"Under all these insults and provocations, his majesty, not without a due sense of his dignity, has proceeded, with every degree of temper and moderation, to obtain satisfaction and redress; while he has neglected no means consistent with his honor, and the safety of his dominions, to induce the government of France to concede to him, what is, in his judgment, absolutely necessary for the future tranquillity of Europe. His efforts, in this respect, have proved abortive, and he has, therefore, judged it necessary to order his ambassador to leave Paris. In having recourse to this proceeding, it has been his majesty's object to put an end to the fruitless discussions which have too long subsisted between the two governments, and to close a period of suspense peculiarly injurious to the subjects of his majesty.

"But though the provocations which his majesty has received might entitle him to larger claims than those which he has advanced, yet, anxious to prevent calamities which might thus be extended to every part of Europe, he is still willing, as far as is consistent with his own honor, and the interests of his people, to afford every facility to any just and honorable arrangement, by which such evils may be averted. He has, therefore, no difficulty in declaring, to all Europe, that, notwithstanding all the changes which have taken place since the treaty of peace, notwithstanding the extension of the power of France, in repugnance to that treaty, and to the spirit of peace itself, his majesty will not avail himself of these circumstances, to demand in compensation all that he is entitled to require, but will be ready to concur, even now, in an arrangement, by which satisfaction shall be given to him, for the indignities which have been offered to his crown and to his people, and substantial security afforded against further encroachments on the part of France.

"His majesty has thus distinctly and unreservedly stated the reasons of those proceedings to which he has found himself compelled to resort. He is actuated by no disposition to interfere in the internal concerns of any other state; by no projects of conquest and aggrandizement; but solely by a sense of what is due to the honor of his crown, and the interests of his people, and by an anxious desire to obstruct the further progress of a system, which, if not resisted, may prove fatal to every part of the civilized world."

"Westminster, May 18, 1803."

Previous to the publication of this declaration, a message from his majesty was presented to both houses of parliament, (May 16,) informing them, that he had recalled his ambassador from Paris, and that the French ambassador had left London.

Lord Pelham moved, in the house of lords, that the message should be taken into consideration on that day se'nnight: it would take two or three days before the necessary papers could be got ready, and it would also take some time for their lordships to consider their contents.

BOOK VI.

CHAP. II.

1803.

Earl Stanhope rejoiced that time was given for considering these papers, and for resolving whether this country should be plunged in another calamitous war, the end of which no person could foresee. His lordship then mentioned a plan, that he had heard was presented to the French government by an American gentleman, by which the navy of England might be completely destroyed, and the channel of the river Thames stopped up! He could not consent to the going to war, unless he had information from ministers, whether they had directed their attention to that specific point.

No answer was given by ministers to Lord Stanhope's question, and the consideration of the message was fixed for the ensuing Monday.

In the house of commons, on the same day, Lord Hawkesbury, on similar grounds, moved, that his majesty's message should be considered on the next Monday.

Mr. Grey made no objection to the motion, which he thought perfectly proper; but wished to be informed, whether it was true that letters of marque and of reprisal had been ordered.

Lord Hawkesbury answered, that such orders had been given; and if they were not stated in the message, it was not from any wish of concealing the fact, but because it was not usual so to do.

After a few words from Mr. Fox, and Mr. T. Grenville, the motion was unanimously agreed to.

On May the 18th, Lord Pelham presented to the lords, as did the chancellor of the exchequer to the house of commons, copies of the letters and state-papers, forming the correspondence between Great Britain and France, since the period of the peace of Amiens.

The following day, Mr. Grey moved for certain papers, which he thought would be necessary to throw a light on some parts of his majesty's declaration, and that were not in the papers presented yesterday. The papers that he moved for, were, first, those respecting the violence that had been stated to have been offered to British subjects and property, in the French ports. 2dly, as to the commercial consuls appointed by France; with the remonstrances, if any, made by his majesty's ministers on those subjects. 3dly, the remonstrances, if any, and the answers of the French government, respecting the continuance of the French troops in Holland, and the occupation of Switzerland. 4thly, the orders last sent for the evacuating the Cape of Good Hope. And lastly, he wished to have some information about the nature of the preparations in France and Holland, at the date of his majesty's message, as the French government positively denied that there existed any such preparation, and that there were only two frigates fitting out in Holland, and two corvettes in France at that time! Mr. Grey concluded, by proposing his first motion; for papers respecting violence committed to British subjects and property in the ports of France.

Lord Hawkesbury in reply said, that it was not insisted that any of those particular grounds was of itself a cause of war; but all together amounted, in his opinion, to a mass of aggression which would completely justify the conduct of his majesty's ministers. He thought the honorable gentleman had taken an exaggerated view of those points on which he grounded his motion. It was not necessary that France should positively deny satisfaction; if she constantly evaded it, it was evidence of a hostile disposition: he therefore opposed the motion.

Mr. Whitbread thought the motions proper; in all events, he imagined it would be incumbent on ministers to prove, in their justification, that they had acted cautiously, as well as zealously; and that it was not through their fault, that grievances had been allowed to accumulate, when that accumulation was now made the ground of actual hostility.

Lord Castlereagh declared ministers had given every degree of information that their duty allowed them; and, that they had exposed themselves to a severe ordeal, by laying before the house the whole history of their conduct since the treaty of Amiens.

Mr. Windham supported the motion, and thought information was necessary on all these points which Mr. Grey had mentioned: he censured the conduct of ministers in wrapping themselves up in affected mystery, when all that was wanted was the substance of the information in their power.

The chancellor of the exchequer said, that there was only one of the many motions made by Mr. Grey, that he should feel himself bound in duty to resist; that was, the motion with respect to the armaments going on in France and Holland at the time of his majesty's message: he would however say, that Mr. Liston had informed government, that there was a body of 10,000 troops encamped in Holland; and the house would recollect, that the first consul had himself told all Europe in his exposé, that he should keep 500,000 troops ready to support his negotiation with England; and that only a fortnight before the message, when France was at peace with the continent, a new and extraordinary levy had been made by conscription.

After some observations from the secretary at war, and the master of the rolls, on the impolicy of producing those documents, Mr. Grey made a very able and animated reply.

The question being put on his motions, they were all carried, excepting those which related to the armaments, and those respecting the remonstrances concerning the affairs of Holland and Switzerland.

On the day appointed for the discussion of the causes of the renewal of war, (May 23,) Lord Pelham rose, in the house of lords, to move the address. He wished that, in this discussion, the support that he trusted would be given to the proposed address, would be kept separate from the consideration of the general conduct of ministers, which might be solemnly discussed on a future day. He wished the only question to be now considered should be, whether, from a perusal of all the papers laid upon the table, a just and legitimate ground of war had not been established. He then traced an outline of the conduct of the two governments since the peace of Amiens: first, as to Malta, which was the prominent feature in discussion, the British government had taken the necessary steps for carrying the treaty into execution; when, about the 27th of January last, the evacuation of Malta was pressed in a peremptory manner by the French government. About the same time, ministers felt it their duty to demand an explanation of the pretensions advanced, and the views disclosed, by the French government. It was then necessary to review the whole conduct of that government since the signing of that peace, which proved that they did not sincerely wish to maintain it. His lordship then went over the various acts of aggression, committed by France, as stated in his majesty's declaration; and justified the conduct of ministers on all the several points. As to the possession of Malta, he thought it absolutely necessary for this country, as a security against the designs of France upon Egypt, since, by the destruction of the order of Malta, it had been impossible to fulfil exactly the treaty in this respect. His lordship, after having dwelt, at considerable length, on the many acts of aggression and insult, on the part of France, concluded, by moving an address to his majesty, expressive of the sense the house entertained of the anxious desire, shewn by his majesty, for the preservation of the peace; their regret that France had not manifested the same principles; their indignation at the spirit of encroachment exhibited by France; and the reliance which his majesty might place in their support and assistance.

The Duke of Cumberland seconded the motion, in a very elegant and impressive speech. He considered the question, arising out of the papers on the table, was nothing less, than whether this country, which had so long held a proud and distinguished rank among the nations, should, or should not, cease to be an independent country? Or whether we must now descend from that rank, and take our place among the vanquished and feeble nations, which have been plundered and insulted by France? The country now was again called to war, to repel the most unwarrantable system of encroachment and aggression that ever sprang from Gallic ambition. The first consul of France had endeavoured to subdue all the nations of Europe, and reduce them to the most abject vassalage. Holland, Italy, and Switzerland, lay now subdued, at the proud foot of France, after being plundered of all the wealth which the industry of ages had acquired; and now France, in the vanity of conquest, has ventured to say, that "England could not contend with her, single-handed." He then went over the whole conduct of the French government, during the peace, and shewed, that it was an uniform system of insult, aggression, and hostility. His royal highness concluded, by expressing his firm persuasion, that if this war was prosecuted with vigour, it would be crowned with success, and that we should be able to convince the world, that this nation has not degenerated from the spirit of their ancestres, and that there is still in Europe a powerful and unconquered nation, always ready to defend its own dignity, and to oppose lawless ambition.

Earl Stanhope said, that it appeared to him, that the only serious difference between the French government and ours, was in consequence of our insisting upon keeping Malta for ten years, in spite of the treaty of Amiens. In his opinion, we were bound to restore it; nor could he grant that France had so much increased her dominions since the peace. At the peace, she was in possession of Italy and Holland; she was also in possession of St. Domingo, which she has since lost, and which, if she possessed, our West India colonies would be in great danger. As Bonaparte offered to give up Malta in perpetuity, for an adequate consideration, he thought our ministers should, at all events, have negotiated with respect to the consideration which might have satisfied the French government.

The Duke of Clarence went over the history of the last war, and traced the anxiety and clamour for peace, to the failure of so many of our expeditions. It was from perceiving the wishes of the public so strong for peace, that he gave his consent to the preliminary articles. He took an able review of the hostile conduct of the French government, from the day they had signed the preliminaries. He more particularly dwelt on the conversation of Bonaparte with Lord Whitworth, in which the first consul declared his views upon Egypt, and considered the possession of Piedmont and Switzerland as "des bagatelles," trifles not worth considering, and which must have been foreseen while the treaty was pending. At the time of the treaty, it was considered a primary object to guarantee the independence of Malta; but the destruction of that order, to which it was to have been restored, and the change in the relative situation of France, since the treaty, made it more necessary than ever, not to restore Malta, till its independence could be perfectly secured.

Lord Mulgrave thought the oppressions exercised by France over other powers, to aggrandize her empire, was a sufficient reason for us to refuse to surrender Malta; but, by the letter of the treaty, we were bound to surrender Malta to the order, who were to be restored to their ancient privileges; instead of that, the order had been stripped by France both of its property and privileges. A grand master had been chosen by the pope, who was himself a vassal of France, and therefore to restore it now would be only giving it into the hands of France, as a key to the possession of Egypt. If ministers were to bear longer the insolence of the French government, they might have Napper Tandy sent over to them as a commercial agent; or Arthur O'Connor, as consul of Britain. He therefore approved of the conduct of ministers on this occasion.

Lord Melville was glad to find that the importance of Malta, as a key to Egypt, was universally admitted; and, also, that we had a right to secure its independence against the ambition of France. In the actual state of Europe, Great Britain and Russia were the only powers capable of giving security to Malta. He felt rejoiced, that the negotiation, as respecting Malta, was at an end, and that the treaty had, on this point, become a dead letter, by the act of France, who had made the execution of it impossible. The order of St. John of Jerusalem was now no more, and we must keep Malta, not for them, but for ourselves. He was content to say, that we went to war to keep Malta; and to support the address to his majesty, for his gracious communication on this ground alone.

The Duke of Richmond did not consider the question of Malta as a sufficient ground for war. He declared, that until the late negotiation, he had never heard of the island of Lampedosa, and whether it had springs or rivers, and whether it was or was not capable of being fortified, he was entirely ignorant; and yet this island, such as it was, would have contented ministers, with a ten years possession of Malta; he really did not think the difference worth going to war about.

The Marquis of Landsdown said, that in the experience of a long life, he had always found, that when ministers chose to go to war, they also endeavoured to mingle among their alleged causes, some of the popular topics of the times. He had often before now heard "the liberty of the press" held forward, by ministers, as an object of the first importance. As to the aggressions of France in Switzerland, and upon the continent, he thought those subjects rather belonged to Austria, and the continental powers, than to us, and yet they did not think them sufficient causes for a war. For his part, in the present war, or in the American war, he thought that the spirit of reconciliation would do more than force of arms.

The Duke of Norfolk could not think of calling on ministers to give up Malta to the possession of France; but he hoped that the benefits of peace would not be lightly thrown away on the provocation of the moment. He hoped that the guarantee of Russia might still be obtained, upon this head. He wished that it should be the recommendation of this house to his majesty, that no mediation should be refused, that would hold out a hope of securing the peace of Europe; but if the independence of Europe, and the honor of the country, could no otherwise be obtained, then he must agree to meet again the miseries and difficulties of war.

Lord King expressed his concern, that we were again to be involved in war with France, for the reasons set forth in his majesty's declaration. He could not see what we were to expect from a new conflict with France; we could make no impression on that country: she had no colonies that could be affected by our attacks; and at home she was invulnerable. He did not think Malta a sufficient ground for war, much less did he consider it right to correct the errors of a treaty, by a breach of treaty. Although, as far as war was necessary, the house would support his majesty; yet he did not like unnecessarily hurling defiance at France. He then moved, as an amendment to the address, that those expressions should be expunged, which so warmly imputed to France the guilt of breaking the treaties.

The question being put, on the amendment,

Lord Ellenborough opposed it. He thought it evident, that we went to war, not for the island of Lampedosa (as stated by the Duke of Richmond), but for our independence, our liberties, and our commerce. It was most evident, that some new arrangements were necessary respecting the island of Malta, as we had neither the order to restore it to, nor the guarantees to secure its independence. This country was never situated so, as that any just claim could be made on her for the surrender of Malta; and the house must recollect the threats which had been held out by the first consul personally, of his intention of possessing himself of Egypt, sooner or later.

The Earl of Moira considered war so serious a calamity, both to the government and the people, that he was not surprised that the noble lord (Lord King), had proposed the amendment; although, for his part, he could not agree to it. The evils of war fell not upon their lordships, but upon the poor, in the first instance; it was therefore humanity to give them the fullest consideration. He hoped, however, that there might be no division upon the question, as it was a time that the greatest unanimity should be found in the councils of the nation. He did not consider Malta as the only ground, or the principal ground of the war; the many insults and aggressions of France were such, that, for his part, he did not consider Malta a sufficient satisfaction. The state of Holland, Switzerland, and Italy, were grounds still stronger than that of Malta. The possessions of France were now enormous, and were employed in wounding and injuring us. He considered that the country was never engaged in a war more necessary than the present; nor was it ever more necessary to prosecute a war with vigour and decision. If we carried it on well, he had no doubt of success; but if we carried it on badly, he thought the country would never be troubled with managing another war.

Earl Spencer considered the war unavoidable, under the present circumstances. He did not wish the house to run away with the idea, that this was to be but a short war, as it might well turn out to be otherwise. He wished the country to understand its danger, and the house to keep that jealous superintendence of the management of the resources of this country, without which we could not hope for any important success.

The Earl of Rosslyn, although he agreed with a noble lord (Lord Melville), that Malta alone would be a sufficient ground of war, yet thought it evident, that the whole system of France, since the peace, and her many breaches of good faith, amounted to an abundant cause of war, on our part. He considered the menacing language, held forth by Bonaparte to Lord Whitworth, as a sufficient cause of war. He considered his whole conduct, since he signed the treaty, as an uniform system of arrogance, insult, and injury. His views against the Turkish empire, which he did not take the trouble to conceal, were contrary to the letter of the treaty of Amiens, and therefore a ground of war. He wished that this should not be considered as a war likely to be short, but as one so absolutely necessary, that our only wish should be, to carry it on with vigour and success.

The Marquis of Sligo thought the provocations given to England, were such as made war inevitable. He hoped we should always retain Malta.

After a few observations from some other noble lords,

Lord Grenville expressed his approbation of the address, which he thought was drawn up in terms congenial with those sentiments of national honor and personal pride, which formed the best securities for the country. He did not wish to be considered an advocate for war. No man felt more strongly than he did the calamities of war, or the care that ought to be taken to avert so great an evil. But it was often the best way to avoid it, not to appear too much afraid of it. It was from this conviction that he had always recommended to ministers a system contrary to what they had chosen to pursue, but which he firmly believed would have been more effectual even for avoiding the war. As to the non-execution of the article of the treaty respecting Malta, he saw and stated, that, from the commencement, it was an article not capable of being carried into execution. Without dwelling much, however, upon the ground of Malta, he thought it clear that the present war was just, necessary, and expedient; inasmuch as it was a resistance to a series of violence, aggression, and insult, that could not be endured, without sinking the country to the lowest state of degradation. It was better to begin the contest now, than wait till we should be forced to engage in it, with diminished means, and against increased forces. The designs of Bonaparte on the Turkish empire were in direct violation of the letter and the spirit of the treaty of Amiens. The first consul was not a man to be conciliated to the practice of justice by the appearance of submission: all the energies of this country must therefore be called forward; we must expose ourselves to dangers, and reconcile ourselves to burdens; and prevent, by temporary sacrifices, the total sacrifice of our country and ourselves.

Lord Darnley supported the original address, as did also Lord Gwidir.

The house then divided on Lord King's amendment. For it 10; against it 142; majority 132 for the original address.

On the same day there was a very animated debate in the house of commons. After some pertinent observations from Mr. Erskine, Mr. Pitt expressed a strong hope, that upon the great and important question now at issue between this country and France, all parties would be unanimous. There had been such evident proofs of hostility on the part of France, as justified this country in retaining Malta for its security. The report of Sebastiani, the circumstances of his mission, and the express and deliberate avowal of Bonaparte himself, proved the intention of the first consul to renew his hostile attempts against Egypt, which would be undeniably an act of hostility against this country, and its most important interests, and a direct violation of the treaty of Amiens. He then commented at length upon the report of Sebastiani, and his mission, which he thought was most evidently of a hostile nature: as to the pretence of his being sent to answer and refute assertions in Sir Robert Wilson's book, that was ridiculous, inasmuch as his mission was antecedent to the appearance of that book; and, in fact, Sir Robert Wilson's statements had not been at all contradicted by the report of Sebastiani. Bonaparte, in his conversation with Lord Whitworth, only disowned the intention of seizing Egypt at present; as he declared, that sooner or later it must belong to France; and yet, although it was thus confest to be a favorite object of the consular ambition, still the only security that France would give was this, "that the French ambassador at Constantinople should be charged to give assurances to the Porte, of the disposition of France to strengthen, instead of weaken, the Turkish government." He would not disbelieve this assertion, when he recollected, that it had been the new policy of France, ever since the revolution, to disclose the most daring designs, long before their execution, in order that the first feelings of indignation, which would lead to vigorous resistance, might have passed away, and given place to neglect and indifference. He therefore did believe the first consul and his minister, when they declared their views upon Egypt; and thought our ministers would have been most blameable, if, when such designs were avowed, they should surrender Malta without sufficient security. He thought the annexation of Piedmont, the arrogant conduct of France with respect to the German indemnities, and, above all, the violence offered to Switzerland; were sufficient causes of war at any time, if we had had such continental co-operation as to afford any prospect of success. The various aggressions stated in his majesty's declaration, were all grounds sufficient to prove the necessity and justice of the war. He concluded by calling upon ministers, in a very impressive manner, to prepare without delay such vigorous measures of finance and national defence, as would convince our enemies that they were neither able to diminish our spirit by threatened invasions, nor to exhaust our resources by a long-protracted war. Great and unexampled as were our efforts during the last war, those of the present war should still exceed them. He lamented the necessity of those painful exertions as much as any man; but we had no option between the blessings of peace and the dangers of war; from the fatality of the times, and the general state of mankind, we must consider our lot as cast in a time of trouble and peril, and must now rouse our national spirit, to meet the dangers, and discharge the duties, of the situation we find ourselves placed in.

Mr. Grey moved an amendment to the address, and a discussion took place, which, as the reporters could not gain admission, was never accurately made public. The debate, however, was adjourned till the next day, when it was resumed by Mr. T. Grenville, who was decidedly of opinion that the conduct of France, upon all the principal points stated in his majesty's declaration, amply justified this country in retaining Malta. He should not have considered a mere abstract wish of the first consul to possess himself of Egypt, as a sufficient ground of war: but the conduct of Sebastiani, and the avowal of the French minister, made it clear that a hostile attack was meditated, not only on Egypt, but on the Ionian isles, in direct violation of the treaty of Amiens: he knew no period in which so many and invincible grounds of war, on the part of this country, were so clearly and distinctly made out. He preferred the original address to the amendment, because he thought it necessary to show the greatest unanimity.

Mr. Whitbread said, he also wished for unanimity: he put it, however, to the last speaker, to Mr. Pitt, and other gentlemen, whether they could, with a safe conscience, vote an address which would be a direct approbation of the conduct of his majesty's ministers. The right hon. gentleman had distinctly admitted, that ministers had committed the honor of the country. It appeared to him, that the best mode of obtaining unanimity, was, by supporting the amendment of Mr. Grey, which, while it pledged the house to the support of the war, did not approve of the conduct of ministers. Whatever aggravated circumstance might have occurred since the peace of Amiens, he considered that the only thing we were at war for now, was the terms of our ultimatum delivered to the French court. If we had been suffered to retain Malta, all would have been well, and we would now enjoy peace. After taking a review of the whole conduct of ministers, both before and after the treaty of Amiens, he felt convinced, that they had no right to declare those to be reasons for going to war, which were no reasons for preventing the peace being signed at Amiens: he concluded by expressing a hope, that his majesty's ministers might now avail themselves of the interference of Russia, and that the peace might be preserved.

Mr. Dallas wished the attention of the house to be confined to the question immediately before their consideration, namely, whether the war was just or unjust? As to the abilities of ministers, and their general conduct, that was a separate question, which might be discussed at another time. He thought there was no doubt, but that, in this quarrel, the country was in the right; ministers had made every cession required by the treaty of Amiens, excepting Malta alone, and, in that instance, they had done every thing in their power to obtain the guarantees that were stipulated in the treaty. On the other hand, the conduct of France, with respect to Switzerland, Holland, and Italy, justified the jealousy of our government. The first consul himself had avowed his designs upon Egypt; he therefore should answer the last speaker, who asked, "What we are at war for?" by saying, "We were at war for Malta; but not for Malta only, but for Egypt; not for Egypt only, but for India; not for India alone, but for the integrity of the British empire, and the cause of justice, good faith, and freedom, all over the world."

Mr. Elliot agreed in the justice and necessity of the war, and on that ground, and that alone, supported the address. He considered the mission of Sebastiani as an act incapable of explanation or reparation. He had always reprobated the late unfortunate truce, and wished now that the contest should be continued, until real peace and tranquillity could be restored.

Mr. Serjeant Best thought, that not only Malta, but the smallest island upon earth, would be sufficient ground for war, if demanded in the peremptory manner in which France demanded Malta. Although he admitted that France had given many other just causes for war, yet he did not blame ministers for not being too ready to seize them.

Mr. Canning supported the address, but by no means conceived himself to be precluded, by so doing, from expressing his opinion fully, upon a future occasion, of the whole of the conduct of ministers. As to the justice and necessity of the present war, he thought it was altogether obvious; and whether ministers ought, or ought not, sooner to have made their stand against France, yet he had no doubt, but that, under the circumstances which then existed, they were right in refusing to give up Malta. The importance of Malta had been proved by this, that both the English and French expeditions, bound for Egypt, found it most convenient to touch at Malta in their passage. It was evident that, in the present state of Europe, Russia is the only neutral power which could sufficiently protect Malta, but Russia had shewn no disposition either to garrison or guarantee it.

Mr. Fox felt it to be his duty to the people of England to endeavour to rescue them from a situation of great danger, and certain misery, whatever might be the success of the war. He differed from those who had divided the question, as he thought the justice or injustice of the war must, in a great measure, depend upon the circumstances of the conduct of ministers. He thought it was much better to vote for the amendment, respecting which there could be no difference of opinion, than for the original address, which certainly required much explanation. The honorable member took a review of the whole of the correspondence, in which, he thought, there was a great deal of shuffling on both sides. He very much disapproved of the application of the first consul to remove those emigrants who had obtained the protection of this country; as also that for abridging the freedom of our press; he thought, however, too much stress had been laid on the expressions used by him in the conversation with Lord Whitworth, which being given from memory, could not be supposed to be exact. He, however, saw no great pride or haughtiness in the consul speaking of the invasion, and confessing that the chances were an hundred to one against him; and that he almost despaired of being able to accomplish his purpose. The desire of Bonaparte to be possessed of Egypt, was not, in itself, a sufficient ground of war, or we should never have been at peace with the house of Bourbon. As to their general system of aggrandizement, we had no more right to complain of it in France, than France would have to complain of our aggrandizement in India. To excuse ourselves from possessing this spirit, we must say as the lady did, who was accused of frequent disregards of virtue: "Never before, upon my honor, on this side the Cape of Good Hope." As to Egypt, at the time that Vergennes, the minister to Louis the XVIth, had an expedition ready for Egypt, instead of war, we made a commercial treaty with France. As to Malta, it was known that Russia would have guaranteed it upon certain conditions; but we rather chose to keep it to ourselves for ten years. He did not consider the missions of Sebastiani as a sufficient cause for war. There had hardly been a year of peace, since the treaty of Utrecht, in which the old French government had not some such missionary at work. Europe would never know a single year of peace, if war was necessary on such a ground. He blamed ministers for allowing an accumulation of insults, without demanding satisfaction; and for finally going to war on a sordid principle, for which it was impossible that we could find any allies. He was alarmed when he heard of the unusual exertions that should be made for this war, and that from an old member (Mr. Pitt), who had already so much increased the burdens of the nation. That gentleman seemed to threaten us with an increase of two or three hundred millions to our debt, and that purely for Malta, unconnected with any great, general, generous interest of Europe. He had, in his life time, heard plenty of philippics, such as Demosthenes might have envied; but whenever he heard members indulging the house with luxurious treats of eloquence, full dressed speeches, and high-toned declamations, he pitied the people, whose lot it was to pay dearly for all this. It put him in mind of the French proverb, "Le cout ote le gout;" and, certainly, it must be admitted, that the fine speeches in the American war, and in the last, cost the country dear enough. After strongly recommending an alliance with Russia, if possible, Mr. Fox concluded by saying, that, in his opinion, the best way to obtain unanimity, was to support the amended address, which every body must approve of, rather than the original address, which no one could assent to without some qualification.

The chancellor of the exchequer lamented that the effusions of the honorable gentleman's great and exalted mind should have been employed for the purpose for which they were then applied. He considered the war as one of obvious necessity, and justified the conduct of his majesty's ministers from the imputation of want of sincerity in their endeavours to procure peace. The honorable gentleman had not done justice to ministers, when he charged them with not having made the proper remonstrances, as it had appeared, from the papers on the table, that they had remonstrated upon almost every topic mentioned in the declaration. He avowed, that it was the intention of this country to assist Switzerland, if, by any means, it could have been done. He then proceeded to take a general view of the conduct of France since the treaty, which evinced a constant design of injuring and insulting this country. He dwelt particularly on the report of Sebastiani, and the conversation of Bonaparte with Lord Whitworth. As to the interference of Russia, respecting Malta, he should say, that if Russia, or any other great power, should interfere, with friendly intentions, and make any proposition of a practical nature, by which peace might be restored, no man would be more glad to attend to it than himself. At present, however, he thought it necessary to prepare the country for an arduous contest, and to be ready to make great sacrifices in support of it. The cause in which we were now engaged, was that of justice, against insult and aggression; a cause which had left to his majesty or parliament no alternative.

The attorney-general supported the address, and highly disapproved of the tendency of Mr. Fox's speech, whose arguments went, as he thought, to justify the conduct of Bonaparte. He conceived that this country had never been engaged, in a contest before, on more honorable principles, or more absolutely necessary, than the present war.

Mr. Windham, in very strong terms, condemned the arguments of Mr. Fox, which, he thought, not only fallacious, but wicked. His speech was like a quiver of poisoned arrows, aimed at the hearts of his hearers. The honorable gentleman had made himself a pander to all the base and illiberal passions of the people, by supporting selfishness against patriotism, and opposing private considerations to the grand views of national policy. If he stooped so low, he was not to be envied for the triumph of eloquence. He then drew a comparison between his conduct and that of Mr. Pitt, who had employed his great talents in kindling the flame of patriotism, and in calling forth the energies of the country.

Mr. W. Smith condemned the severe epithets which had been applied, by Mr. Windham, to the speech of Mr. Fox. He thought, when the heat of the moment had subsided, he must feel remorse for the expressions he had used.

Mr. Windham, in explanation, allowed that he did not wish the words that had fallen from him, in the heat of debate, to be understood in the strict literal meaning.

Mr. Fox said, he excused the warmth of the right honorable gentleman; and, as for himself, he had a foible of not easily and slightly quarrelling with an old acquaintance.

The house then divided on the amendment, when there appeared 67 for it; 398 against it. The original question was then put and carried.

Great Britain having been, by his majesty's declaration, and by the rejection of Russian interference, fully committed in warfare with France and her dependencies, resolutions of the strongest and most decided tendency towards the inculpation of ministers were brought forward in both houses of parliament, but negatived in both by a great majority. In the course of these important debates, the masterly speeches of Earl Temple, Mr. Pitt, and Lord Hawkesbury, were indicative of the expression of the feelings of the different interests, and the parts which each took upon the subject; and the manly and spirited manner in which Lord Hawkesbury rejected the species of compromise between a direct answer and a total acquittal recommended by Mr. Pitt, who moved that the other orders of the day be read, and his calling on the senate for either direct acquittal or condemnation, gained, as it deserved, considerable respect and applause. The friends of Mr. Fox, in both houses, declined giving any opinion, or dividing on this occasion, with the exception of Mr. Tierney, who had accepted the high and lucrative office of treasurer of the navy, with the rank of privy-counsellor. But, although the old opposition stood aloof in the present instance from the new, as the latter had from co-operation with the former on the motions severally made by Lord King and Mr. Fox, tending to the disapprobation of the conduct of ministers (which had been negatived) there was a similarity of feeling, a spontaneous concurrence of sentiment which approximated towards a perfect coincidence of public conduct. Mr. Pitt and his friends had also taken their ground, if not in declared hostility, at least in the most threatening position. Here then were three parties, confessedly including a vast proportion of the property, the abilities, and patriotism of the nation, who required but one principle of action, and a mutual understanding, to bear down every thing which could oppose them. In this discussion, Mr. Addington triumphed, and he proceeded in confidence and security to provide for the exigencies of the war, on systems of defence and finance.

Irish Affairs.—Tumults in the South suppressed.—New Conspiracy.—Characters of the Leaders.—Grand Attempt on the Capital.—Commencement of the Attack.—Assassination of Mr. Clarke.—Of Colonel Brown, and others.—Massacre of the Lord-chief-justice and his Nephew.—Character of Lord Kilwarden.—Emmett's remarkable Address to the Court.—Executions, &c.

At the close of the year 1802, the affairs of Ireland presented a far more gloomy aspect than at that of the preceding year, when the union took place. Indications of a turbulent spirit existed in many parts of the south. Early in the year 1803, judges were sent by special commission to try the disturbers of the public peace, in the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in the two former of which commotion had been very general; the latter was only affected by its proximity to Tipperary. In the process of these trials nothing of a treasonable disposition was discoverable in their unfortunate, but deluded subjects. The sacrifices which were made to public justice on this occasion restored at least the appearance of tranquillity. The magistrates of Tipperary and Limerick earnestly petitioned to be indulged with the power of inflicting discretionary punishment and transportation, under what is called in Ireland the insurrection-act, to which his majesty's government in Ireland refused to concede, and chose the milder and more authorized mode of regular legal proceeding.

Some time before his majesty's message to parliament had announced the probability of a rupture with France, it became obvious to the wary observer, that there existed a considerable degree of feverish agitation among those who had favored the late conspiracy, and an alarming resort to Ireland of persons notoriously in the interests of the French government. Undoubtedly the great majority of the people, who had been deceived and led away by the intrigues and artifices of the jacobins, those especially who had any property to lose, or stake in the country, had seen through, and heartily repented their delusion; but there were still to be found some pardoned delinquents, who had yet to learn prudence from their escape of punishment, and whose wickedness had not been put to flight by the glaring conviction of its folly. This intractable and restless description of people hailed with transport the opportunity of recommencing their machinations, and while some spread themselves over the country in every direction, others fixed themselves in the metropolis—an active correspondence was set on foot with France—and the organization of a new conspiracy was commenced and prosecuted with unceasing diligence. Nor was Bonaparte inattentive or remiss to forward, by every means in his power, his darling project of revolution. The chiefs of the preceding Irish rebellion were summoned to Paris, from the insignificance and contempt in which, since the peace of Amiens, they had lived in different states of the continent; consultations were held with them; their hopes and passions stimulated by promises and flattery; and they were directed to communicate similar impulses to their agents and adherents in their native country.

The person who took upon himself (or to whom that task was delegated by his confederates) the office of director and principal mover of this new plot upon the British dominion in Ireland, was Mr. Robert Emmett, a young man of specious and promising talents. He was the younger brother of that Emmett who had, previously to the rebellion of 1798, abandoned a respectable situation at the Irish bar, in order to project and carry into execution the wild schemes of that day—an Irish republic, and separation from Great Britain. His father had filled, during a considerable period, the situation of state physician in Dublin.

This young man had been sufficiently unguarded in his conduct, while the previous disturbances existed, to become an object of the vigilance of government, and had found it prudent to reside abroad so long as the habeas corpus act was suspended, but had returned to Ireland on the removal of that obstacle. His mind was ardent, his imagination brilliant, and he possessed a flow of elocution, often rising to sublimity, and always consistent with the correctness of legitimate oratory. His conversation and deportment at all times manifested the high degree of phrenzy to which his heated and distempered spirit, naturally too prone to such impressions, had been wrought up, by the political enthusiasm in which he had been early formed; by the revolutionary objects which had been in such rapid succession presented to his mind; and by the society of fanciful projectors, to which, from inclination and habit, he had confined himself both at home and on the continent. The death of Dr. Emmett had placed a sum of two thousand pounds in ready money within his reach, and with this fund he proposed to himself the subversion of an old and well-established government! It is not, however, improbable, that this sum, miserable as it was when compared with his objects, might have tempted the cupidity of a few parasitical adventurers, (to whose wants it might for a season administer) to beset and attach themselves to him; who, by the acts of adulation, by flattering his hopes, and encouraging his designs, at the same time that they revelled in the waste of this little patrimony, nourished his chimerical projects until they had involved him in irretrievable ruin. His principal associates were Dowdall, who had formerly filled a very inferior office under the Irish house of commons; Redmond, a man of narrow means, who affected to be engaged in some low species of commerce; and Allen, a broken woollen-manufacturer.

A conspirator of a different stamp, and of a much higher rate of abilities than those mentioned, was Quigley, a mechanic, but of considerable address, who having been outlawed in 1798, had since that period resided in France; and who, upon the recommencement of hostilities, had returned thence, under circumstances which clearly indicated his agency to the enemy. He seemed well furnished with money, which he certainly could not have derived from his own resources, and of which he was unsparingly liberal. He perambulated with unceasing activity Kildare, his native county, tampering with the people of the lower classes; exhorting them to throw off the slavery imposed upon them by the present form of government; reviving and recalling to their minds every cause of dissatisfaction and complaint; and, by freely distributing strong liquors in many places, and occasionally money, attached the multitude through the medium of its prevailing propensities, and corrupted and deluded vast numbers to hold themselves in readiness for that attempt, which although completely impracticable, destitute of the slightest probability of success, and tending only to the inevitable destruction of those miserable instruments, yet answered, to a certain degree, the purpose of their unprincipled employer, as it distracted and threw some odium on the existing government, and revived distrusts and jealousies among the people.

In another part of the country, a second enthusiast presented himself as a chieftain, and who seemed so confident in the merits of the mighty boon he had to offer as the meed of prosperous rebellion, that he never once suspected, that it would not be accepted and grasped at with as much avidity, at least, as it was tendered. Mr. Russel was the son of an officer of reputation in his majesty's service, and who having retired, enjoyed an honorable retreat in the situation of master of the royal hospital for veterans at Kilmainham, near Dublin. He was placed early in the army, and had served at Bunker's Hill and the subsequent campaigns in North America. After the peace he either retired on half-pay, or his corps was reduced: so far his situation was suited to the mediocrity of his talents. He then fixed himself, in consequence of accidental connection, in a town of considerable trade in the north of Ireland; but which was not less remarkable for its encouragement of speculative theology, metaphysical inquiry, and the extent and diversity of opinions, both in matters of church and state. Mr. Russel, eager and ardent, at first acting under military impressions, was remarkable for his zealous attachment to his sovereign, and had thus even rendered himself obnoxious in a disaffected town, by a constant display of the most fervent loyalty. In this state of seclusion he addicted himself to the cultivation of literature, and hazarded some pieces of criticism which afford no proofs of superior attainment: he likewise engaged eagerly in those religious investigations which occupy the leisure or fill the minds of the more rigid dissenters. Immersed in pursuits of such a nature, with a scanty income, and a mind at once gloomy and sanguine, it may well be supposed, that at the period when the modern doctrines of political reform were broached, they found in this unfortunate man an apt and enthusiastic proselyte. In justice, however, to the memory of this unhappy person, it must be observed, that he was affectionate and tender-hearted, and possessed more of the feeling and sentiment of a gentleman, than are usually found in the confirmed democrat.

Such were the conditions and characters of the principal leaders of the conspiracy, which, having been conducted in security and darkness, broke out into insurrection on the 23d of July. Emmett and Dowdall were stationed in Dublin; Quigley in the county of Kildare, and (indeed without the slightest gleam of probable success to cheer him on his mission), Russel in the populous districts of the north, Down and Antrim; others of less note were subdivided throughout various parts of the country, with authority from their leaders to forward the design by every means in their power. Some important assistance was likewise hoped for in the acquisition of a person of the name of Dwyer, whom they treated with, and urged to levy his utmost force and make the first attack on the capital.

This man, at the head of a gang of deserters and banditti, had remained in arms from the period of the rebellion of 1798, obstinately rejecting repeatedly proffered mercy; and who dexterously eluding all pursuit, had sustained himself under the protection of the almost inaccessible fastnesses of the Wicklow mountains. His party did not ostensibly exceed twenty, but he was supposed to possess unbounded influence over the peasants of that district; so that a large body, on any notable undertaking, was within his means of command.

What is most observable of these transactions, is the impenetrable secrecy with which they were conducted.—Undoubtedly many surmises, obscure reports, and mysterious observations connected with them, were afloat in Dublin, and strong symptoms of clandestine meetings and novel conferences were noticed in the more distant counties; yet the parties to the main design continued with inviolable fidelity true to each other, and their cause. Mr. Emmett is said at one period to have counted upon 80 persons with whom he was in strict confidence, eminent for zeal, steadiness, and resolution.

He continued still in Dublin, feeding his vanity and his hopes with the pompous projects of a founder of constitutions; and lurking in all the mysterious varieties of conspiracy. He lodged in several different houses, passed in various places by distinct appellations, and what was of more consequence to his grand object, established his arsenal and magazines in two tenements, hired in the names of other persons, in obscure parts of the town, in one of which some small quantity of gunpowder was manufactured; in the other, timber was provided for constructing pikes, and those already made, and his other arms and stores, were there deposited. Here again it must be observed, that the depositaries of those secrets were the hostler of an inn, and others of the meanest and most indigent stamp, whom yet neither levity, nor the certainty of an ample reward, nor the wavering instability common to men engaged in danger and dangerous designs, could draw the discovery from the impenetrable recesses of their fidelity! To account for this, it must be supposed that the hearts of the people were with the project; or perhaps it was that the departments of the police of Dublin were all filled by men who had been deeply engaged in the severities of the preceding rebellion, and who being on that account stigmatised and detested by the people, even those who had secretly returned to reason, were not willing to unbosom themselves to men whom they regarded with so much horror!

By the month of June, however, government had seen or heard sufficient to induce it to quicken its diligence, and the officers of the police appeared thenceforward more alert and vigilant;

notwithstanding which, it was difficult to bring the public to believe that the project of insurrection was on foot; especially as the chief governor of the island, Lord Hardwicke, and his family, had exerted themselves with uncommon condescension to acquire the public approbation. This state of delusion continued until the 14th of July, the anniversary of the French revolution, which opened the eyes of many, and excited a considerable degree of alarm. Bonfires were publicly made in commemoration of that event, and collections of people, though not numerous, yet apparently strenuous and decided, formed and partook in the festivity. A day or two after, an explosion took place in the house where, as already stated, gunpowder was stored or manufactured. This circumstance tended to create an universal sensation of distrust and uneasiness, although it did not particularly stimulate the suspicions or the efforts of government: and as the leaders of the conspiracy apprehended that under such general impressions it would not be much longer in their power to machinate in security, they immediately determined to press forward the execution of their projected treason.

The interval of the ten days next ensuing after the explosion, was employed by the malcontents, either in deliberating on the propriety of immediately flying to arms, or in concerting the most practicable mode of commencing their operations. It was considered that the discontent, the levity, and the ignorance of the multitude, would afford an abundant supply of men: but to arm them was essential, and in arms they were deficient. It was then proposed to seize upon the several depôts and arsenals in the vicinity of Dublin; and, above all, it was universally determined to gain possession of the castle, as in that case it was supposed they could more decidedly influence the public mind by having the seat of government in their power.

Certainly a more absurd and impracticable project never fascinated the mind of an heated and frantic visionary, than that such a force as was at that moment actually disposeable in Ireland, backed by the armed property of the kingdom, was to be subdued by eighty adventurers, at the head of a tumultuous, half-armed, and undisciplined rabble! Incoherently, indeed, did those deluded wretches calculate upon their means of success, when they flattered themselves with the expectation of governing the most intractable of all mobs, or of compelling it to any principle of subordination. If they had even succeeded in carrying the castle, the booty it presented would have unnerved their force, and dissipated their followers. How could they have impeded or prevented immediate succours from being thrown in by England? nor would their success against

As they approached the precipice, the greater part of the conspirators clearly contemplated their danger, and wished to defer the attempt. These were either the needy and the profligate, who had fastened themselves on the spoils of Emmett; the agents of the French government, whose object it rather was to agitate and predispose the country to ferment, than to embark themselves in immediate action; or, lastly, those busy and depraved simpletons, who cherishing a morbid vanity and thirst of self-importance, had imagined, that contrary to the obvious destination of their rank in life and endowments, they were called upon to act a part on the great theatre of public affairs; but who, startled at the near view of danger, were willing (although now too late) to shrink back and shelter themselves in their own insignificance. Mr. Emmett, however, was peremptory in the opposite way of thinking, and those who had assisted in feeding his illusions were now urged forward in their turn. He represented, with an impetuosity not to be resisted, that the militia was about to be embodied: that the country would be placed every day in a more unassailable posture; and, by its multiplied measures of defence, become impregnable.

After this conference, many of his partizans slunk away, and declined all farther participation in his designs: others, however, and those the majority, resolutely determined to follow the fortunes of their beloved leader, and declared that they would not desert him, although they advanced with the certainty of utter destruction to themselves and to their cause. The die was cast, and all farther reflection was repelled by the ardour and firmness of resolution.

Fortune, on this occasion not to be accused of fickleness, seems never, from their first embarking on this desperate adventure, to have been, for a single moment, auspicious to the devoted conspirators. Their negotiation with Dwyer had failed—and a plan, even more specious, and on which they now grounded the most sanguine hopes of success, proved equally fallacious. A part of the plan of general attack determined upon, was to force the batteries and stores at the mouths of the harbour of Dublin, by the assistance of those working people from the counties of Wicklow and Wexford, who, in the months of June and July, repair, in considerable numbers, for the purpose of hay-making, to the neighbourhood of Dublin. The minds of this class of men appeared by no means more softened, nor their passions less alive to every motive of discontent, whether real or imaginary, than they were at the period of the rebellion of 1798, which they had principally supported, and the daring conduct of which had prepared and habituated them for similar encounters; their enmities were fierce and vehement; their courage and resolution undoubted; it was therefore natural that they should be selected as most useful and valuable auxiliaries.

For some time they had manifested the most cordial concurrence; but, on the 22d of July, the day before that appointed for action, for some cause unknown, they formally declared their abandonment of the design. They did not, however, accompany their refusal with any discovery of the plot.

For some days prior to the 23d of July, Emmett passed his time entirely in his dépôt, reposing at night upon a mattress thrown upon the ground, amid the implements of death which he had there collected. Here, with pikes and gunpowder strewed promiscuously around; did this poor zealot indulge the wildest workings of his imagination. In such a scene as this, did this lawgiver of four-and-twenty, superior in his own opinion to the Platos, the Mores, and the Harringtons, (because he conceived himself, superadded to his own, in the full possession of their experience,) meditate a digest of their several principles, for the benefit of the future Hibernian republic: or perhaps he meditated whether it might not be better and more consonant to the will of the sovereign people, to divide the country into separate independent states, and connect them on some just and broad principle of alliance, of which probably one of the then existing federative unions of Europe afforded the archetype. How did he, in this den of treason and of massacre, elevate himself above the tribe of modern legislators, and look to posterity for that palm which his better genius had wrested from Penn, and Mounier, and Sieyes. But who can attempt to paint the enthusiastic reveries of this devoted young man, who, for objects chimerical and impracticable, such as his were, had quitted his station in life, to associate with the vilest of the vile—to court danger, degradation, and death?

Among the papers found in a desk which he had used in this forlorn residence, there was one that contained the following rhapsody. "I have little time to look at the thousand difficulties which still lie between me and the completion of my wishes; that these difficulties will disappear, I have ardent, and I trust rational hopes; but if it is not to be the case, I thank God for having gifted me with a sanguine disposition. To that disposition I run from reflection, and if my hopes are without foundation; if a precipice is opening under my feet, from which duty will not suffer me to run back, I am grateful for that sanguine disposition which leads me to the brink, and throws me down, while my eyes are still raised to the vision of happiness that my fancy formed in the heavens!"

It has been already stated, that the 23d of July was fixed upon by this enthusiast to form the era of Irish liberty---on this day the capture of the castle of Dublin, and the subversion of the government and constitution of Ireland, were to take place. The date was determined by its coincidence with Saturday, when the resort of people from all parts of the country would be less liable to notice upon the general business of the markets: it was also that on which the streets would naturally be filled with labourers and handy-craftsmen, after their dismissal from work, and having been paid their weekly stipend by their employers. Another circumstance, too, promised to cloak the extraordinary assemblage of people, or bustle of active preparation on that particular day; it was the eve of the festival of St. James, on which occasion an ancient custom prevailed among the common ranks, of collecting in great numbers, in a considerable suburb of Dublin, for the purpose of repairing to the church-yard dedicated to that saint, and there dressing the burial places of their deceased relatives with flowers and other decorations, the evening being afterwards devoted to merriment.

It does not appear that the positive determination to act was communicated to the insurgents until the very previous day; even some who were considered the most resolute, and most to be depended on, were not admitted earlier into this great resolve. The failure of the former conspiracy was attributed to a minuteness of preparation---the actors in it were too eager to convince the entire public, that they were themselves the fittest persons to govern, and their proposed form of constitution was the most eligible; the present, on the contrary, chose to prove their title to be obeyed, by their audacity. They hoped to gain, on the side of concealment, more than they should lose by too anxiously bespeaking approbation, and storing up good-will; and that, at all events, by this latter mode they would advance with more security to the completion of their wishes.

On the morning of the appointed day for this momentous enterprize, unusual crowds of peasants were observed on the great southern road to Dublin, directing their hurried steps towards the capital, from all parts of the county of Kildare, which lies in that direction. The reader will recollect, that it was in the latter district that Quigley had succeeded in agitating the minds of the lower orders, and had disposed them, with very few exceptions, once more to try the fortune of rebellion. The city was filled at an early hour, and continued so during the whole day; indeed it was observed by travellers and others, that many parts of Kildare were completely emptied of their male inhabitants; women, and children, and feeble men, alone remaining in the tenements deserted by their male population.

Towards evening the populace began to assemble in vast numbers in St. James's-street, which is about a mile in length, leading from the side of the county of Kildare into the heart of the city of Dublin and its neighbourhood, without however any visible arrangement or discipline: these were, forsooth, the materials on which Mr. Emmett proposed to construct the edifice of republicanism. The next object was to arm the body thus collected: for this purpose, pikes were deliberately brought out from the store provided for them in that neighbourhood, and with unmolested regularity placed along the sides of the street for the accommodation of all who might choose to equip themselves. The inhabitants, during this dreadful and alarming scene, (the most extraordinary and unprecedented ever exhibited in a civilized country---in the metropolis---in day-light---within a mile of the residence of the chief governor; not half that distance from the barracks, where between two and three thousand men were lodged, and commanded by a most gallant, experienced, and vigilant commander-in-chief, under whom was a numerous and well-appointed staff---and in the heart of a city whose police establishment was perhaps the most expensive in Europe) were panic-struck, and seeing no prospect of succour or protection, withdrew within their houses, barred their doors and windows, and betook themselves to imploring the protection of providence, to avert from them the impending calamity.

The plot had been well concealed, its machinery was perfectly prepared, and it now only remained to be proved, whether it could be put in execution: every thing, hitherto, had favored the designs of the conspirators; henceforward, however, ultimate success entirely depended upon the conduct of that vast body they had set in motion.

Towards dusk the concerted signal that all was in readiness, was given by some men riding furiously through the principal streets; but general alarm was not excited until the firing at and severely wounding Mr. Clarke, in the midst and most frequented part of the city, had taken place; an act as audacious as it was atrocious and brutal. This gentleman, the proprietor of a considerable manufactory in the neighbourhood of Dublin, in the direction of that quarter whence the force was collected for the meditated insurrection, had previously imbibed strong suspicions of approaching tumult, from the symptoms of fever and agitation universally perceived by the most incurious observer, to prevail in the actions and manners of the lower orders, and of which he thought it his duty to apprise the lord-lieutenant's secretary. On the afternoon of this memorable day, some unusual appearances among his workmen confirmed his opinion; as he rode from town (as was his custom) to pay them off at the conclusion of the week, he met nearly their whole body proceeding to Dublin, without waiting for their wages or the accustomed hour of dismissal from work.—On questioning some of the foremost as to the cause of this extraordinary conduct, he was rudely and abruptly answered; on which, with great presence of mind, he instantly turned round and rode with the utmost expedition to the castle, to apprise government of what he had seen, and thence conjectured. Here surely was ground for active and immediate measures of precaution. His men observed this movement, and, aware of his intentions, reported the circumstance to their chiefs, who ordered them to way-lay Mr. Clarke on his return, and inflict upon him the dreadful punishment of death for this presumptuous interference: about nine in the evening, as he rode homeward, a blunderbuss was discharged at him by one of his own workmen, which must have been provided for the occasion, as the party was yet unarmed when he first spoke to them. Such was the outrage which commenced the horrors of this barbarous proceeding. Providentially, by the inexpertness of the assassin, or through some favorable but unknown circumstance, Mr. Clarke escaped with life, although desperately wounded.

About the period of this premeditated assassination, a small piece of ordnance, which had been in readiness for the purpose, was discharged, and a sky-rocket let off at the same moment, so as to be observed throughout the whole city. Mr. Emmett, at the head of his chosen band, sallied forth from the obscurity of his head-quarters in Marshalsea-lane, and drawing his sword in the street, with a flourish incited his ruffians to action; before they reached the end of the lane, in which they were arranged, a confidential member of the party discharged his blunderbuss at a person, arrayed as an officer, hastily passing along; and thus, by a base and unprovoked act of assassination, perished Colonel Brown, a most respectable and meritorious officer.

The prison for debtors being situated contiguous to the chief rendezvous of the insurgents, thither they directed their first onset, which could scarcely have any other object than that propensity to mischief which ever distinguishes the commotions of a rabble. The corporal of the ordinary guard there stationed, was inhumanly butchered, but meeting no encouragement nor succour from within, the assailants did not think fit to encounter the resistance of about twelve soldiers who stood on their defence; the unhappy inhabitants of this dreary abode called loudly for arms, to defend their prison against the ruffians by whom it was beset; wisely resolving to await rather the chance of relief from the compassion of their country, than to trust to the infuriated phrenzy of a mob.

The most vigorous attempt, or indeed the only one which could be so considered in the entire affair, was upon a few soldiers composing an outpost, who, overpowered by numbers, were put to death. A single dragoon riding on command from some of the generals on the staff of Dublin, was fired at and killed.

A guard-house of the 21st regiment lay near the scene of rising; whilst the main body that composed the guard were absent on a patrol party, a band of the insurgents approached it; but the slight resistance which the remaining men could make was sufficient to repel it. A watch-house was also attacked, but with the like success, although in this latter instance, as in the former, the men were mostly on duty.

Having wasted above an hour in those futile and ineffectual attempts, distinguished only by acts of individual atrocity, notwithstanding every effort of their leaders to direct them towards the castle, the grand object of attack; the insurgents seemed at length seriously disposed to assay that most difficult part of their enterprize, and had actually collected in an immense column, and had proceeded through James's into Thomas-street, when the attention of its rear was diverted to the arrival of an equipage, which a moment's inquiry satisfied the rebels was that of the Lord-chief-justice of Ireland. A halt was instantly called, disorder and tumult again prevailed—the heads of the advancing party immediately returned upon their steps, and the massacre of the venerable Lord Kilwarden became the sole object of this infatuated and execrable mob.

It was at this period, it is asserted, that Mr. Emmett, and the other leaders, who had been somewhat more than an hour engaged in a task far beyond their powers—that of directing effectually and with precision an armed Irish mob—retired in despair, at finding all command disregarded, all efforts to produce subordination ineffectual, and their favourite project of assailing the castle rejected, for the slightest opportunity that occurred of indulging the predatory disposition to rapine and murder of their associates! It has been urged in their favor, that shocked and disgusted at the murder of Lord Kilwarden, the chiefs instantaneously came to the resolution of abandoning their vile associates.—But if that of Colonel Brown, and of the corporal of the prison guard, had not lessened their appetite for revolution, it cannot well be conceived that the subsequent barbarities exercised towards the lord-chief-justice, would have rendered them all at once so precise and squeamish.—In effect, what must that man be, who could embark on an hostile design with a drunken, armed populace, and not calculate upon being the witness, the accomplice of every species of crime? It is very certain that the head of the advancing column never approached the castle nearer than Francis-street, which is thence distant about half a mile. The following anecdote, the authenticity of which may be depended upon, will serve to shew how little was to be apprehended from the adherence to each other in the moment of action, or from the subordination of this horde of barbarians. An inhabitant of Francis-street, as the advanced ranks proceeded in that direction, overheard from his window a leader calling out to his party "to advance," to which a reply was instantly made, with a tremendous oath, "We won't advance, you are no captain of mine, I never eat nor drank with you."

The unfortunate Lord Viscount Kilwarden had, on the day of the insurrection, retired to his country-seat, nearly four miles from Dublin, as he was accustomed to do, after having passed the week in fulfilling the duties of his exalted situation. The last judicial acts of his lordship on the morning of this calamitous day, were the liberation of confined debtors, under the provisions of an insolvent act; and the prescribing some humane regulations tending to alleviate the miseries of others of that description, who were not entitled to its benefit. His seat lay on that side of the town whence the insurgents were collected; and a degree of alarm was excited in his family towards evening by the reports which poured fast upon each other, of vast numbers of suspicious persons having been seen flocking into the city, and of their obvious intentions, which latter were indeed no longer attempted to be concealed, and must have been by that time sufficiently notorious.

Lord Kilwarden had probably, as he had advanced in years, grown somewhat timorous; but certain it is, that since the period of the outrages of 1798, he was in perpetual apprehension of being surprised and assassinated by rebels; and had not ventured, from that time till the time of his assassination, to pass a night beyond the limits of Dublin. On the first intimation of the circumstances which denoted disturbance being conveyed to him, his fears returned: his anxious mind retraced, in terrifying succession, the horrors and the audacity of the previous rebellion. It probably suggested itself to him, that the moving directly forward upon the metropolis was an argument of the greater strength, confidence, and resources of the insurgents now, than on the former occasion. His situation was likewise peculiar; as attorney-general, it had been his duty to point out numbers of the disaffected to the offended laws of their country; and, as a judge, he had ordered, in the course of his duty, many of that description for execution: he, therefore, in the event of their possessing power, however momentary had much reason to apprehend the most dismal effects from their ferocious resentment. In an evil hour, obeying the impulse given to his mind by reflections such as these, did his lordship determine to repair to Dublin for protection; and for that purpose, accompanied by his daughter and nephew, set out in a post-chaise about the dusk of the evening.

They passed unmolested and undisturbed through the solitary and deserted roads leading to the capital, and so continued until they reached the city; as indeed they would have remained, had they not quitted the country. One chance for safety yet existed. From the termination of the road on which his lordship proceeded, he might enter Dublin either by the barracks or by St. James's-street; but by the former road he would have had to pass about a mile farther than on the latter, and through a suburb thinly inhabited and little frequented; on the latter then he determined, naturally reasoning, that where there was most town there would be most safety; and, by an over-ruling fatality, directed his carriage to proceed through St. James's and Thomas-street, which were then triumphantly occupied by the insurgents! Had he providentially chosen the rejected avenue on the other side of the river, he would not have encountered the slightest interruption, nor witnessed the least appearance of disturbance: indeed, several individuals of that quarter, who had retired early to their habitations, remained in total ignorance of the dreadful events of the evening, until they were apprized of the dangers they had escaped, by the clamor of the frequent patroles, the posting of guards, and the general trepidation and panic of the next morning.

It was darker than it usually is at ten o'clock of a night in July, when the ill-fated party approached the scene of its sufferings: as it proceeded into St. James's-street, the mob had nearly evacuated it at the other extremity, and had advanced into Thomas-street, so that yet even in the town, his lordship did not experience any hostile interruption. A gentleman of no particular consideration had a few minutes before arrived in a post-chaise, and probably would have been the victim of this ferocious and insane banditti, but that the arrival of Lord Kilwarden's equipage accelerated his fate, and drew off their attention from him to an object of much greater magnitude; while the former captive, bustling unobserved through the crowd, effected his escape.

The chaise conveying the lord-chief-justice and his family was stopped about twenty yards from the entrance of Thomas-street. Lord Kilwarden immediately declared his name, and earnestly prayed for mercy; but in vain—the three individuals were dragged from the carriage, the savages exclaiming they would sacrifice Lord Kilwarden and his male companion, but must spare the lady! They then desired the latter to escape as well as she could, and permitted her to pass through their entire column without injury or interruption.

Lord Kilwarden and his nephew were then felled to the ground, of course without resistance, but still imploring for some return of humanity; the savages to whom they sued were deaf to all entreaty, and pierced them with innumerable wounds. It was afterwards stated by his lordship's servant in evidence, that the ruffians violently contended and even fought for the distinction of stabbing with their pikes the prostrate and defenceless victims!

No portion of the conduct of assassins, which makes us shudder at their unfeeling barbarity, and blush for human nature, can ever be the theme of applause; but in permitting, in the moment of blind and infuriate rage, the escape of Miss Wolfe, we may trace some of the lineaments of the native character of the country, such as it exhibited before its people were corrupted by faction, brutalized by misrule, and maddened and depraved by the influence of that combination of all vice, and the source of every popular perversion—jacobinism!

The unfortunate young lady, having run through the streets, scarcely knowing whither, fortunately reached the castle in a state, as might well be imagined, bordering on phrenzy; where she announced the situation in which she had left her father!

The body of Lord Kilwarden being found not totally bereaved of life, had been carried to a watch-house in Vicar-street, where Major Swan saw him lying on the guard-bed, dreadfully lacerated; his nephew, Mr. Wolfe, was killed on the spot. His lordship, although near expiring at the time, knew the major, and appeared perfectly in his senses. He eagerly inquired as to the fate of his daughter, and being assured by the major of her safety, he exclaimed, with an emotion of gratitude to Heaven, "thank God!" A military gentleman present, naturally filled with indignation, observed, that every man taken with a pike in his hand ought to be instantly hanged: which Lord Kilwarden overhearing, turned to Major Swan, and most impressively exhorted him "to let no man be hanged without being brought to trial!" The unfortunate chief-justice lingered in excruciating pain about two hours. He was a native of the kingdom of Ireland, and had served the crown in the usual gradations of the highest law offices. He became solicitor-general of Ireland, when Viscount Carleton was promoted to the common pleas; and he became attorney-general, on Lord Clare's accession to the seals. The Earl of Clonmell was his lordship's immediate predecessor in his last high office, that of Chief-justice of Ireland. As crown prosecutor, during a period which unfortunately called very much for the exercise of the duties of that office, he was fair, candid, and gentle; disposed to give the delinquent every reasonable advantage, and always less desirous to exaggerate guilt, than to ascertain innocence. As a judge, no man ever attempted to censure him on any ground, other than a strenuous, and what some considered in critical times, an overstrained assertion of the liberty of the subject. He was not, from his talents or attainments, calculated to extend the limits of science, or multiply the lights of his profession: but he was really what his dying expressions bespoke him, an upright honest man, who well knew how to appreciate law and justice, and whose unwearied sedulity, and long habits of the distribution of both, had fully and deeply impressed in his mind their soundest maxims.

About half past ten the rebels were in their turn severely attacked—the mighty project and elaborate preparation of Mr. Emmett and his associates; the numbers their design had assembled; the lofty conceptions they had formed; were all discomfited and dissipated in less than half an hour by two subaltern officers of the 21st regiment, each having about fifty men under his command, a peace-officer with fifteen constables, and nearly twenty unattached regular soldiers and volunteers, who had thrown themselves together under an officer employed in the recruiting service.

The 21st regiment of infantry was stationed in several occasional barracks, in that part of Dublin called "the liberty," inhabited solely by indigent manufacturers, and the workmen employed in breweries, distilleries, and other sources of employment of the same nature. In this neighbourhood was situated Mr. Emmett's headquarters; and Thomas-street, the first chosen scene of action. After the rebels had taken possession of certain streets, and had put every person in military attire to death, or severely wounded them; many other stragglers were then cut off, who were passing along in the unsuspecting confidence of security, and also some volunteers, who at these hostile appearances were anxiously repairing to the rendezvous appointed for them in cases of danger. The attack already mentioned, and the report that several soldiers had been intercepted by the mob, induced the officers at the principal barracks in "the liberty" to detach an escort for their colonel, who lodged at some little distance: Lieutenant Brady, with about fifty men, proceeding on this service, came unexpectedly upon the rear of the mob; in attempting to seize the first pike-man he met with, a shot was fired from an entry, by which some one of his soldiers was wounded; and some other instances of aggression having taken place, Lieutenant Brady gave orders to fire; in a few minutes the mob fled in every direction, and left him complete master of the scene of action. The commanding officer of the regiment, whom this party was dispatched to seek out, was the unfortunate Colonel Brown, who on the first alarm was proceeding to the quarters of his regiment, and who was, as already described, basely assassinated by an atrocious ruffian of the name of Howly, who afterwards met with that punishment he so richly merited. The light company of the same regiment was stationed in the street called the Combe, contiguous to Thomas-street; Lieutenant Douglas, who commanded it, had had the precaution to place his men under arms. A column of rebels proceeding down Thomas-street, seemed desirous to attack them, two or three shots were fired, by which some of the soldiers were hurt, and the mob then ran forward as if to charge, but on receiving a volley fell back; a second volley dispersed them, and no farther attack or resistance was experienced.

No return was ever made of the lives lost on this occasion; of soldiers and volunteers there must have been nearly twenty, and perhaps about fifty of the populace. The affair would have terminated earlier, but for the indecisive weakness of a magistrate, under whose disposal was placed the Combe party of the 21st regiment; he patrolled the streets and brought it directly on the insurgents, but refused his permission to fire, and obliged it to retreat. On his return he abandoned them and secured himself, when the officer, left to his own discretion, did his duty.

The great preparations which were observed in Marshalsea-lane, and the number of armed men who issued thence, naturally attracted a good deal of attention. Lieutenant Coultnan, of the 9th regiment, at the time accidentally in Dublin, partaking in the general alarm, collected a few men zealous and resolute like himself, some of whom were of the regiment to which he belonged, others, volunteers of the barrack division, of a serjeant and twelve men whom he met on his way, and who all put themselves under his command; the entire party proceeded to the place whence so much mischief had appeared to issue. The house and the lane adjoining it were by this time completely abandoned, Mr. Emmet and his party not having prepared any measure for its security, or provided any means of retreat to it. The passage through the lane was strewn with pikes, which marked the way to the magazine already mentioned. Lieutenant Coultnan and his party, on entering it, found the entire apparatus of rebellion: a large quantity of ball-cartridges, hand-grenades, pikes, and gunpowder; some military dresses; but above all, a proclamation, wet from the press, of persons styling themselves the provisional government, and containing their projects of a future constitution.

Mr. Emmett, after he had acted the general for the short space of an hour, finding himself either deserted by his army, or at the head of a crowd by whom his commands and even his entreaties were slighted, fled in despair and mortification from Dublin. The next morning the secret history of the depôt, of the preparations there, and of his individual share in the transaction, were become perfectly notorious. A man who had been made prisoner, (passing by the magazine on the morning of the 21st of July,) by the insurgents, and who were apprehensive of his having discovered their preparations, was saved by Emmett, contrary to the wish of the miscreants who acted with him. This person effecting his escape, on the night of the 23d, after he had been detained for two days, was able to detail with minuteness all the transactions of the place, and to describe the parties concerned. A hot pursuit was instantly commenced after the chiefs. Emmett, with twelve chosen men, had taken the road which led to the mountains adjacent to Dublin; there, for a few days, they marched about in the guise of French officers; but they received no other succour than what compassion afforded; their appearance, and the character they had assumed, created sensations which could not long be kept secret; the alarm given, a search was made in every direction. The rebel leaders found this stratagem, which was indeed as puerile as the former part of their proceedings were weak and depraved, of no use. Emmett again took refuge in Dublin, where he was quickly traced by the vigilance of the police, and committed to prison. Dowdall and Allen escaped out of the country; Redmond was arrested at Newry, as he was about to take his passage for America; Quigley, and a principal of the name of Stafford, fled into the interior of the country, and were not apprehended until after Emmett's execution.

The prisoners made on the night of the 23d, were some of the most wretched amongst the rabble. In about three weeks after the affair, an order was issued for trying all those charged with treason, and all taken in arms, and others of the like condition, against whom evidence appeared; and with Messrs. Emmett and Redmond they were severally brought to trial.

When Mr. Emmett was called upon to know if he had any thing to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, he addressed the court and jury nearly in the following terms:

"I am asked if I have any thing to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon me. Was I to suffer only death, after being adjudged guilty, I should bow in silence; but a man in my situation has not only to combat with the difficulties of fortune, but also the difficulties of prejudice; the sentence of the law which delivers over his body to the executioner, consigns his character to obloquy. The man dies, but his memory lives; and that mine may not forfeit all claim to the respect of my countrymen, I use this occasion to vindicate myself from some of the charges advanced against me.

"I am charged with being an emissary of France---tis false! I am no emissary---I did not wish to deliver up my country to a foreign power, and least of all to France. No! never did I entertain the idea of establishing French power in Ireland---God forbid! On the contrary, it is evident, from the introductory paragraph of the address of the Provisional Government, that every hazard attending an independent effort, was deemed preferable to the more fatal risk of introducing a French army into the country. Small would be our claims to patriotism and to sense, and palpable our affectation of the love of liberty, if we were to encourage the profanation of our shores by a people who are slaves themselves, and the unprincipled and abandoned instruments of imposing slavery on others:

"If such an inference be drawn from any part of the proclamation of the Provisional Government, it calumniates their views, and is not warranted by the fact. How could they speak of freedom to their countrymen? How assume such an exalted motive, and meditate the introduction of a power which has been the enemy of freedom in every part of the globe? Reviewing the conduct of France to other countries, could we expect better towards us? No! Let not, then, any man attaint my memory by believing that I could have hoped freedom through the aid of France, and betrayed the sacred cause of liberty by committing it to the power of her most determined foe: had I done so, I had not deserved to live; and dying with such a weight upon my character, I had merited the honest execration of that country which gave me birth, and to which I would have given freedom.

"Had I been in Switzerland, I would have fought against the French---in the dignity of freedom, I would have expired on the threshold of that country, and they should have entered it only by passing over my lifeless corpse. Is it then to be supposed, that I would be slow to make the same sacrifice to my native land? Am I, who lived but to be of service to my country, and who would subject myself to the bondage of the grave to give her independence---am I to be loaded with the foul and grievous calumny of being an emissary of France?

"My lords, it may be part of the system of angry justice, to bow a man's mind, by humiliation, to meet the ignominy of the scaffold; but worse to me than the scaffold's shame, or the scaffold's terrors, would be the imputation of having been the agent of French despotism and ambition; and, while I have breath, I will call upon my countrymen not to believe me guilty of so foul a crime against their liberties and their happiness.

"Though you, my lord, sit there a judge, and I stand here a culprit, yet you are but a man, and I am another; I have a right, therefore, to vindicate my character and motives from the aspersions of calumny; and, as a man, to whom fame is dearer than life, I will make the last use of that life in rescuing my name and my memory from the afflicting imputation of having been an emissary of France, or seeking her interference in the internal regulation of her affairs.

"Did I live to see a French army approach this country, I would meet it on the shore, with a torch in one hand, and a sword in the other---I would receive them with all the destruction of war! I would animate my countrymen to immolate them in their very boats; and before our native soil should be polluted by a foreign foe, if they succeeded in landing, I would burn every blade of grass before them, raze every house, contend to the last for every inch of ground; and the last spot on which the hope of freedom should desert me, that spot I would make my grave! What I cannot do, I leave a legacy to my country, because I feel conscious that my death were unprofitable, and all hopes of liberty extinct, the moment a French army obtained a footing in this land."

After some farther matter, he concluded thus:—"My lamp of life is nearly expired; my race is finished: the grave opens to receive me, and I sink into its bosom. All I request, then, at parting from this world, is the charity of its silence. Let no man write my epitaph, for as no man who knows my motives dare vindicate them, let not prejudice or ignorance asperse them; let them and me repose in obscurity and peace, and my tomb remain undescribed, till other times and other men can do justice to my character."

The foregoing is a faithful report of this unfortunate young man's exculpation of himself from the charge of co-operating with the French in any design to invade Great Britain; and whether the sincere conviction of his mind, or the imposition of pride, anxious to rescue his memory from the foul shame of having sought to deliver his country up to a foreign and a cruel enemy, he is entitled to equal credit; and if any thing were inscribed on his tomb, most honorable to himself, and atoning to his country, it is the character which he had given of the arch foe to the peace and liberty of mankind.

The court listened to him with a great deal of patience, and although indignation was visible in the countenance of every person in court, at this public avowal of his guilt, yet not a murmur was heard.

Lord Norbury, after a salutary remonstrance to the prisoner, and paying a handsome compliment to some of the respectable members of the family to which he belonged, pronounced the awful sentence of the law in cases of high-treason.

Mr. Emmett, after his trial, was taken to Newgate, where dinner had been prepared for him. He there requested to see Mr. Mac Nally, one of his counsellors in his defence. To him he made a full disclosure of all the means he had used to effect the late insurrection, and authorized him to make it known to government. He declared himself the chief mover and instigator of that attempt to effect a revolution, and solemnly denied having any associates in this country of either property or respectability. He accounted for the expenses incurred in preparations for rebellion, by stating that he had received, on the death of his father, 3,500*l.* and that he had expended of that sum, 2,500*l.* in purchasing the arms found in the depôt in Marshalsea-lane. He also denied having solicited or received any assistance from the French government, and protested, were his country invaded by Frenchmen, from his information of their principles and conduct wherever they went, that he would be one of the most zealous in the expulsion of such treacherous, rapacious, and sanguinary miscreants. At the place of execution he expressed the same sentiments.

At the time that Emmett ventured his project in the metropolis, his friend and associate, Russel, made an appeal to the passions of the peasantry in an obscure corner of the northern province. He collected together some persons, who coldly listened to his harangue, but were far from compliance with the meditated treason to which he endeavoured to incite them. In fact, these projects had lost their attraction; the enthusiasm which for some years had agitated the north of Ireland, had been permitted to subside; the animosities by which it was supported had grown languid. No attempt was made to secure the person of Russel, although some threatened him with immediate personal violence, and others went forthwith to disclose the facts to a magistrate. The catholic clergyman of the parish, who had by some means become aware of the projected rising, earnestly exhorted his people to be upon their guard against the specious delusions of the agitators. Mr. Russel, upon these inauspicious appearances, fled, but hazarded, from the place of his concealment, a proclamation (somewhat indeed more modest than that of the provisional government already alluded to) in which he stiled himself General of the Northern District; and endeavoured to seduce the people by that sort of language which, on former occasions, had become familiar to their ears, and was then probably not unacceptable. After the arrest of Emmett, Russel introduced himself clandestinely into Dublin, with a view to rescue his friend, if possible, under favor of some commotion. About two days after his arrival, it became known that some person was mysteriously secreted in the immediate vicinity of the castle. Information to this effect having been conveyed to the town-major, that officer proceeded to the examination of a house in Parliament-street, where he was found, and to whom Mr. Russel, though well armed, surrendered without resistance. It was supposed he was in this act influenced by a religious scruple. He was immediately transmitted to Downpatrick, in the north of Ireland, where he was shortly after brought to trial, and upon the clearest evidence of his treason, convicted. After his trial, he manifested all that wildness of religious enthusiasm which had for some time formed the prominent feature of his character. On conviction he addressed the court, at great length, and with remarkable firmness. He declared his adherence to the political opinions for which he was about to suffer, and touched, in a tender point, the gentlemen of the county of Down, by whom he was surrounded. These gentlemen, although latterly become more anxious to preserve their property than to enlarge the circle of their liberties, had been foremost in the outcry for parliamentary reform and political independence. Russel reminded them of this circumstance, and declared that he was doomed to suffer, for endeavouring to put into execution the lessons imbibed amongst them, and concluded by begging for a few days of life, to complete a moral work which he had in hand. The nature of this work sufficiently displayed the state of mind of its unfortunate author. It was a collection of notes, on a publication of the celebrated millenarian, Mr. Dobbs, and calculated to enforce that gentleman's interpretations of certain prophecies, which, according to him and his disciples, indicated the near approach of the millenium. It appeared, from Russel's conversation with some gentlemen who saw him shortly before his conviction, that he acted under an idea that the great political events he had already witnessed, and others he with confidence looked forward to, were parts of the great change permitted by Providence, in accomplishment of the prophecies contained in the Old Testament.

After the execution of Emmett and Russel, Quigley and Stafford were apprehended, in the county of Galway. Government was, however, satisfied by the examples which were made, and was inclined to lenity; the lives of these two, and of the other untried prisoners, were spared, on their making a full disclosure of the circumstances yet unknown of their treason.

Dwyer, and the band of outlaws whom he commanded in the county of Wicklow, struck with the impracticability of any treasonable attempt they could undertake, submitted on a similar stipulation, namely, that their lives should be spared; and thus was brought to a close whatever remained of the rebellion of 1798; and the conspiracies of that period and of 1803 were at once completely destroyed.

The Habeas Corpus act was again suspended, and Ireland at this period was under martial law.

CHAPTER IV.

State of both Countries at the Commencement of Hostilities.—Mode of Warfare adopted by each.—Attack of the lesser French West India Islands by England.—Attack of Hanover by the Army of General Mortier, which is reduced, and occupied by the Armies of the French Republic.—Navigation of English Vessels in the Elbe and Weser impeded.—Consequent Blockade of the Mouths of those Rivers by an English Squadron.—Further Violations by the French.—Ambition of Bonaparte.—His Preparations for invading England.—The Challenge fairly accepted by Great Britain.—France forces the weaker Powers to assist her.—Unjustifiable Detention of English Subjects.—St. Domingo, and other Islands, taken from the French.—Remarks.

Soon after his majesty's declaration of war, the French, as well as the British government, made every possible preparation for war. The line of hostilities, which each nation intended to pursue, could easily be foreseen, from their relative positions. Great Britain, being mistress of the seas, would naturally direct her principal attack against the colonies and maritime possessions of her enemy; while France, being equally powerful at land, was resolved to obstruct and attack the commerce of Great Britain, in Italy, Germany, and every country where her armies could penetrate: she was also strong enough to wrest from her weaker neighbours a full equivalent for any colonial loss she might incur in the approaching contest. In pursuance of the different systems of warfare, which each nation had adopted, the British government, soon after the king's message of the 8th of March, sent a strong reinforcement of troops to the West Indies; used every possible diligence in equipping her fleet; and increased considerably the defensive force of the country, by calling out the supplementary, as well as the established militia, and by accepting the services of a considerable number of volunteer corps. The exertions of government appeared, however, to be so entirely confined to measures of defence, that even the enemy observed: "It was strange that Great Britain should seek a war, merely to shew that she could put herself into a strong position of resistance." The fact, however, was, that notwithstanding the resolutions to break the 10th article of the treaty of Amiens, and the declaration of war which proceeded from the British cabinet, yet it was not prepared with a plan to commence the contest, by any grand and efficient operation; and the taking of the small islands of St. Lucie and Tobago was the utmost that the disposable force of Great Britain, in its then state of reduction, appeared equal to the achievement of: for if, in the course of the year, the colony of St. Domingo should be rescued from the French armies, that was an event which could not well be calculated upon by the English government, as it depended entirely on the courage, discipline, and perseverance of the black army.

The conduct of the French government evinced a degree of vigour widely different, both in precautionary and executive measures. A few days after the date of the message, Admiral Linois sailed from Brest, for the East Indies, with a strong squadron, having 6,000 troops on board, who were destined not only to strengthen the garrisons of the French colonies in the East, but also to put the Cape of Good Hope in such a condition as to resist any attack made upon it by Great Britain. In Europe the French armies were immediately put in motion. The army of Italy was strongly reinforced, and pushed forward a very large detachment upon Tarentum, and all the strong posts in the kingdom of Naples, which lay on the Adriatic. The French generals, charged with the execution of those orders, expressed in their proclamations, that it was necessary, while England retained Malta, France should occupy those important positions.

On the side of Germany the French government was no less active, enterprising, and daring.

M. Talleyrand, the minister of foreign affairs, had already stated, in plain terms, to Lord Whitworth, that in the event of hostilities, it was natural that a considerable army should be assembled in Holland, and on the frontiers of Hanover: and immediately subsequent to the king's message, France began to put her threat in execution. During the protracted period of the negotiation, a considerable French army was actually assembled on the threatened points, and were in perfect readiness to commence the campaign, at the moment the negotiation broke off. His majesty's declaration of war was not laid before parliament till the 18th of May, and on the 25th, the French general, Mortier, from his head-quarters at Coeverden, summoned the Hanoverian electorate to surrender to his army.

In the attack of Hanover, Bonaparte formally professed that he wished to occupy that country only as a pledge for the restoration of Malta, agreeably to the conditions of the treaty of Amiens, and endeavoured to cover this flagrant violation of the independence and constitution of the German empire, by asserting that it was merely for the purpose of compelling the King of England to maintain the peace of Amiens, that he had ordered his armies to occupy that portion of Germany, in which the present reigning family of England were peculiarly interested. Under those weak and flimsy pretences, he was suffered, without any opposition from the great continental powers, or the states of the empire, to possess himself of that country, which not only yielded him considerable plunder, but gave him a most commanding position in the North of Europe, and which materially affected the politics of the continent.

Notwithstanding that the attack on Hanover had been so long threatened, his majesty's English ministers had not taken the slightest step, either to succour his German territories, or to secure the retreat of the Hanoverian army, and thus procure a most valuable addition to the disposable force of the British empire. Hanover was completely abandoned to its own means of defence, and to the precarious intervention of the German empire; the powers of which, however, having suffered most materially, in the preceding war with France, were not at all inclined to begin another, for the sake of a state neglected and deserted as it was by its natural protector. Although it was not possible that the electorate alone could pretend to oppose itself with effect to the immense power of France, his royal highness the Duke of Cambridge was sent over thither from England, as commander-in-chief, and proclamations were published in his name, and that of the Hanoverian government, calling upon all the inhabitants capable of bearing arms, to defend their country to the last drop of their blood!

It was not to be expected that such proclamations, at such a time, could have produced any good effect; if, indeed, the inhabitants of the electorate had been previously armed and organized, they would doubtless have been able to repulse a much greater force than General Mortier commanded; but to suppose that citizens and peasants were to form effective armies, at a moment's notice, and when the enemy were just entering their country, was altogether as absurd as it was unreasonable. The Duke of Cambridge, it is true, pledged himself to share all their dangers, but his situation differed very materially from that of the Hanoverian people. In case of defeat, a frigate was always ready to carry his royal highness back to England; but for the army or inhabitants of that state, there was no retreat, after having irritated the power of France by an opposition, which must have been fruitless, while they were unsupported by any auxiliary means whatever. It was therefore not very surprising that they paid more attention to the proclamations of the French general, than to that of the English prince. General Mortier told them, in his address, that "he had heard of proclamations dictated by the blindest fury, for the purpose of drawing them into a contest, to which they ought to be strangers, and desired them to preserve themselves from an aggression equally absurd and useless, of which they alone would be the victims." To this advice the Hanoverians listened, and positively refused to rise in mass, for the purpose of opposing the French. The opposition therefore which that power experienced from the regular army of Hanover is hardly worth detailing.

On the 26th of May, the invading army entered the town of Bentheim, where the Hanoverian garrison, consisting of an officer and thirty-six men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. On the 28th, the French force passed the river Ems, at Mippen; and the next day a body of 10,000 entered the principality of Osnaburgh, which had been evacuated by the Hanoverians. The main body of the latter, commanded by Gen. Walmoden, and amounting to near 18,000 regulars, appeared determined to make a stand in their positions on the Hunte; and General Hammerstein occupied the town of Diepholtz, with a considerable force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. The French immediately prepared to dislodge them; a division of their infantry, under the command of General Schiner, and another of cavalry, under the orders of General Nansouty, forced the passage of the Hunte, and directed their march to Sublingen, with a view of cutting off whatever force might be stationed between that town and Diepholtz. General Hammerstein, finding his right turned by this manœuvre, was obliged to retreat in the night, to Borstoen. On the 1st of June, there was a smart skirmish between a Hanoverian rear-guard and the French advanced pickets. On the 2d, notwithstanding a severe cannonade from the Hanoverian army, General Drouet, who commanded the French advanced army, attacked them, and after a charge of cavalry, obliged them to retire.

The river Weser was now the last line of defence for the Hanoverian army; the banks of it were well planted with artillery, and it appeared as if the passage of it would be attended with some difficulty. The town of Nieubourg was the Hanoverian head-quarters, against which General Mortier was in full march, when a deputation arrived from the civil and military authorities of the regency of Hanover, to intreat him to suspend his march; which he positively refused, until they had signed a convention, agreeing to put him in possession of the entire electorate, and all the strong places dependent upon it, together with all the artillery, arms, and ammunition. The Hanoverian army were, by the conditions of this convention, to retire behind the Elbe, and to engage not to serve during the war, against France or her allies, until regularly exchanged. The terms of the convention were, however, conditional, depending entirely on the ratification of it by the first consul and his Britannic majesty. It was evident, however, that his majesty could not ratify this convention, as King of Great Britain; and as Elector of Hanover, it would have amounted almost to a renunciation of his sovereignty were he to consent to such terms.

On the 5th of June, the French were in possession of Hanover, where they found a prodigious quantity of artillery and ammunition. Besides the absolute value of the electorate as a conquest, which enabled them to remount their cavalry, and recruit their treasury, the French were now masters of the navigation of the Elbe and Weser, and were determined to use their power there to the injury of the British commerce in Germany. Being in the immediate neighbourhood of the rich commercial Hanse Towns of Hamburgh and Bremen, they were also enabled, under the shape of loans, to levy considerable sums of money upon them; and were the continental powers patient, under this outrageous violation of the German empire, there seemed but little prospect of the possibility of limiting their future encroachments. Under all those circumstances, there can be no doubt, but that the conquest of Hanover was a most important and advantageous acquisition to France, which she had been allowed to make without the slightest opposition from the English government.

The real value of Hanover was not generally known or understood, until France had possessed herself of it. It had always been one of the vulgar prejudices of the English nation, (there were occasionally also ministers to be found, who, in order to court popularity, gave it their support,) that Hanover was rather to be considered as a clog and an incumbrance to Great Britain, than an advantageous possession: but when it was seen how eager France was to ease his majesty of that incumbrance, the tide of popular opinion ran the contrary way; and, whether with respect to the honor or interest of the nation, the great majority of the people began to think that it should have been defended and maintained.—The conquest of Hanover was undoubtedly of the utmost consequence to France, at the same time that it limited her conquests in the course of the year.

Bonaparte endeavoured to push the effects of this acquisition to the utmost possible extent, by aiming at the destruction of the commercial navigation of the British merchant vessels on the rivers Elbe and Weser. A measure which his generals excused by the contemptible sophistry, that as the fortune of war had given them the occupation of the King of England's dominions in Hanover, it could not be expected that British ships would be allowed to pass within the reach of a French battery. If this principle were admitted, it followed that they had gained on the same principle a right to prevent British vessels from going up to Hamburgh or Bremen. The British government, however, with becoming resolution, would by no means admit of this reasoning. They laid it down as a principle, that the conduct of France, in the invasion of Hanover, was an unauthorized and outrageous violation of the independence of the German empire; that it would be an act of hostility in Germany to permit British vessels to be fired at or captured when navigating in the ports and rivers of Germany; and, therefore, (retaliating in some measure on the empire, for not having defended Hanover) took ample measures that the mouths of the Elbe and Weser should be strictly blockaded by British squadrons, and no vessels allowed to pass, so long as British vessels were excluded from their navigation.

The Hanse Towns of Hamburgh and Bremen were now placed in a most deplorable and distressing situation. By the blockade of their harbours, their foreign trade was cut off, while the neighbourhood of the French armies placed them in perpetual danger of military violence and exaction. In this situation they applied to the King of Prussia, as guarantee and protector of the neutrality of the north of Germany; but the cabinet of Berlin, either entering into the views of France, or under the impression of its vast and irresistible power, refused to interfere, and thus were abandoned all the smaller states of the north of Germany to the mercy and discretion of the French government.

The terms of the convention at Sublingen had placed the French general in possession of the whole of the electorate of Hanover lying on the south side of the river Elbe, the Hanoverian army having retired across the Elbe to the duchy of Lauenburgh: but as this convention was only conditional, and required to be ratified by the British and French governments, so soon as it was known in Paris, that the courier had arrived, announcing his Britannic majesty's refusal to ratify it, Bonaparte sent express orders to his generals to re-commence the campaign. General Mortier thereupon sent a letter to Field-marshal Count Walmoden, the Hanoverian general, informing him, that the refusal of his Britannic majesty to ratify the convention had rendered it null and void. He therefore sent him a fresh proposition, to surrender with his army prisoners of war, to be sent into France. The field-marshal replied, that those terms were so very humiliating, that his army preferred perishing with their arms in their hands; that they had already made sufficient sacrifices for their country; and that they must now defend their own honor. The officer, however, who carried this answer, was empowered to state, that if any acceptable terms were offered, they would probably not be rejected. General Mortier refused to make any other propositions, and immediately prepared to cross the Elbe in the face of the Hanoverian army, who had taken a strong position on the banks of the river, which was well defended with artillery. But General Walmoden seeing that the French army was determined to force its passage, sent new propositions, which were at length agreed to, and on the 5th of July a convention was settled, by which the Hanoverian army was to be disbanded, and return to their homes upon their parole, not to serve against France or her allies until regularly exchanged; and its artillery, horses, and military stores, were to be given up to the French. General Mortier, in his letter to the first consul, said, that "it was only from generosity to an enemy imploring clemency, that he granted those terms; that General Walmoden signed the capitulation with an afflicted heart; and that it was difficult to paint the situation of the fine regiment of the King of England's guards at dismounting."

The French government, in possessing themselves of Hanover, professed, in a laboured manifesto, that it was their intention to retain it merely as a pledge for the restitution of Malta, and trusted by that pretence to prevail on the other powers of Germany to look with indifference on this invasive violation of the independence and integrity of the empire. The apathy of those powers encouraged the French to the levying large contributions upon the Hanse Towns, and to commit farther encroachments on the German territory. The Prince Regent of Denmark had, indeed, upon the first news of the march of the French army, advanced a considerable body of troops into Holstein; but after the conquest of Hanover, it was intimated to him, that the French government saw with displeasure preparations which appeared hostile and menacing; in consequence of which he thought it advisable to withdraw his army, and Hanover, and the adjacent country, remained in the undisputed possession of France.

The aggressions of Bonaparte were not, however, confined to Germany, under the pretext of retaining pledges for Malta: notwithstanding the conditions of the separate peace with Naples, a considerable French army was in motion to occupy all the Neapolitan ports on the Adriatic, and particularly the town and port of Tarentum, to which Bonaparte had always attached vast importance, and which in the negotiations with Lord Whitworth, it appeared the French government considered as an equivalent for Malta. Ancona, and the principal possessions of the pope on that sea, were seized on by the French army at the same time. And now the moment was arrived, when the avowed system of France in her war with England might be developed, and be put in execution, namely, first, to increase her strength and reinforce her treasury, by the possession and plunder of the weaker states in her neighbourhood; and, finally, to apply her whole collected strength and resources to the invasion and conquest of Great Britain. In was to this darling object of his ambition that Bonaparte applied the large sums which he had obtained from America for the sale of Louisiana, those from Portugal as the price of peace, and the contributions from Spain, Italy, and the Hanse Towns either in the shape of military levy or of loan.

From the very commencement of the war, every preparation was made to carry into effect the menace which he had thrown out to Lord Whitworth of invading England. Independently of his grand fleet at Brest, which was presumed to be destined for the invasion of Ireland, an immense number of transports was ordered to be built, and collected with the greatest expedition. The success of the Spanish gun-boats off Algeziras, during the preceding war, had made the French believe that it would be possible for some thousands of similarly constructed vessels, but built on an improved plan, to force their way across the channel in spite of the British navy. This idea was universally received in France, and in the course of the year such astonishing exertions were made, that a sufficient flotilla was assembled at Boulogne, to carry over any army that France should choose so to employ. This menacing disposition, and the mighty preparations for carrying it into effect, were perhaps ultimately advantageous to Great Britain. The evident necessity of defending the country against invasion obtained a ready consent to every plan which could be proposed for increasing its military defence. Independently of the regular and supplementary militia, an additional army of 50,000 men was proposed, under the title of an army of reserve, and a general levy en masse of all persons capable of bearing arms, was universally approved of: this measure was however rendered unnecessary by the spirit of the country, which in a short time presented above 300,000 effective volunteers, as an additional defence to the country. This vast reinforcement to its military strength, placed it on so proud a footing of security, that the English nation no longer feared the visit of their invaders, but felt so conscious of their strength as rather to wish the enemy to try that experiment.

Notwithstanding the menaces of the French government, which boasted that an immense flotilla could be assembled at Boulogne without much interruption from the English cruisers, the people of Great Britain appeared perfectly tranquil. Indeed, the latter nation fairly accepted the challenge thrown out by France, as her government had pompously and arrogantly asserted that she was no longer able to contend single-handed against her. The British government, in justice it must be said, wished that the war should solely exist between Great Britain and France. The latter (though the challenger) found it necessary, meanly to force the weaker powers to engage in her assistance. Holland, contrary to her evident interest and wish, as well as the Italian republic, were compelled to become parties; and consequently while the commercial interests of the latter were severely injured in the course of the year, the former lost all her West Indian colonies: Spain and Portugal were likewise compelled to furnish pecuniary assistance to France, in so open and extensive a manner, that it rested entirely with the generosity and magnanimity of Great Britain, whether they should not be considered as involved in direct acts of hostility.

Independently of these measures, which the French government embraced as part of its war system, it took a step at its commencement which had never before been heard of among civilized nations, and which had always been protested against as an act of barbarity, disgraceful even at Constantinople or Algiers. Under the pretence of making prisoners of war of those Englishmen enrolled in the militia of their country, it seized indiscriminately upon all the nobility, gentry, and commercial agents who had incautiously put themselves within the reach of Bonaparte in France, and who were engaged in travelling in any of those countries occupied by the French armies, and either shut them up in prisons, or confined them to particular places as prisoners of war upon their parole, and who were not to exceed the limits there assigned them! This violent outrage on all the established courtesies of civilized nations, did not promise even the slightest advantage to France, and could only be considered as an angry and capricious display of the power and ill-humour of the usurper who had seized upon its government: this act of wanton cruelty was farther aggravated, by its having been preceded by a perfidious promise to the English, that they should enjoy the protection of the government after the departure of the British ambassador, as extensively as during his residence. Those were the principal measures taken by France in the first year of the war.

On the part of Great Britain, her first object was to raise the military strength of the country from the deplorable state to which it had been reduced, and to lay a foundation for its permanent defence, without being obliged to have recourse to excessive loans; and, secondly, to annoy her enemies as much as possible, both in their colonies and commerce. In the first object, the government were successful beyond its most sanguine hopes and expectations.

No territorial acquisition she could have made, would have so far raised Great Britain in the estimation of foreign nations, as the zeal and courage which was exhibited by all ranks to defend the country from French invaders. The power of France, for the first time since the revolution, appeared to have received the most serious check; and the British channel seemed a barrier beyond which it could not pass.

Although the additional strength which was gained at home was by far the most important of the advantages which Great Britain derived from the war, yet the government was not altogether inattentive to the annoyance of the enemy in the only vulnerable part of his dominions. Expeditions against the Dutch settlements of Demerara and Essequibo, and the French islands of St. Lucie and Tobago were dispatched in the course of the year. St. Domingo, the most valuable colony that France ever possessed, was wrested from her by the black population, assisted by a British squadron; and in the East Indies the successes of Great Britain over the native princes were brilliant, glorious, and decisive.

The reduction of the French army in the island of St. Domingo was beyond all question the severest blow which France sustained in the course of the year. It had been entirely owing to the facilities which her shipping afforded, of passing troops rapidly from one strong post or town on the coast to another, that France was at all able to keep down the insurrection in that island; those facilities, however, being entirely taken away by the superiority of the English blockading squadrons, all those positions fell, one after the other, to the insurgent army, and General Rochambeau, and the remains of that great army which had been judged fully sufficient to reconquer the colony, were necessitated to surrender prisoners of war to the naval force of Britain. By this event the sanguine hopes which Bonaparte had entertained of restoring to France the most valuable of her foreign possessions, was completely frustrated.

St. Domingo was not the only loss which France sustained in the West Indies. The islands of St. Lucie and Tobago were also wrested from her. The expedition which was prepared for the attack of those colonies, sailed from Barbadoes on the 20th of June, and arrived at day-break, on the 21st, off St. Lucie; in the course of the day they effected their landing, drove in the advanced posts of the enemy, took the town of Castries, and summoned the French general Nogues to surrender at discretion. That officer, however, refusing to accede to those terms, Lieutenant-general Grinfield, who commanded the expedition, resolved upon attacking the Fort of Morne Fortunee by assault, as the rainy season was soon expected to commence. The attack was made the next morning at four o'clock, and the place was carried in the most gallant manner in about half an hour, without much loss, if the boldness of the enterprise be considered. That on the British side, was about 138 men killed and wounded, including some officers. The number of the French garrison made prisoners of war amounted to 640. Besides the possession of a valuable sugar island, this victory was important in many points of view. In the first place, the storming so gallantly a fort strongly garrisoned by the French, proved again to the world that French troops were not invincible; and that the same armies which beat them in Egypt could conquer them again in any part of the world. At the same time that it established the reputation of the British army for gallantry and spirit, it was attended by a circumstance that displayed that generosity of national character, which is inseparable from true courage. The French general had refused a capitulation; he was determined to abide the assaults; and although it might be supposed that conquering troops, provoked by the losses which the obstinacy of the enemy exposed them to, would have revenged themselves by a bloody victory, yet, to the honor of the British name, notwithstanding the extent of the provocation, they did not kill or wound a single Frenchman after the works had been carried. This was a triumph worthy of a civilized nation, and the brilliant display of British gallantry and generosity on this occasion was of infinitely more importance than even the capture of St. Lucie.

This first success of the British, was of a nature to excite respect and admiration from those great powers of Europe that remained anxious spectators of the contest between France and England; while the successes of France in Hanover could only be considered by them as a daring violation of the territories of an independent and neutral nation, and an alarming proof of the disregard with which Bonaparte viewed his most solemn treaties.

On the 1st of July the island of Tobago surrendered to General Grinfield, who, after the conquest of St. Lucie, directed his force thither. The garrison were too feeble to oppose any resistance, and therefore immediately proposed a capitulation, in virtue of which they were to be sent over to France at the expense of Great Britain. Beside the French islands of St. Lucie and Tobago, in the West Indies, the Dutch settlements of Berbice and Demarara fell into the hands of the British in the course of the present year, but without experiencing any resistance worth a particular detail.

When two nations such as France and England were at war, it might naturally be expected that each would have recourse not only to every measure of serious annoyance, but also to such as might afford matter of temporary triumph; of the latter nature may be reckoned the successes of the British arms in the West Indies.

By treachery to the brave Toussaint (as related in the preceding book), Bonaparte had acquired St. Domingo; and, previously to the recommencement of hostilities with England, the first consul appeared determined to establish a colonial power both in St. Domingo and Louisiana, which would bid fair not only to out-rival the British empire in the West Indies, but also to check the rising greatness of the United States of America. These objects were entirely deranged and defeated by the rupture with England; his plan of possessing himself of Egypt and the Levant, had been also crushed by the constant superiority of the British fleet in the Mediterranean. The views of the first consul therefore necessarily took a different direction, and he sought to establish his power on other grounds. He made himself the absolute master of Italy, and shewed the Kings of Naples, Etruria, and the pope, that no treaties could bind him to respect their neutrality, or would prevent him from entering and occupying their territories whenever he pleased, and of levying contributions upon them, the measure of which should be alone determined by a compromise between their ability and his extortive rapacity. Spain and Portugal were reduced to the state of provinces, on which he could at pleasure levy what sums of money he deemed necessary, and at the same time enjoy all the advantages of their great possessions in Southern America, without

No circumstance could evince more clearly the power that Bonaparte had, and meant to retain, over Germany, than the invasion and occupation of Hanover. Austria and Prussia contented themselves with demanding explanation upon those points; to which the answer of the French government was, that it was solely the possessions of the King of England which were attacked, but that in other points the integrity and independence of the German empire should be respected. The Emperor of Germany affected to be content with this explanation, as he was in no condition to war with France about Hanover, a country which had preserved its neutrality when he and the German empire were in the greatest difficulty and danger. The King of Prussia also, whatever discontent he might feel, professed also to be satisfied: that monarch well knew, that the first consul would by no means abandon his plan, on account of any remonstrances he could make, and he therefore did not choose to irritate him by a fruitless opposition. It must, however, have been very galling to that monarch to find, that the power of France had so soon stripped him of the title which, while it suited the convenience of Bonaparte, he was pleased to allow him, that of "Protector of the north of Germany." From the moment that the French army had entered Hanover, he perceived, as did the lesser states of the empire, that there was no power at hand to rescue the latter from the grasp of France. In vain did the imperial city of Hamburgh appeal to his protection, and to that of the head of the empire, when the French occupied Cuxhaven, and had demanded a considerable loan from them: no relief was obtained, or even a remonstrance issued, upon that unwarrantable proceeding.

Thus circumstanced, the government of Denmark was the only neighbouring power which displayed the slightest spirit. The prince royal speedily collected an army of 30,000 men in Holstein, and took vigorous measures to defend his territories; but when he found that Prussia had acquiesced in the encroachments of France, and that the official journal of Bonaparte had begun to threaten Denmark herself in unequivocal terms, unless she immediately dispersed the army of Holstein, the prince royal found himself (though reluctantly) compelled to submit to the imperious and over-ruling necessity of the case, and his German states were again placed on a peace establishment.

Although Russia was intimately connected with the interests of the north of Europe, and must doubtless have felt much displeased at the advance of the French army, and the violation of the Germanic empire, of which she was the guarantee, yet the Emperor Alexander was so pacifically disposed, as not to consider that aggression of France as an immediate ground of war. Bonaparte had solemnly alleged, that he only occupied Hanover in order to induce the King of England to give up Malta, agreeably to the conditions of the treaty of Amiens. The emperor, who eagerly wished for the restoration of peace, would probably have been glad that England could by any means have been induced to execute that article which respected the island of Malta. The British government had however most imprudently rested the war entirely upon the possession of that island. The great and continually increasing aggrandizement of France; the violence and outrages committed by her, daily, against the independence of every nation in Europe; and her continued insult and injury to Great Britain, were all to be forgiven, if she would consent that the latter power might retain the possession of Malta. It was not at all surprising therefore that the nations of Europe evinced the most profound indifference upon the subject of the island of Lampedosa, or even of that of Malta. There were but three nations in the world that would have wished to be troubled with the possession of either, namely, England, France, and Russia. To any of these nations the possession of the latter island would be an important object, as the means of increasing or establishing their power in the Mediterranean: and Russia having evidently wished and demanded the possession of Malta for herself, it could not be expected that she would be very sanguine in her efforts to procure it for England.

As therefore England had embarked in war, on a ground in which the continental powers could feel no interest; and as it was evident that the neutral nations would be obstructed and cramped in their commercial relations, as well in the prosecution of this as in every former war, it was natural for them to wish that a peace might be concluded upon any terms; and as Bonaparte professed solely to desire the execution of the treaty of Amiens, they were content to allow him to occupy Hanover as the means of compelling Great Britain to fulfil her engagements.

The real views of France, however, were soon more perfectly developed. The army of Hanover was but the advanced guard of that vast force which she could rapidly move into the heart of Prussia, or any northern nation that should resist her will. The armies at Boulogne and in Holland were in reality as formidable to the north of Europe as to England. In Italy, her armies had entered the kingdom of Naples, occupied all the strong places on its eastern coasts, and levied contributions throughout the whole country: at once a most flagrant violation of direct treaty with that power, and also a manifest insult to Russia. From the moment that Bonaparte had ascertained that nothing was to be apprehended from either Austria or Prussia, he evinced the greatest indifference towards the court of Petersburg, and behaved with marked inattention and incivility to its ambassador, Count Markoff. With respect to his solemn engagements formerly entered into with that power, he paid to them not the slightest regard. It had been agreed by treaty between Russia and France, that the affairs of Italy should be settled by those two nations in concert; that the King of Sardinia should have a compensation for the loss of Piedmont; and that the independence of the kingdom of Naples should be completely respected. On all those points Bonaparte evinced marked disregard, and by the conduct of Sebastiani, at Corfu, proved that it was his intention to dispossess the emperor of these islands. So many provocations and insults undoubtedly must have deeply affected the mind of Alexander: the year, however, was permitted to pass over, without any decided opposition to France, from him or any of the continental powers.

The attitude of Europe at the close of 1803, may be thus stated:—While France was extending her giant arms from the Adriatic to the Baltic, and scorned to bound her dominions on the north by the Rhine, or even the Elbe; Germany seemed lost in apathy, or the sluggishness of despair! Italy was directly governed as a province of France; while Spain, Portugal, and the Hanse Towns, were necessitated to furnish such contributions in money as were demanded by the French government.

Arrived at this height of power and military glory, there was no greater object left for the ambition of Bonaparte, than the conquest of England. But vast as his fortune had hitherto been, when opposed to the continental powers of Europe, it seems to have been constantly kept in check by the better genius of England. In Syria, in Egypt, in Malta, and in St. Domingo, he had constantly found the greatest and most promising of his ambitious projects rendered abortive by the valour of the British arms. It is not then to be wondered at, that he should strain every nerve, and risk every danger, to destroy the only nation which had the will and the power to oppose him. But the exertions and means employed for the invasion of England only served to raise the spirit of the British nation, to defend their coasts and chastise an insolent invader.

THE great concessions subscribed to by the British cabinet, in concluding the treaty of Amiens, appeared to have misled Bonaparte. The inference drawn by his overbearing mind, was, that the spirit of Great Britain was so far broken, as to suffer his arrogance and ambition to range uncontrolled; but, finding that England was not so far reduced as implicitly to acquiesce in all his projects, or base enough to participate in them, as he had more than once ventured to suggest, he considered the existing peace as an obstacle to his further aggrandizement, and that a rupture, which he might ascribe to the bad faith and ill-will of Great Britain towards France, would furnish him with a more specious pretext, and more ample means, to consummate his views. By such an event, the French people would again be thrown into a state of uncertainty and dismay, which would the better enable him to increase his personal influence and authority, by the augmentation of his various establishments, civil and military; whilst all murmurs would be silenced by the dread of the revival of those sanguinary scenes which had occurred during the course of the revolution, and to which, it was very generally feared, the overthrow, or the weakening of the existing government, might lead.

These apprehensions were adroitly inculcated, and kept alive by his partisans, whilst the vigilance and indefatigable attention of the supreme head of the government were loudly proclaimed on all occasions. The minister of the interior concluded his speech to the legislative body, on the opening of their session of the year 1804, in the following terms:—

The flourishing state of France was portrayed in the most captivating colours in the official report laid before the legislative body. It was there represented, that although the republic had been forced to change her attitude, her situation was in no respect deteriorated, and that the consciousness of her strength was a sure pledge of her prosperity; that the internal tranquillity of the country had not been disturbed since the torch of war had been rekindled by a jealous enemy; that the public indignation against that enemy was as much increased as the devotion to the first consul; that all danger of internal divisions was at an end, in despite of every effort made by the English to promote them. In short, that the war had not even interrupted the plans formed for a time of peace, such as the construction of roads, canals, bridges, and harbours, and objects of a similar nature; and that the government had pursued, with constancy, every measure that tended to establish the constitution, in conformity to the genius and wishes of the citizens, so as to attach all interests and all hopes to its duration; that the finances were in a most thriving condition, and the revenues collected with the greatest facility; that public credit had maintained itself in the midst of shocks of war, and that the sinking fund fulfilled, with constancy and fidelity, its destination; that out of two hundred millions (of livres), which might have been captured by the enemy, more than two-thirds had been saved; that the Hanoverian army, to the amount of 25,000 men, had laid down their arms to them, and that their cavalry had been remounted at the expense of a possession dear to the King of England, and which would be a security in their hands of the justice which he would hereafter be obliged to render them; that France would never acknowledge less advantageous conditions than those of the treaty of Amiens; and, finally, that the most perfect harmony subsisted between France and the United States, Helvetia, Italy, the Ottoman empire, and that the tranquillity given to the continent, by the treaty of Luneville, was secured by the last proceedings of the diet of Ratisbon.

Such was the substance of the report made by the government, and which was well calculated (allowing its truth to remain undisputed) to tranquillize the minds of the French people, and inspire them with a firm reliance on their ruler. But, admitting the general truth of this statement, and forgetting for a moment, that, in all similar publications, every unfavorable circumstance is suppressed, it might be presumed, that the source of so much national prosperity, like the overflow of a mountain torrent, might be but of short duration. The whole of this flattering representation being founded upon the supposition, that the pecuniary resources of France were adequate to the maintenance of the various establishments therein mentioned, without touching upon the additional expenses occasioned by the war, it should be observed, that extraordinary funds, to the amount of 150 millions tournois, (about 6,250,000*l.* sterling) had been received, in the course of the preceding year, from contributions levied on the United States, Hanover, the Hanse Towns, Spain, and Portugal; independently of which aid, nearly a fourth part of the French army was maintained at the expense of Italy, Holland, and Hanover. As France was thus aggrandizing herself at the expense of other powers, it behoved Europe, for the happiness of the world at large, to prevent this from being a permanent revenue.

While France was thus lulled into credulity by the artifice of Bonaparte, an event occurred which materially contributed to accelerate the completion of his projects.

Early in the month of February, a plot was detected, the object of which seemed to have been the overthrow of the government. The principal persons implicated in it, were General Pichegru, Georges Cadoudal, formerly a leader of the insurgents in Brittany, Lajollais, a confidant of the former, and several other individuals attached to the latter. It likewise appeared that General Moreau had, to a certain extent, entered into the views of Pichegru, and had had some secret interviews with him since his return to Paris. It was also positively asserted, that the conspirators had come to the resolution of making away, in the first instance, with Bonaparte.

The first intimation of this intrigue is said to have been given by a confidential agent of the parties, who had been arrested near Calais, on his return from England.

Lajollais, Moreau, and several others, were hereupon arrested; but Pichegru and Georges, though known to be at Paris, found means, for a short time, to screen themselves from the researches of the police.

On the 17th of February, the following report, relative to this conspiracy, was made to the government, by the grand judge, minister of justice:

“ Citizen First Consul !

“ New plots have been hatched by England; this was the case even amidst the peace which she swore to maintain, and when she violated the treaty of Amiens, she counted less on her strength than on the success of her machinations. But government was vigilant; the steps of the agents of the enemy were followed by the eye of justice: the people of London were no doubt expecting to hear the explosion of that mine which had been dug under our feet. At any rate, the most ominous reports were spread, and they were indulging the most criminal hopes; on a sudden the agents of the conspiracy were arrested; proofs have accumulated, and they are so strong and so evident, that they carry with them conviction to every mind. Georges and his band of assassins had remained in the pay of England; their agents were still traversing La Vendée, Morbilian, the Côtes du Nord, and were endeavouring, but in vain, to find partisans, of whom they were deprived by the moderation of government and of the laws. Pichegru, unmasked by the events which preceded the 18th Fructidor, year 5, (Sept. 5, 1797,) and unveiled, in particular, by that correspondence which General Moreau had addressed to the directory, had carried with him to England his hatred against his country. In the year 8, he and Villot were in the train of the armies of our enemies, in order to unite with the brigands of the south. In the year 9, he conspired with the committee of Barreuth, and since the peace of Amiens he has still been the hope and the counsellor of the enemies of France. The British perfidy associated Georges with Pichegru, the infamous Georges, with that Pichegru whom France had esteemed, whom she wished for a long time to consider as incapable of treachery! In the year 11, a criminal reconciliation united Pichegru and Moreau, two men between whom honor ought to place eternal hatred. The police seized at Calais one of their agents, at the moment when he was returning a second time from England. This man had in his possession documents which confirmed the reality of a reconciliation at that time inexplicable, had not the bonds which united them been formed by criminality. On the arrest of this agent, General

Moreau appeared for a moment to be agitated. He took some private steps to ascertain whether government was informed of it; but it was passed over in silence, and he himself, when he recovered his tranquillity, concealed from government an event which could not but awaken its vigilance. He observed silence even when Pichegru was publicly admitted into the councils of the British ministry, when he united in a notorious manner with the enemies of France. Government was disposed to consider his silence as arising from the dread of a confession, which would have humbled him, as it considered his retirement from public affairs, his suspicious connections, and his imprudent language, as the effect of peevishness and discontent. General Moreau, who could not fail of being suspected, since he maintained a secret correspondence with the enemies of his country, and who, in consequence of this suspicion, which was too well founded, would at any other period have been arrested, was suffered to enjoy in tranquillity his honors, an immense fortune, and the kindness of the republic. Events, however, rapidly succeeded each other: Lajollais, the friend and confidant of Pichegru, went privately from Paris to London, returned to Paris, carried to Pichegru the ideas of General Moreau—carried back to Moreau the ideas and designs of Pichegru and his associates; the brigands of Georges were preparing, even in Paris, every thing that was necessary for the execution of their common designs. A place was assigned between Dieppe and Treport, at a distance from molestation or the eye of vigilance, where the brigands of England, brought over in English ships, landed without being observed, and where they found corrupted men to receive them—men paid to conduct them during the night from fixed stations, previously agreed on, and thus to convey them to Paris. At Paris lurking-places were procured for them in houses hired before-hand, where they had confidants to protect them: they had some of these in different quarters and streets at Chaillot, in the Rue de Bacq, in the Fauxbourg St. Marceau, in the Marais. A first debarkation was effected, consisting of Georges himself, and eight of his brigands. Georges returned to the coast to assist at the landing of Coster St. Victor, condemned by a sentence passed in the affair of Nivôse 3, and of ten other brigands. In the commencement of the present month a third landing was effected; it consisted of Pichegru, Lajollais, Armand, Gaillard, brother of Raould, John Marie, one of the first confidants of Georges, and some other brigands of the same stamp.—Georges with Joyau, called d'Assar, Saint Vincent and Picot, went to receive this third debarkation: the whole assembled at the farm de la Poterie. A fourth landing was expected; the vessels were in sight, but contrary winds prevented them from approaching; a few days ago, they were still making signals. Georges and Pichegru arrived at Paris, where they lodged in the same house, surrounded by about thirty brigands, under the command of Georges; an interview took place between them and Moreau: the place, the day, and the hour, where the first conference was held, are known—a second was agreed on, but did not take place; a third and a fourth took place, even in the house of General Moreau. The presence of Georges and Pichegru at Paris, these conferences with General Moreau, are confirmed by incontestable and numerous proofs. Georges and Pichegru have been traced from house to house. Search has also been made for those who assisted at their landing: those who, under the cloud, conducted them from post to post; those who gave them an asylum at Paris; their confidants and accomplices. Lajollais, their principal agent, and General Moreau, are arrested; the effects and papers of Pichegru have been seized, and the police is employing the greatest activity to find him. England wishes to overthrow our government, and by this overthrow to effect the ruin of France, to deliver it up to ages of civil war and confusion. But to overturn a government, maintained by the affection of thirty millions of citizens, and surrounded by a brave, powerful, and faithful army, was a task not only superior to the strength of England, but of all Europe. England, therefore, had no hopes of accomplishing her design, but by the assassination of the first consul, and by covering this assassination under the shadow of a man who was still protected by the remembrance of his services. I must add, that the citizens need be under no uneasiness. The greater part of the brigands have been arrested; the rest have fled, and are closely pursued by the police. No suspicion attaches to any class of citizens, or to any branch of administration. I shall not give any further details in this report; you have seen all the papers; you will, therefore, give orders for their being laid before the eyes of justice.

“H. B. MARET.”

This paper having been read to the tribunate, the president, after making a few observations on the subject, concluded by declaring, in the name of the assembly, that they would be responsible for the life of Bonaparte, which secured to France her glory and her prosperity. He then proposed that the tribunate should, in a body, wait on the first consul, in order to express their detestation of the meditated attempt, and to congratulate him on his escape from the threatened danger.

Hereupon, the brother of General Moreau, who was a member of this body, testified his deep concern to find that endeavours had been made to traduce a man who had rendered such important services to the republic, and who was deprived of the liberty of exculpating himself. He made a solemn declaration of his brother's innocence, and demanded that he should be brought to trial before an ordinary tribunal, for he could easily make it appear, that the accusation against him was an infamous calumny.

It was said, in reply, that the defence of General Moreau should have all the latitude, liberty, and publicity of which so important a cause was susceptible.

Deputations from the senate, the legislative body, and the tribunate waited accordingly on the first consul, and, in terms of strong indignation, deprecated the conspiracy which had been revealed: attributed it to the instigation of England, and exhorted him to pay greater attention than his natural courage prompted him to do, to his personal safety, which was so inseparably connected with that of the nation. The most memorable passage in those addresses is the following, used by Joubert, president of the tribunate.

“While we imagined, citizen first consul, that you had nothing to dread but the dangers of legitimate war, the perfidy of the English government surrounded you with new snares. What a humiliating avowal of its inability to combat with open arms the repairing genius of France!!!”

Bonaparte replied to these addresses, that, “Since he had attained the chief magistracy, many plots had been formed against his life. Educated in camps, he never regarded, as important, dangers which caused in him no fear.—But he could not avoid experiencing a serious and painful feeling, when he reflected on the situation in which that great nation would have been involved, had this last conspiracy succeeded: for it was principally against the glory, the liberty, and the destiny of the French people that it was planned. He had long since renounced the hope of enjoying the pleasures of private life. All his days were employed in fulfilling the duties which his fate and the will of the French people had imposed upon him. Heaven would watch over France, and defeat the stratagems of the wicked. The citizens might be free from alarm—his life would continue as long as it should be of utility to the nation. But he wished the French people to understand, that without their confidence and affection existence would be to him without consolation, and to them without an object.”

These measures were accompanied by communications to the same effect, issued in general orders to the French armies, and were followed, of course, by corresponding addresses.

That from the sailors, composing what was styled the right wing of the national flotilla, concluded thus:

“Citizen first consul, we wait with impatience for the moment when you shall proclaim the hour of vengeance."

These events, together with the extraordinary activity of the police, created the greatest agitation and alarm.

On the 28th of February, Pichogru was arrested in a private house at Paris, having been betrayed by a person with whom he had lodged: and, on the 29th, a law was proposed and passed, in the course of a single sitting, by which the punishment of death was denounced against all those who should conceal Georges, or any of his accomplices; and a deputation was charged to communicate this law to Bonaparte.

Duval, their organ on this occasion, delivered the following speech:

"Citizen first consul, the tribunate and the legislative body have adopted measures to cut the last thread of the conspiracy.—These measures would be in vain, if they were not prompt. Love of the country dictated to the tribunate the wish it has expressed for their being put in immediate execution. Every thing is at stake when you are in danger. It is the repose, the glory, the existence of the republic which must be saved by the preservation of its chief, from criminal attacks. The French people have intimated to us their destinies; you owe it to them, and we require of you to take all means for preserving him in whom centre their wishes, their affections, and their hopes."

The first consul answered, that he would take the wish expressed by the tribunate into early and serious consideration.

At the same time a proclamation was issued from the police office, notifying the law which had just passed—informing the inhabitants, that Georges and his associates were still at Paris, from whence it was impossible for them to escape, the barriers and roads being guarded with the utmost vigilance; and summoning all those who had, or did conceal them, to profit of the period allowed by the law, for the purpose of averting its axe. Masters of furnished houses were ordered to examine all individuals lodging with them. The drivers of hackney-coaches were apprized, that such persons were in the habit of using their carriages, and a reward was promised to those who would assist the police in securing them. A report was likewise published, describing the persons, to the number of sixty, implicated in this affair.

Accordingly, on the 9th of March, Georges, accompanied by a person of the name of Leridan, the younger, was arrested in a cabriolet, attempting, as it is supposed, to escape from Paris, in the dusk of the evening. He killed, with a pistol shot, the peace officer who stopped the horse, and wounded another, who endeavoured to seize him. Several others were daily taken up.

General Moreau's wife was suffered to remain at liberty; and, indeed, during the confinement of her husband, she experienced, notwithstanding the jealousy of the government, open marks of attention and compassion, from the inhabitants of Paris. But this lenity towards Madame Moreau, so unusual on the part of the French government, was more a measure of policy than of humanity. For the high military reputation of her husband, his probity, moderation, and disinterestedness, had rendered him the idol of a great proportion of the army, and had gained him the esteem of all well thinking persons in France. He was also considered as the natural rival of the first consul, and looked up to as the person most likely to deliver France from his tyranny. He had long excited the jealousy of Bonaparte, but prudence had checked the exercise of that passion by any act of violence. A pretext for his arrest was consequently an object of the greatest magnitude to the first consul. However, it was still judged expedient to proceed against him with caution, lest any apparent harshness might cause a clamor, and perhaps stronger marks of dissatisfaction on the part of the troops; and although he was found guilty of the charges adduced against him, by the tribunal before which he was tried, his sentence was remitted on his having written a penitential letter to Bonaparte, upon the condition that he should retire to the United States of America.

The conspiracy being thus defeated, and the principal persons concerned in confinement, Bonaparte availed himself of an opportunity which then presented itself, to get rid of one of the princes of the house of Bourbon, from whom he entertained considerable apprehensions. In this he was not actuated solely by the spirit of revenge, for he had been previously heard to say, that the only individual of that unfortunate family who could be deemed dangerous to the existing French government, resided in an obscure manner in a small town in Germany. This could apply only to the Duc d'Enghien, consequently, it is probable that the seizure of that prince had long been in contemplation.

In fact, the Duc d'Enghien had acquired the highest reputation. During the whole of the preceding war, he had served under his gallant grandfather, the Prince of Condé, and had so much distinguished himself by his skill and bravery as an officer, added to his unbounded generosity and humanity, as to be adored by his followers, and admired by his enemies. Such conduct must have procured him numerous friends and partisans in France.

The violation of the territory of an independent but weak potentate was no impediment, and but a trivial consideration in the eyes of Bonaparte, compared with the sacrifice of so illustrious and valuable a victim.

Shortly after the disbanding of the army of Condé, his highness fixed his residence at Ettenheim, in the electorate of Baden, where he passed his time in the society of a few select friends. His principal occupation was study, his recreations the culture of a small garden, and hunting. Besides, it is probable, that the locality of his retreat furnished him with the opportunities of receiving earlier intelligence of what was passing in France, than if he had been further removed from the frontiers.

The first intimation which the Elector of Baden had of Bonaparte's design, was the following letter, dated the 10th of March, from Talleyrand, French minister for foreign affairs, to Baron Edelsheim, the elector's prime minister.

"Sir,

"I had formerly sent you a note, the purport of which was, to request the arrest of the French emigrants who were assembled at Offenbourg, as the first Consul, from successive arrests of the banditti, which the English government has sent to France, and from the result of the trials which have been instituted, has obtained a complete knowledge of the extensive part which the English agents at Offenbourg have had in those horrible plots, which have been devised against his own person, and against the safety of France. He was, at the same time, warned that the Duc d'Enghien, and General Dumourier, were at Ettenheim. As it is impossible that they should be in that city without the permission of his electoral highness, the first consul, therefore, could not see, without the deepest concern, that a prince, whom he had distinguished by every mark of friendship, should give an asylum to the most determined enemies of France, and permit them, so tranquilly, to project such unprecedented conspiracies. From these extraordinary occurrences, the first consul has found it necessary to order two small detachments of troops to repair to Offenbourg and Ettenheim, to seize the authors of a crime, the nature of which is such as to place those, who are proved to have had a share in it, out of the protection of the law of nations. It is General Caulincourt who is charged with the execution of these orders of the first consul, and who, there is no doubt, will employ every care and attention in fulfilling the same, which his electoral highness can wish. He will have the honor to deliver the letter which I have been directed to write."

Little suspecting any attempt upon his person, the Duc d'Enghien was seized, together with several other individuals, on the 15th of March, by a body of French cavalry, who had passed the Rhine on the preceding night, under the command of General Caulincourt, aid-de-camp to Bonaparte, and instantly conveyed to the citadel of Strasburgh.

On the 17th he was sent forward to Paris, in consequence of orders received by the telegraph, and was obliged to continue the journey, a distance of about 400 miles, without the smallest intermission, escorted by relays of gens d'armes. At six o'clock in the morning of the 20th, he arrived at Paris, and was conducted, in the first instance, to the Temple, as it were to wound his feelings by the sight of a prison where so many of the royal family had suffered such atrocious cruelties; even there he was not permitted to repose, but was hurried away to the castle of Vincennes, where a tribunal, under the appellation of a special military commission, composed of persons devoted to Bonaparte, selected by his brother-in-law, General Murat, governor of Paris, had been convened. At nine o'clock in the evening of the same day, almost exhausted from want of rest and nourishment, he was forced to appear before his judges, who, in the course of two hours, passed upon him the sentence of death.

He was accused, 1st, Of having borne arms against the French republic. 2ndly, Of having offered his services to the English government, the enemy of the French people. 3rdly, Of having received and accredited agents of the said government; of having procured for them the means of maintaining an understanding in France, and having conspired with them against the internal and external safety of the state. 4thly, Of having placed himself at the head of an assemblage of French emigrants, and others in the pay of England, formed in the countries of Fribourg and Baden. 5thly, Of having maintained a correspondence in the town of Strasburgh, tending to stir up the neighbouring departments, for the purpose of effecting there a diversion in favor of England. 6thly, Of being one of the favorers and accomplices of the conspiracy planned by the English against the life of the first consul, and intending, in case of the success of this conspiracy, to enter France hostilely.

Upon each of these charges the court found the prisoner guilty, and judgment was pronounced in the following words:

"The special military commission unanimously condemns to the pain of death, Louis Antoine Henri de Bourbon, Duc d'Enghien, in atonement for the crimes of being a spy, of carrying on a correspondence with the enemies of the republic, and of an attempt against the internal and external safety of the state."

No evidence whatever was produced upon the trial, which was a mere formality, preparatory to the execution of a sentence virtually pronounced by the order for the prince's arrest.

During the whole of this distressing scene, the Duc d'Enghien manifested the greatest calmness and fortitude, a circumstance the more surprising, when we consider how much cause he had to be irritated by the treatment he had experienced, and to be enervated by the fatigue and want of proper nourishment, which he had endured for the last six days. Even the interval between his condemnation and execution was not undisturbed. Four gens d'armes were posted in the dungeon where he was confined; and, it is said, that he was not permitted to communicate with the clergyman who attended him on the occasion, otherwise than in a tone of voice loud enough to be overheard by his guards. In the course of the night, General Murat arrived at Vincennes, under an escort of Mamelukes, accompanied by four aides-de-camp, together with Generals E. Mortier, Duroc, Hulín, and Louis Bonaparte. The castle was surrounded, and the avenues to that part of the wood of Vincennes appointed for the execution, guarded by Italian troops of gens d'armes, while each Mameluke was provided with a torch for the occasion.

The duke, on being informed of his sentence, tranquilly replied, "I am ready and resigned." It is moreover asserted that, upon hearing that the grenadiers commanded to shoot him were Italians of Bonaparte's guard, he said, "Thank God they are not Frenchmen! I am condemned by a foreigner, and God be praised that my executioners are also such. It will be a stain the less upon my countrymen;" and that, at the place of execution, he lifted up his hands to heaven, exclaiming, "May God preserve my king, and deliver my country from the yoke of a foreigner." It was proposed to bind a handkerchief over his eyes, but he prevented it, saying, "that a loyal soldier, who has often been exposed to fire and sword, can face death with open eyes, and without fear." He then looked at the soldiers, who had levelled their pieces, saying, "Grenadiers, lower your arms, otherwise you will miss or only wound me." Of the nine who fired, seven hit him: two bullets pierced his head, and five his body. A coffin, partly filled with lime, was ready to receive his corpse, and a grave had been dug in the garden of the castle, where he was interred. Thus perished, in the prime of life, the only son of the Duc de Bourbon, a prince who inherited all the virtues of the illustrious house of Condé!!!

By this foul deed Bonaparte manifested his determination (if it admitted of any question before) to perpetuate, at all hazards, his dominion. He certainly got rid of one formidable opponent, but he created many others, who only waited for a favorable opportunity to declare themselves. Unfortunately for mankind, he had such numerous accomplices in guilt, whose fortunes, and perhaps existence, depended upon the upholding his authority, and who were perfectly in possession of the means of governing that ignorant and abject people, namely, by severity and corruption; and having those means completely in their hands, that it required more than an ordinary course of events, and a prodigious reverse of fortune, to shake his power.

This unjustifiable proceeding excited a general, but, in many cases, a smothered indignation. Russia, however, came forward with that openness and intrepidity which so well became her. His imperial majesty, conformably to that magnanimity which has long characterised the court of St. Petersburg, took the earliest opportunity of testifying the lively interest which he took in the fate of this unfortunate prince: and the following spirited remonstrance, upon this inhuman transaction, was addressed to the French minister for foreign affairs, through M. Oubril, his imperial majesty's chargé d'affaires at Paris.

"According to the orders which the undersigned chargé d'affaires of his imperial majesty the Emperor of all the Russias has received from his court, he hastens to inform the minister of the French republic, that his illustrious master has learned, with equal astonishment and concern, the event that has taken place at Ettenheim, the circumstances that have attended it, and its melancholy result. The concern of the emperor on this occasion is the more lively, as he can by no means reconcile the violation of the territory of the Elector of Baden to those principles of justice and propriety which are held sacred among nations, and are the bulwark of their reciprocal relations. His imperial majesty finds in this act a violation of the rights of nations, and of a neutral territory, which, at least, was as arbitrary as it was public; a violation, the consequences of which are difficult to estimate, and which, if considered as admissible, must entirely annihilate the security and independence of sovereign states. If the German empire, after the misfortunes it has suffered, which have made it sensibly feel the necessity of tranquillity and repose, must still be in fear for the integrity of its territory, could it have been expected that this should have originated on the part of a government which has laboured to secure to it peace, and imposed on itself the duty of guaranteeing its continuance. All these considerations have not permitted the emperor to pass over in silence this unexpected event, which has spread consternation through all Germany. His imperial majesty has held it to be his duty, as guarantee and mediator of the peace, to notify to the states of the empire, the manner in which he views an action which endangers their security and independence. The Russian resident at Ratisbon has, in consequence, received orders to deliver in a note to the diet, and to represent to it, and to the head of the empire, the necessity of remonstrating to the French government against this violation of the German territory. His imperial majesty holds it in like manner to be his duty to notify his sentiments directly to the French government by the undersigned, as his majesty is assured, that the first consul will hasten to attend to the just remonstrances of the German political body, and feel the pressing necessity of taking the most active measures to relieve all the governments of Europe from the alarm he must have occasioned to them, and put an end to an order of things too dangerous to their safety and future independence.

"The undersigned hereby fulfils the commands of his illustrious master, and avails himself of this opportunity to communicate to the citizen minister for foreign affairs, the assurance of his high esteem."

The following note was also presented on the 6th of May, at the diet of Ratisbon, by the Russian minister resident there; dated May 5, and signed De Kluppell:

"The event which has taken place in the states of his highness the Elector of Baden; the conclusion of which has been so melancholy, has occasioned the most poignant grief to the Emperor of all the Russias. He cannot but view with the greatest concern the violation which has been committed on the tranquillity and integrity of the German territory. His imperial majesty is the more affected by this event, as he never could have expected that a power which had undertaken, in common with himself, the office of mediator, and was consequently bound to exert his care for the welfare and tranquillity of Germany, could have departed, in such a manner, from the sacred principles of the law of nations, and the duties it had so lately taken upon itself. It would be unnecessary to call the attention of the diet to the serious consequences to which the German empire must be exposed, if acts of violence, of which the first example has just been seen, should be passed over in silence; it will, with its accustomed foresight, easily perceive how much the future tranquillity and security of the whole empire, and each of its members, must be endangered, if such violent proceedings should be deemed allowable, and suffered to take place without observation or opposition."

It did not seem expedient though to most of the powers to whom this exhortation was addressed, to take up the subject with that earnestness which their dignity and independence seemed to demand, so that a step undertaken by Russia from such just and noble motives, terminated in a feeble and fruitless correspondence. It had, however, the effect of producing a note from the French government, composed with so little management as to aggravate instead of palliating the offence complained of; and, as it gave rise to a most animated and able discussion on the part of Russia, it is here necessary to cite the most striking passages.

This note observed, that the influence of the enemies of France had prevailed in the cabinet of St. Petersburg, and that the good understanding between the two countries was thus endangered. That the Emperor of Germany and the King of Prussia, most concerned in the fate of Germany, had understood that the French government were authorised in arresting, at two leagues from the frontier, French rebels, who, from their conduct, had placed themselves out of the protection of the law of nations. That the first consul had no account to render to the Emperor of Russia, on a point which in no wise concerned his interests, but if the intention of his imperial majesty were to form a new coalition, what need was there for empty pretences? Why not act openly? That the first consul knew no man who could intimidate France; no man whom he would permit to interfere in the internal concerns of the country. It was required that France should employ the most efficacious means to tranquillize the different governments of Europe, and to put an end to an order of things too alarming for their independence and security. This very independence of the states of Europe was attacked by the protection afforded by Russia, at Dresden and at Rome, to the authors of plots; by the Russian ministers at most of the courts pretending to place under the safeguard of the law of nations, natives of the very country where those ministers reside, as Mr. Marcaff attempted to do in the instance of a Genevese, and by not removing from their situations French emigrants in the employment of Russia. After further remarks, the question is then asked: If, when England planned the murder of Paul the First, (supposing intelligence to have been received, that the authors of the plot were at a league's distance from the frontiers,) would not pains have been taken to arrest them? That the object of such persons was to rekindle the flames of war, which could only be advantageous to England. The first consul then declared his repugnancy to a war with Russia, but that he should prefer it to a state of things which did not place France on an equality with other great powers.

The tragical scene already alluded to had scarcely closed, when another intrigue was denounced by the grand judge. In his report, which was accompanied by a variety of documents and intercepted letters, it was stated, that the British minister, resident at the court of Munich, was engaged in a clandestine correspondence with certain individuals in the heart of France; with a view to overturn the government. That these agents had been supplied with large sums of money, which were to be employed in obtaining information of the measures in contemplation, by establishing an intelligence in the different public offices; in gaining over those employed in the powder-mills; in having at their disposal a number of printers and engravers; in procuring a correct knowledge of the different parties in France; and in taking every means to disorganize the armies.

Such is the substance of the instructions cited by the grand judge, as given by Mr. Drake to his principal correspondent, Mehée de Latouche, who was supposed to be at the head of a committee of malcontents assembled at Paris. This M. Mehée was a man of notoriously infamous character, but who, it appears, had had sufficient hypocrisy and address to obtain a degree of confidence from some members of the British government, and, through their introduction, to have gained access to Mr. Drake, to whom he made a tender of his services.

No British subject, who had the interests of his country at heart, but particularly a British minister, could well refuse, under similar circumstances, to receive any useful intelligence which might be imparted to him. But this proposal from Mehée was merely a snare, in order to discover the views and the private means of procuring information, adopted by the English cabinet, for he had been from the beginning in the confidence of the French government.

The main drift of this publication was to implicate Mr. Drake in a participation in the plans of Georges and his adherents, and that was attempted to be proved by a distortion of Mr. Drake's correspondence. Not a syllable, however, was in any of the letters ascribed to him, to justify such a construction.

Copies of these papers were addressed to the several ministers from foreign courts, residing at Paris, with a circular note from M. Talleyrand annexed. The answers to which were conceived in general terms of compliment to the first consul, with the exception of a few, of which the writers, solely upon the faith of the communication thus made to them, ventured to reprobate, in the harshest terms, the conduct of Mr. Drake. Amongst the latter the Danish minister, Mr. Dreyer, and the American minister, Mr. Livingston, were the most conspicuous.

The originals were forwarded to Munich, and on the 31st of March, a note was addressed to Mr. Drake, by Baron de Montgelas, the elector's prime minister, wherein he expressed the regret of his serene highness, that his capital should have been the central point of a correspondence, so inconsistent with the mission with which Mr. Drake was invested at his court; and that he owed it to the dignity and welfare of his subjects to declare, that from that moment it became impossible for him to have any communication with Mr. Drake, or to receive him at his court.

After the delivery of this note, it was impossible for Mr. Drake to delay much longer his residence in the Bavarian territories; and Mr. Spencer Smith, British envoy to the Elector of Wurtemberg, who was stated to have been concerned in these transactions, was also under the necessity of quitting Stutgard.

The papers published with respect to the above transaction, had been so widely distributed and so generally read throughout Europe, that it became necessary that some notice should be taken of them by the British government. Accordingly, a circular letter on this subject was addressed to each of the foreign ministers, resident at the court of London, by Lord Hawkesbury, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs. In this letter Lord Hawkesbury repelled the charge of the king's government being parties to any project of assassination, whilst he maintained the right of all belligerent powers to avail themselves of any discontents existing in the countries with which they might be at war. And that this principle was to be acted upon with peculiar propriety, at a time when all Europe felt an anxious desire to see re-established in France an order of things more consistent with its own happiness, and with the security of surrounding nations. That this principle, were it under any circumstances doubtful, was, in the present case, most fully sanctioned, not only by the actual state of the French nation, but by the conduct of the government of that country, which, ever since the commencement of the present war, had maintained a communication with the disaffected in his majesty's dominions, and had actually assembled, on the coast of France, a body of Irish rebels, for the purpose of aiding their designs. And that if any minister, accredited to a foreign court, had held correspondence with persons in France, with a view of obtaining information of the projects of the French government, or for any other legitimate purpose, he had done no more than ministers, under similar circumstances, had been uniformly considered as having a right to do, with respect to the countries with which their sovereign was at war.

These positions of Lord Hawkesbury were commented upon, some time after, in a circular note from M. Talleyrand, addressed to the several French diplomatic agents.

In this note, the French minister of foreign affairs observed, that the project conceived by the British government, for the last half century, gradually to abolish the tutelary system of public law, which unites all civilized nations, developed itself with a frightful progression: The British government was arraigned of audacity in sporting with the faith of oaths, and the most solemn treaties—that maritime nations daily experienced its tyranny—No longer did there exist a theoretical system of navigation—No convention which had not been scandalously violated, on every shore and on every sea; that neutral states, in exercising their rights with the most timid circumspection, were exposed to insult, pillage, and extermination; that now it attacked rights collectively, and directed a blow against morality itself, against the religion of public law.—Diplomatic agents had at all times been considered as ministers of peace—organs of conciliation—but the British government wished them to be the instigators of plots, the agents of troubles, the directors of machinations, vile spies, cowardly seducers. They were ordered to foment seditions, to provoke and to pay for assassinations; and, it was attempted to invest that infamous ministry with the inviolability which belonged to the mediators of kings, and the pacificators of nations.—That it was time to put an end to the disastrous career of principles subversive of all society. The persons to whom these notes were directed, were ordered to declare, to the governments where they resided, that Bonaparte would not recognize the English diplomatic body in Europe, so long as the British government did not abstain from charging its ministers with any warlike agency, and did not restrain them within the limits of their functions.

On the 8th of April, an article appeared in the French official journal, purporting to be the result of the depositions of six surgeons, appointed to inspect the body of General Pichegru, who had been found strangled two days before, in the place of his confinement; a laboured attempt was there made to prove that he had committed suicide: but, even from the circumstances related in that report, it seems almost impossible that he could himself have been the cause of his death, in the manner described; and, indeed, the general belief was, that Bonaparte, apprehensive of the sensation that might be occasioned by his trial or public execution, had caused him to be secretly dispatched by a party of Mamelukes. It was, moreover, confidently pretended, that he had previously been put to the torture, in hopes of extorting from him the crimination of General Moreau.

Georges, and several of his adherents, were publicly executed in the Place de Greve. In their last moments, as well as at their trials, they conducted themselves with the most heroic fortitude, and exemplary resignation, such as could only be inspired by a conscientious devotion to the principles which they had espoused.

In order, as it were, to make a deeper impression, and inflame the public mind against England, and consequently to weaken the indignation excited by the deaths of the Duc d'Enghien, and of General Pichegru, together with the arrest of General Moreau, a second report was published, on the 11th of April, by the grand judge, "respecting the plots of the person named Drake, minister of England at Munich, and of the person named Spencer Smith, minister from England at Stutgard, against France, and the person of the first consul," founded principally on the relation made by a person of the name of Rosey, who represented himself to have obtained an interview with those gentlemen, under the mask of being an agent of the persons in correspondence with Mr. Drake from France. This measure was not, however, sufficient to satisfy the inhabitants of Paris; for, on the 14th of April, General Murat, the commandant, deemed it necessary to recommend, in general orders to the aides-de-camp, officers, and non-commissioned officers of the garrison and national guard, to enlighten the citizens on the false rumours propagated by the disaffected—namely—that the death of Pichegru was not the effect of suicide, and that numbers of prisoners were shot every night; and to acquaint them, that military, as well as civil justice, was in no case exercised without public forms; and that not a single individual had been condemned, by the military tribunals, without his sentence having been printed, and posted up immediately; but whatever had been reported, relative to the facts of which the prisoners were accused, must be considered as false, and that the subsequent arrests had substantiated the guilt of General Moreau, and that undeniable proofs existed of every circumstance advanced by the grand judge.

Nothing could be more auspicious for Bonaparte's personal ambition than the present state of things. All ranks of Frenchmen were more than ever prostrate before him, and ready to anticipate his wishes by the most abject submission. Had his vanity and presumption prompted him, in imitation of some of the heroes of antiquity, to claim to be recognized of divine origin, he would probably have experienced no resistance on the part of the nation. But the crown of France was the object to which he had long aspired. The regrets of the people for their ancient monarchy, rendered, indeed, any system of government approaching to it, even in the person of Bonaparte, to a certain degree palatable: and this prevailing sentiment was used as a principal argument to advance his pretensions.

The first decided step towards the accomplishment of this long-meditated measure, was an address to the first consul, on the part of the senate, dated the 27th of March, proposing to constitute him hereditary Emperor of France. His answer was dated the 25th of April, from St. Cloud, and was communicated, by a message, in the following terms :

"Senators, your address of the 6th of last Germinal has never ceased to be present to my thoughts; it has been the object of my most constant meditation. You have judged the hereditary power of the supreme magistracy necessary, in order to shelter the French nation completely from the plots of our enemies, and from the agitations arising from rival ambition. It likewise appears to you, that many of our institutions require improvement, in order permanently to secure the triumph of equality and public liberty, and present to the people, and to the government, the double guarantee of which they stood in need. We have been constantly guided by this grand truth, that the sovereignty resides in the French people, in the sense, that every thing, without exception, ought to be done for their interest, their happiness, and their glory. It is in order to attain this end, that the supreme magistracy, the senate, the council of state, the legislative body, the electoral body, the electoral colleges, and the different branches of the administration are, and ought to be, instituted. In proportion as I fix my attention on these great objects, I am the more convinced of the truth of those sentiments which I have expressed to you, and I feel more and more, that, in a circumstance as new as it is important, the counsels of your wisdom and experience were necessary to enable me to fix my ideas. I request you, therefore, to make known to me the whole of your thoughts. The French people can add nothing to the honor and glory with which they have surrounded me: but my most sacred duty, and that dearest to my heart, is to secure, to their latest posterity, those advantages which they have acquired by a revolution that has cost them so much, particularly by the sacrifice of those millions of brave citizens who have died in defence of their rights. Fifteen years have elapsed since, by a spontaneous movement, you ran to arms; you acquired liberty, equality, and glory. These first blessings of nations are now secured to you for ever, are sheltered from every storm, they are preserved to you, and to your children. Institutions, conceived and commenced in the midst of the hurricanes of internal and external wars, developed with constancy, are just terminated in the attempts and plots of our most mortal enemies, by the adoption of such measures as the experience of centuries and of nations has demonstrated, as proper to guarantee the rights which the nation had judged necessary for its dignity, its liberty, and its happiness."

from the armies, the departments, and principal cities; two of which are here transcribed, as specimens of those compositions. The first was the address of the camp near Ostend, dated the 29th of April.

"General First Consul! a cry has been heard in the armies—that cry is re-echoed in every heart. The soldiers of the first division of the camp at Bruges, sensible of the dangers which you have encountered alone in the common cause, more sensible still of the benefits which they have derived from you, are eager to decree to you a title august and worthy of you. You are already their chief, and their father; but these titles are not sufficient to express either their enthusiasm or their love. Let, then, that of emperor teach the world, that France has known how to express her gratitude for all that you have done for her! Yet a painful recollection mingles itself with our hopes—already have the poniards of your enemies more than once threatened your destiny, to which that of so many others is attached. France was on the point of being annihilated in your person! let her survive in your illustrious family! and let posterity know what your great actions have been, and what has been our gratitude. As the organ of part of your troops, I am happy in having it in my power to express to you their sentiments.—Deign to accept, general first consul, the testimonies of love and respect of the first division, and of mine.

(Signed) "The General of Division,
"OUDINOT."

Followed by several other signatures.

The next was that of the municipal body of Paris, dated the 30th of April.

"To-day, citizen first consul, all France expresses the same wishes we expressed two years ago. To-day, all France, happy under your government, conjures you to eternize the benefits of it. Let not this escape your memory, citizen first consul. In 1789, France, without doubt, demanded a revolution—but she demanded it agreeably to the maxims of her government, and not in the unity which constituted her essence.

"The French, then free in the choice of their deputies to the states-general, free in the delivery of their sentiments and wishes, expressly demanded that all the citizens, equal in rights, should be admissible, without distinction of rank or birth, to all the public functions. They demanded, that the power of exercising arbitrary acts should no longer reside any where, and that no citizen should be condemned without trial.—They demanded liberty of conscience, or, rather, the free exercise of all forms of divine worship. They demanded that the representatives of the nation should be called to deliberate upon the public burdens. They, in fine, demanded, as a guarantee of all the rights of which they invoked the restitution, that the executive power should be confided to the hands of a single person, and that this power should be hereditary. What the French demanded in 1789, they again demand to-day.—They earnestly demand it. A long experience has too fully convinced them, that whatsoever has been done or attempted beyond their first wishes, commanded, perhaps, by circumstances stronger than men, cannot constitute either the duration, the force, or the happiness of a great empire. We shall not, citizen first consul, point out the mode most suitable to be adopted for the accomplishment of our wish. We trust, in this respect, to the wisdom of the first authority of the state, and to your wisdom. But let us be fearful of dissembling the truth from ourselves. The moments are pressing. Our implacable enemies are observing us. We know what frightful projects they have shewn themselves capable of. They will never cease meditating our ruin, before strong, generous, and lasting institutions have convinced them that our ruin is impossible.”

(Signed) The twelve mayors, the twenty-four assistant-mayors, the five members of the council of prefecture, the prefect, and the secretary-general.

Matters being so far prepared, a proposition was submitted to the tribunate, on the 1st of May, by one of Bonaparte's creatures, named Curée, for conferring on Napoleon Bonaparte the rank and title of Emperor of the French, and of making the said rank and title hereditary in his family, according to the laws of primogeniture.

Carnot was the only member of that body who ventured to oppose the proposition. He began, by declaring that he should preserve the same moderation, in delivering his opinion, which had been exhibited by the tribunes, who had spoken in favor of the motion. He referred those who might be inclined to put a bad construction on his motives, to a rigid examination of his conduct, since the commencement of the revolution. He asked if it were to grant the first consul a reward for his services, to offer him the sacrifice of liberty. If it were not to destroy Bonaparte's own work, to make France his private patrimony. “I voted,” continued the orator, “against the consulate for life; and I will not this day pursue a different course. I will be consistent with myself. But the moment that the proposed order of things is established, I will be the first to conform to it, and yield to the new authority proofs of my deference. May all the members of the community follow my example.” He cited a number of passages from the Roman history, to shew that a government placed in the hands of an individual was no pledge of its stability or tranquillity. He drew the same inference from the history of France, where intestine commotions and civil discords existed under the government of princes. After the peace of Amiens, Bonaparte had the choice of a republic or a monarchy—but he swore to defend the former, and to respect the wishes of France, who had made him her guardian. Now it was proposed to render that power a property, of which, at present, only the administration was possessed. The Romans were most jealous of their liberty, and Camillus, Fabius, and Cincinnatus only saved the country by relinquishing the power which had been confided to them. The liberty of Rome perished as soon as Cæsar had usurped absolute power. It was reserved for the new world to teach the old the practicability of a nation's enjoying liberty with the rising prosperity of the people. Would the opinion of the public functionaries be the free wish of the whole nation? Would there not be inconveniences attending the avowal of opposite sentiments? Was the press so far restrained and degraded, that it would be impossible to make, in the public prints, respectful remonstrances against the proposed arrangement? Did the expulsion of the Bourbons involve the necessity of a new dynasty? Might not the establishment of that dynasty place obstacles in the way of a general peace? Would it be recognized by foreign powers? In case of refusal to recognize it, must arms necessarily be resorted to? In that case, the security of the French nation would be, perhaps, endangered for an empty title. The means of consolidation consisted in adherence to justice. Far be it from him to make any particular application, or to cast any blame on the operations of government. Was liberty, then, disclosed to man, only that it might never be enjoyed? He could not, however, consent to regard it as a mere chimera; and his heart told him, that its government was easy. He concluded, by declaring his readiness to sacrifice his personal opinion to the interests of his country. His respect for the law would remain unalterable—his desire was to see every sentiment united against their eternal, their implacable enemy; that enemy who was now meditating universal oppression.

The speech of Carnot, temperate as it was, and apparently delivered in a tone of constraint, did not fail to excite several vehement replies and animadversions on his conduct. He was asked, if he adopted the proper means of manifesting his respect for the laws, in reminding them, that he had, on a former occasion, voted against the consulate for life, sanctioned by the suffrages of more than a million of Frenchmen? If he had forgotten the regimen of 1793, and that horrible decemviral committee, which, in cold blood, signed arrests for death and proscriptions? It was astonishing to hear of opposition to a measure which alone could prevent the return of similar miseries. The question was not concerning the interests of individuals, but the interests of the nation at large; a measure which would realize the plan of government, formed by the constituent assembly in 1789.

The discussion was resumed on the ensuing day, and the proposition was principally supported by a member, named Fayard, who, after expatiating on the transcendent merits and services of Bonaparte, and, by laying down the principle that nations have the right to enjoy that form of government for which they are by nature best adapted, he proceeded, by observing, that in vain political maladies affected and suspended those principles for a moment—the crisis ceased, and nature resumed her rights. It was in the nature of things, that a country of vast extent, whose security was not guaranteed by its physical position, and whose relations with its neighbours incessantly menaced its tranquillity, ought to be governed by one head. Rome, at her birth, had kings, because the surrounding nations were ruled by kings. Rome, after conquering her neighbours, expelled the kings, and created consuls. When her power had gone beyond the limits of her territories, when she had to combat nations far removed from the centre of her dominions, even the excessive love of freedom could not prevent the ruin of the republic, and emperors were elevated to the throne. Fortunate would it have been for that great nation, if the first of their emperors had, as he had it in his power, made the government hereditary in his family. The scenes which covered the throne with blood, the civil wars which dissolved that vast empire, and precipitated its downfall, would not have sullied the page of the history of those masters of the world. On the ruins of a monarchy destroyed, an attempt was made to substitute a monarchical government. France must have been destroyed, if the genius of Bonaparte had not erected the consulate to precede, for a few years, the creation of the imperial dignity. He was called to this elevated station by the unanimous wish. He had, as first consul, the power of performing vast services, and you have seen all his measures attended with a success unexampled in the page of the history of the world. This was sufficient for his own glory, but not enough for the happiness of France. If empires prospered under a great man, the moment which deprived them of their services menaced them with some dreadful explosion, if the same monarch did not substitute in his place him who was to be his successor. It was then that ambition became inflamed, and long before ambition prepared in secret the means of supplanting rivals. Long dissensions, succeeded by civil wars, agitated the minds of men, disturbed for ages the union of the citizens; and the people were often so unfortunate as not to discern, amongst the rival candidates, the one most worthy to receive the sceptre, of which death had bereaved the object of their regret. What could prevent these disasters? A constitutional law, which gave the line of succession, and which gave to the family of the chief the new dynasty. This was the object of the nation; and if the throne were to be the reward of the virtues of the great man called to the imperial dignity, the succession to it by his family would guarantee to France ages of glory and repose.

It was observed, by another member, that absolute monarchy was the most degrading of systems; but that monarchy, connected with the representative system, conciliated political and civil liberty; and that was the system which Napoleon was about to establish.

The sitting concluded with the motion declaring the discussion to be closed, and that a report should be made on the next day on the original proposition.

Accordingly, on the 3d of May, the tribunate having heard the report of the special commission appointed to consider the proposition made by Citizen Curée, resolved, 1st, "That Napoleon Bonaparte should be proclaimed Emperor of the French; and, in that quality, be charged with the government of France. 2d. That the title of emperor, together with the imperial prerogatives, should be hereditary in his family, in the male line, and in the order of primogeniture. 3d. That the constituted authorities, in forming the necessary regulations for the establishment of the hereditary power, should make all due provisions for preserving equality, liberty, and the rights of the people. 4th. That the present vote should be carried to the senate by a deputation of six members, who were to explain the motives which had induced the tribunate to adopt this resolution."

Upon the above vote, the following decree was passed:—

"The tribunate considering that, at the breaking out of the revolution, when the national will had an opportunity of manifesting itself with the greatest freedom, the general wish was declared for the individual unity of the supreme power, and for the hereditary succession of that power; that the family of the Bourbons, having, by their conduct, rendered the hereditary government odious to the people, forced them to lose sight of its advantages, and drove the nation to seek for a happier destiny in a democratical form of government; that France having made a trial of different forms of government, experienced from them only the miseries of anarchy; that the state was in the present peril, when Bonaparte brought back by Providence, suddenly appeared for its salvation; that under the government of a single individual, France recovered tranquillity at home, and acquired abroad the highest consideration and glory; that the plots formed by the house of Bourbon, in concert with a ministry, the implacable enemy of France, warned France of the danger which threatens her, if losing Bonaparte, she continued exposed to the agitation inseparable from an election; that the consulate for life, and the power granted to the first consul, of appointing his successor, are not adequate to the preventing intrigues at home or abroad, which could not fail to be formed during the vacancy of the supreme power; that, in declaring that magistracy hereditary, a conformity is at once observed to the example of all great states, ancient or modern, and to the first wish of the nation, expressed in 1789; that, enlightened and supported by this experience, the nation now returns to this wish more strongly than ever, and expresses it on all sides; that, in all political charges, it has been usual for nations to confer the supreme power on those to whom they owe their safety; that, when France demands for her security an hereditary chief, her gratitude and affection call on Bonaparte; that France will preserve all the advantages of a revolution, by the choice of a new dynasty, as much interested for her benefit as the old one would be for her destruction; that France may expect from the family of Bonaparte, more than from any other, the maintenance of the rights and liberties of the people who choose them, and all those institutions best calculated to support them. But there is no title more suited to the dignity of the supreme chief of the French nation than the title of emperor."

The tribunate, exercising the right given them by the 29th article of the constitution, have come to the following vote, (reciting the above-mentioned vote.)

The foregoing decree having been put to the vote by the president of the tribunate, it was carried by acclamation, with the single exception of the only member who delivered his sentiments against it.

Citizen Jaud Pauvilliers was named head of the deputation, for presenting it to the conservative senate. The other five members were chosen by lot.

This decree was accordingly presented to the senate on the 4th of May, and the following speech was delivered by the vice-president on the occasion.

"Citizens Tribunes, this day will form a memorable era. It is the day, on which, for the first time, you are called upon to exercise, with the conservative senate, the republican and popular privilege which the fundamental laws of the constitution have delegated to you. You could not exercise this prerogative at a more favorable moment, or apply it to an object of more importance than the present. Citizens tribunes, you express to the trustees of the national rights a wish truly national. I cannot remove the veil which conceals, for a time, the labours of the senate on this important subject. I must inform you, however, in the mean time, that since the 6th of Germinal (March 27), the senate has directed the attention of the first magistrate to the same subject. The senate has previously sounded the public opinion, and has announced it to the government. But, you will find your advantages and privileges, when you observe that what we have been thinking of in silence for two months, the peculiar nature of our institution, and the place you hold in the constitution, has enabled you at once to submit it to discussion in the presence of the people. You have served at once the people and the government by disclosing and enforcing this opinion; pregnant with so many advantages, and it was first secretly cherished in the bosom of this assembly, where you have now so gloriously reported it. The happy developement which you have given to this grand idea, procures to the senate which opened the tribune to you, the satisfaction of being able to congratulate themselves on their choice, and to approve what they have done. In your public speeches we have found the basis of our opinions. Like you, citizens tribunes, we do not wish to return to the Bourbons, because we do not wish a counter-revolution, which is the only benefit we could derive from those unfortunate exiles, who carried with them despotism, nobility, feudal tyranny, slavery, and ignorance; and who, still to augment their crimes, have encouraged the hope that their return to France might be effected by the way of England. Like you, citizens tribunes, we wish to raise a new dynasty, because we wish to secure to the French people all their rights which they have reconquered, and which the folly of their enemies would take from them. Like you, citizens tribunes, we wish that liberty, equality, and knowledge, may no more have a retrograde motion. I do not speak of the great man, called upon, by his glory, to give his name to the age in which he lives, and who ought to be called upon by our wishes to consecrate to us his family and existence. It is not to himself, it is to us that he ought to devote himself. What you propose in the ardor of enthusiasm, the senate will consider with cool deliberation. Citizens tribunes, we are the cornerstone of the social edifice, but it is the government of an hereditary chief that must constitute the key-stone of the arch. You repose in your bosom the wish that this arch may be at last consolidated. In receiving this wish, the senate does not forget that what you solicit is not so much a change of the state of the republic, as the means of perfecting and establishing it, and this certainly is what we are most interested in. In this national temple the constitution ought to repose, in some measure, on the god Terminus. If we are induced to interfere in any respect with this sacred compact, the guardianship of which is entrusted to us, it is only to add to its strength, and to extend its duration."

The senate then replied to Bonaparte's speech of the 25th of April, in an address signed by the vice-president François de Neufchâteau, Moreau de Galles, and Joseph Cornudet, secretaries, and the chancellor of the senate, Laplace.

On the 18th of May, a decree, denominated an "Organic Senatus Consultum" was passed by the Senate, conferring the title of emperor on the first consul, and establishing that dignity hereditary in his family. It was likewise decreed, that the members should immediately repair to St. Cloud, to communicate this decision to Bonaparte. They accordingly set out at the close of the sitting, escorted by a body of troops.

The senate were admitted to an audience on their arrival, and their president, Consul Cambacères, presented the "Senatus Consultum" to Bonaparte, accompanying it with an oration.

"Sire, the decree which the senate has passed, and which it takes the earliest opportunity of presenting to your imperial majesty, is only the authentic expression of a will already manifested by the nation. This decree, which confers on you a new title, and which, after you, secures the dignity hereditary in your race, adds nothing to your dignity or your rights. The love and gratitude of the French people have, for some years, entrusted to your majesty the reins of government, and the constitutions of the state reposed in you the choice of a successor. The most august denomination, decreed to you, is then only a tribute which the nation pays to its own dignity, and to the necessity it experiences of giving to you daily testimonies of respect and of attachment, which every day increase. How could the French people find bounds to their gratitude, when you place none to your care and solicitude for them? Preserving the remembrance of the evils which they suffered when abandoned to themselves, how could they reflect, without enthusiasm, on the happiness they have felt since Providence inspired them with the idea of throwing themselves into your arms? Their armies were defeated; the finances were in disorder; public credit was annihilated; factions were disputing for the remains of our ancient splendour; every idea of morality, or even of religion, was obscured; the habit of giving and resuming power left the magistrates without consideration, and even rendered odious every kind of authority. Your majesty appeared; you recalled victory to our standards; you established order and economy in the public expenses; the nation, encouraged by the use you made of your authority, resumed confidence in its own resources; your wisdom allayed the rage of party; religion saw her altars raised up; ideas of justice and injustice were awakened in the minds of the citizens, when they saw crimes followed by punishment, and virtue signalized and rewarded with honorable distinctions. In the last place, and it is, no doubt, the greatest of the miracles operated by your genius, that people, whose civil effervescence had rendered them impatient of every restraint, and hostile to every authority, were, by your means, made to cherish and respect a power which was exercised only for their glory and repose.—The French people do not pretend to establish themselves judges of the constitutions of other states; they have no critical remarks to make; no examples to follow; experience, in future, will become their guide. They have tasted, for ages, the advantages attached to hereditary power; they have made a short, but painful, trial of the contrary system; they return, by the effect of free and mature deliberation, to a path suited to their genius. They make a free use of their rights, to delegate to your imperial majesty a power which your interests forbids you to exercise by yourself. They stipulate for future generations; and, by a solemn compact, entrust to the offspring of your race the happiness of their posterity. The latter will imitate your virtues, the former will inherit our love and our fidelity. Happy the nation which, after so much trouble and uncertainty, finds in its bosom a man worthy of appeasing the tempest of the passions, of conciliating all interests, and uniting all voices! Happy the prince who holds his power by the will, the confidence, and the affections of the citizens! If it be in the principles of our constitution, and already several examples of this kind have been given, to submit to the sanction of the people that part of the decree which concerns the establishment of an hereditary government, the senate have thought that it ought to entreat your imperial majesty to consent that the organic dispositions should be immediately carried into execution; and that, for the glory as well as for the happiness of the republic, Napoleon may be immediately proclaimed emperor of the French."

The emperor replied in the following terms:

"Every thing that can contribute to the good of the country is essentially connected with my happiness. I accept the title which you think necessary to the glory of the nation. I submit to the sanction of the people the law of hereditary succession. I hope France will never repent of having surrounded with honors my family. In all cases my spirit will cease to be present with my posterity, the day on which they shall cease to deserve the love and confidence of the Great Nation."

But as the measure of adulation was not yet quite filled, the senate requested an audience of her majesty the empress, and, on being admitted, the president addressed her as follows:

"Madam, we have just presented to your august spouse the decree which confers on him the title of emperor, which establishes the government hereditary in his family, and associates future generations in the happiness of the present race. A very agreeable duty remains to be performed by the senate—that of offering to your imperial majesty the homage of its respect, and an expression of the gratitude of the French. Yes, madam, fame proclaims the good which you are constantly doing; it says, that being always accessible to the unfortunate, you employ your influence with the chief of the state only to relieve distress; and that to the pleasure of obliging, your majesty adds that amiable delicacy which renders gratitude sweeter, and the kindness more valuable. This disposition presages, that the name of the empress Josephine will be the signal of consolation and hope; and, as the virtues of Napoleon will always serve as an example to his successors, to teach them the art of governing nations, the living remembrance of your goodness will teach their august consorts, that the care of drying up tears is the most effectual means of preserving an empire over all hearts. The senate thinks itself happy in the opportunity of being the first to salute you empress, and he who has the honor of being its organ, takes the liberty to hope, that you will deign to reckon him among the number of your most faithful servants."

The "organic senatus consultum" was then proclaimed by the emperor. It consisted of 151 articles, forming a totally new constitution.

The following is a summary of the principal points relating to Bonaparte and his family.

"The government of the republic shall be confided to Napoleon Bonaparte, under the title of emperor, and justice shall be administered in his name, by officers appointed by him.

"The imperial dignity shall be hereditary in the family of Bonaparte, in the direct line of descent by order of primogeniture, to the exclusion of females.

"The power shall be given to Bonaparte, provided he have no male issue, to adopt an heir from amongst the children and grand-children of his brothers, provided they have attained the age of eighteen years. On the failure of this limitation, the imperial dignity shall devolve first to Joseph Bonaparte, and his male issue; and, on failure of those; to Louis Bonaparte, and his male issue; and, finally, on failure of those branches, an emperor is to be nominated by the senate. The members of the imperial family, in the order of inheritance, shall bear the title of prince, and the eldest son of the emperor that of imperial prince.

"The education of those princes shall be under the direction of the senate. They are prohibited from marrying without the consent of the emperor. Any marriage so contracted to incur the privation of the right of inheritance, both of the individuals and their descendants.

"The minority of the emperor shall cease at the age of eighteen. Until he arrives at that age, his functions shall be administered by a regent, the rules for whose appointment are prescribed, and his powers limited, from which office females are excluded."

The first exercise of the imperial authority, was the nomination of his imperial highness Prince Joseph Bonaparte to the dignity of grand elector; his imperial highness Prince Louis Bonaparte to that of constable of France; Consul Cambaceres to be arch-chancellor of the empire; Consul Lebrun to be arch-treasurer. These persons then took the prescribed oaths, in presence of the emperor.

The arch-chancellor then presented the ministers and the secretary of state, who likewise took the oaths.

The constable presented Generals d'Avoust and Bessieres. General Murat, Governor of Paris, was also presented; and General Duroc, who took the oaths, as governor of the imperial palace.

On the same day a letter had been addressed to each of the consuls, Cambaceres and Lebrun, notifying to them the change in their titles.

It was likewise ordered that the French princes and princesses should be addressed by the title of their imperial highnesses, and the sisters of the emperor to be of that number. The great officers of the empire to receive the title of their serene highnesses; and they, as well as the princes, to be addressed monseigneur. The secretary of state and the ministers to have the titles of their excellencies. The functionaries of the departments, and those who present petitions, to address them by the title of monseigneur. The president of the senate to have the title of excellency; and the marshals of the empire, when addressed in writing, to have the title of monseigneur.

On the 20th of May, the Generals Berthier, Murat, Moncey, Jourdan, Massena, Angereau, Bernadotte, Soult, Brune, Lasnes, Mortier, Ney, d'Avoust, Bessieres, Kellerman, Lefevre, Perignon, and Serurier, were promoted to the rank of marshals of the empire.

Bonaparte then notified his elevation to the bishops of France, by letters of a similar tenor to the following, addressed to the Archbishop of Paris.

"Cousin, the happiness of the French has always been the dearest object of my thoughts, and their glory that of all my labours. Called by divine providence, and the constitution of the republic, to the imperial power, I see, in this new order of things, only greater means of assuring, both at home and abroad, the prosperity and dignity of the country. I repose with confidence in the powerful succour of the Most High. He will inspire his ministers with the desire of seconding me by all the means in their power. They will enlighten the people by instruction; in preaching to them the love of their duties, obedience to the laws, and the practice of all the christian and civil virtues. They will call down the benedictions of heaven upon the nation, and upon the supreme chief of the state. I write you this letter, that, as soon as you have received it, you will cause Veni Creator and Te Deum to be sung in all the churches of your diocese, and that you may invite to the prayers at your church, those authorities that have been in the habit of assisting at ceremonies of this kind; and that you may order a sermon to be preached in all the churches of your diocese, on the subject of the organic sénatus consultum of the 28th Floreal last; and assuring myself that you will, by your own example, excite the zeal and piety of all the faithful in your diocese, I pray God to have you, my cousin, in his holy and worthy keeping."

A circular letter was also addressed to them, on the same occasion, by Cardinal Caprara, legate a latere, resident in France, which was to the following effect:

"My lord, Napoleon Bonaparte having been appointed emperor of the French, you are to make use of the following prayer.

"O Lord, preserve our emperor, Napoleon, instead of that which was ordained by the concordat passed between the holy apostolic chair and the government of France. After this the following prayer may be recited, as it has already been used in the imperial chapel: 'O God, the protector of all kingdoms, and especially of the French empire, grant unto thy servant Napoleon, our emperor, that he may know and further the wonders of thy power, to the end that he whom thou hast appointed our sovereign, may be always powerful through thy grace;' which I accordingly notify to your greatness, declaring myself, at the same time, your greatness's true servant."

On the 28th of May, this event was officially announced by the French chargé d'affaires to the diet at Ratisbon, and a similar notification was made to the several foreign courts.

Regulations for the coronation were laid down by an imperial decree, dated from the palace of St. Cloud, July the 9th. This ceremony was appointed to take place in the month of November following, (the 18th Brumaire), and certain of the public functionaries from the several departments, together with detachments from the different military corps were summoned to attend at Paris on the occasion.

Whilst the French government was thus seriously engaged in making arrangements for placing the crown of France on the head of Bonaparte, the general conduct of that power was looked upon with a jealous eye by many of the cabinets of Europe. Those most exposed to the effects of the violence of the new emperor, contemplated his encroachments and their own debasement in silence; but Russia and Sweden openly avowed their sentiments.

On the 21st of July a very dignified and circumstantial note, characteristic of the honorable and disinterested sentiments which have long distinguished the councils of the court of St. Petersburg, was presented, in reply to the evasive and insulting note from M. Talleyrand, of the 26th of May, (already mentioned,) by M. d'Oubril, the Russian chargé d'affaires at Paris. It was therein stated, that his court had justly disapproved his having received a paper which did not convey an answer to his preceding official communications, and was by no means fit to be laid before his august sovereign. That its contents consisted of assertions not only unfounded, but wholly unconnected with the note of the 22d of April. That the emperor, already moved by the calamities by which a great portion of Europe was oppressed, and by the dangers which threatened the German empire, whose interests Russia was particularly bound to support, in conformity to her obligations, received intelligence of another violation of the law of nations, which was perpetrated at Ettenheim. He, therefore, conceived himself bound to incite the assembled states of the German empire to concur with him, in protesting against the conduct of the French government, to whom his majesty communicated the same sentiments, in hopes that reparation would be offered to the German league, and the fears entertained by Europe, of a repetition of similar outrages, allayed. The evasive reply which was made to so plain a declaration, was offensive to Russia, to the German empire, and to France herself.—"We live no longer in those barbarous times," recited the note, "when every country regards only her immediate advantages; modern polity has introduced certain principles respecting the interest of the whole community of states." No state could view with indifference the event already mentioned, which gave such a dreadful blow to the independence and security of nations. By the peace of Teschen, Russia undertook to guarantee and mediate for the German empire; in this quality, his imperial majesty was not merely justified in raising his voice on this occasion, but was absolutely bound to do so.

Russia at this time entertained not the least inclination for war, nor could she be benefited by it: it was the emperor's desire to preserve his former relations with France, but upon no other ground than that of perfect equality. The first condition was, that the terms mutually agreed upon should be sacredly fulfilled, and on this condition only could the two states, after what had happened, enjoy their former relations of goodwill and amity.

The note presented by M. d'Oubril, Russian chargé d'affaires at Paris, to the French minister of foreign affairs, July 21, exhibited a correct and temperate exposure of the dispositions manifested by the French government, and the system of aggression uniformly pursued by that power. This paper thus concluded:

"The undersigned has been ordered to declare, that he cannot prolong his stay at Paris, unless the following demands be previously complied with. First, That, conformably to the 4th and 5th articles of the secret convention of the 11th of October, 1801, the French government shall cause its troops to evacuate the kingdom of Naples; and, when that is done, that it shall engage to respect the neutrality of that kingdom, during the present and any future war. Secondly, That, in conformity to the second article of the said convention, the French government shall promise to establish immediately some principle of concert with his imperial majesty, for regulating the basis upon which the affairs of Italy shall be finally adjusted. Thirdly, That it shall engage, in conformity to the sixth article of the convention aforesaid, and the promises so repeatedly given to Russia, to indemnify, without delay, the King of Sardinia, for the losses he has sustained. Fourthly, and lastly, That, in virtue of the obligations of mutual guarantee and mediation, the French government shall promise immediately to evacuate and withdraw its troops from the north of Germany, and enter into an engagement to respect, in the strictest manner, the neutrality of the Germanic body. The undersigned has to add, that he has received orders from his government to demand a categorical answer to these four points."

This note produced a reply, dated the 29th of July, abounding in invective, and full as unsatisfactory as the former one from the French government. It set forth, that France was justified in reproaching Russia with having neglected to perform her engagements; contracted by the secret convention of the 11th Vendemiaire, year 10, with having changed the government of the Seven Islands, without any concert or communication with France, and of having assembled large bodies of troops at Corfu; with having patronised the emigrants, and their projects against France; with having even placed herself in a posture of direct defiance to France, by ordering a court-mourning, as a mark of respect to the memory of an agent, in the pay of England, engaged in a criminal design against France, after this traitor had been condemned by the just decision of a tribunal of the French government, and had been executed in pursuance of his sentence. The glaring partiality manifested by Russia towards England, and the perfidious conduct of Count Marcoff, who had increased the differences between the two governments, and had engaged in all the wicked designs of the emigrants and disaffected persons in France. That these were the real causes of the disposition lately evinced by Russia towards France. That Russia must fulfil the stipulations by which both powers were mutually bound, before she could expect France to comply with them. That the conduct of Russia was that of a conqueror to the vanquished. It were to suppose that France could be intimidated by menaces. The history of the war which preceded the peace with Russia, proved that that power had no more right than any other to assume a haughty tone towards France: but if, notwithstanding all the solicitude of the Emperor of the French, to maintain the relations of peace and amity between the two countries, the Emperor of Russia should join his armies to those of England, the Emperor of the French, with the assistance of God and his arms, was not in a situation to fear any man."

This correspondence was terminated by a note, dated the 28th of August, presented to the French minister for foreign affairs, by M. d'Oubril. The allegations contained in the former Russian notes, were forcibly recapitulated, whilst the recriminations made by the French government, were triumphantly repelled. It was stated that the total inattention of the French government to the just claims and remonstrances of Russia, was evidence of the little value attached by the French government to its relations with her, and of its invariable determination to adopt for its conduct a line absolutely contrary to the principles of justice, and the laws of nations; which could by no means harmonize with the sentiments and principles professed by his Russian majesty. In short, nothing further remained for the undersigned than to declare, that all correspondence between the two powers having, by these means, become perfectly useless, must cease, and that his majesty the emperor only waited for intelligence of the departure of his chargé d'affaires from Paris, to signify to the French mission to quit his capital. As the present state of affairs had arisen solely from the conduct of the French government, upon it would depend the decision of the question, whether or not war was to be the consequence. In case it should compel Russia, either by fresh injuries or by provocations, aimed against her, or against her allies, or by still threatening more seriously the security and independence of Europe, his majesty would then manifest as much energy in the employment of those extreme means, which a just defence requires, as he had given proofs of patience, in resorting to the use of all the means of moderation, consistent with the maintenance of the honor and dignity of his crown. This important paper concluded, by M. Oubril demanding the necessary passports for his departure from France.

In the mean time a vigorous protest, dated July 27, was made on the part of the King of Sweden against the conduct of France, in violating the neutrality of the German empire, in the instance of the Duc d'Enghien.

The part which Sweden had taken in these transactions, was reflected upon in language the most offensive and personal to his Swedish majesty, in a paper which appeared in the French official journal, the Moniteur, of the 14th of August. He was there accused of inconsistency and folly; of intermeddling in a thankless office, when he could do neither good nor harm; of insulting his father-in-law in his capital of Carlsruhe, and of acting in a manner highly prejudicial to the interests of his brother-in-law the Elector of Bavaria, during his residence at Munich; and of having abandoned his allies, the Danes, to their fate, before the bombardment of Copenhagen. That France was perfectly indifferent to all his steps; but that she knew how to discriminate between a loyal and brave people, justly called the French of the North, and a young man, led astray by false notions, and unenlightened by reflection. This latter observation was evidently intended to disseminate that discord which had so frequently subsisted between the crown of Sweden and the people.

The effect of this indecent attack was an immediate notification to M. Caillard, French chargé d'affaires at Stockholm, that his Swedish majesty could not, consistently with his own dignity, and the honor of his crown, after such an insult had been offered to him, wherein a line of separation was perfidiously attempted to be drawn between his majesty and his subjects, permit any further diplomatic intercourse, either public or private, to subsist between the French legation at Stockholm and his majesty's government.

An order was likewise forthwith issued, whereby all French journals, of every description, and all future French publications, were strictly prohibited from being imported into Sweden.

It might well be observed, that "the French government had taken the determination invariably to adopt for its conduct, a line absolutely contrary to the principles of justice, and the law of nations:" for, every remonstrance addressed to that upstart cabinet, really seemed an additional motive for trampling upon all established principles of right. An adherence to the rules of justice and decorum was considered beneath the attention of that domineering power, as the attribute of weakness and pusillanimity; and unbecoming the energy and greatness of the regenerated nation. No opportunity was neglected where they could be set at defiance.

The recent expostulations, far from producing any change in their offensive system, served only to provoke further enormities. They had scarcely been expressed, when the neutrality of another independent member of the Germanic body was infringed, in the person of an accredited minister.

On the night of the 25th of October, a party of French troops passed the Elbe, (in consequence, as it was insultingly explained, of orders given by the minister of police at Paris) and seized Sir George Rumbold, the British chargé d'affaires to the Circle of Lower Saxony, at his country-house in the vicinity of Hamburg, under the pretext that he was concerned in plans similar to those attributed to Mr. Drake and Mr. S. Smith. This gentleman, together with the papers found in his possession, was forwarded, without delay, to Paris. On his arrival there he was confined in the Temple, and detained two days and as many nights. At length, on his being induced to sign a parole not to return to Hamburg, nor within a certain distance of the French territories, and having in vain demanded the restitution of his papers, he was conveyed to the coast, and embarked at Cherbourg, in a vessel carrying a flag of truce, which put him on board of his majesty's frigate Niobe, whence he was landed at Portsmouth.

This act of violence was the subject of an official note from Lord Hawkesbury to the cabinet of Berlin. But it appeared, that that court had previously made a remonstrance on the subject to the French government, to which the release of Sir George Rumbold was chiefly to be attributed.

While the French government was thus invading the liberties of the Northern States, it was not unmindful of its schemes of encroachment in the south of Europe. On the 20th of October, a convention was concluded with Genoa, by which France engaged to procure a peace for the Ligurian Republic with the Barbary States. If her endeavours in that respect failed, she promised to allow the vessels of the republic to carry French colours for their protection, and to permit the importation of Ligurian commodities, subject to certain duties, into Piedmont, Parma, and Placenza; and, in return for those equivocal advantages, the Ligurian republic engaged to furnish 6,000 seamen to France during the present war: she likewise ceded the harbours, dock-yards, arsenals, &c. and placed them at the disposal of the French government. And, as it was intended to construct, in the said dock-yards, ten ships of the line for France, the Ligurian republic engaged to enlarge, at her own expence, the basin, BOOK VI. sufficiently to receive those vessels. A new ship of the line, a frigate, and two corvettes, all complete, were, at the same time, placed at the disposal of France.

The period appointed for the coronation now approached. The preparations for that ceremony were framed upon an immense scale.—France was to be dazzled by its splendour and magnificence: the accomplishment of the measure itself was to establish the belief, throughout the world, in the solidity and permanence of Bonaparte's dominion. The arrogance of his conduct whilst this affair was pending, his defiance and contempt of other powers, no doubt flattered Frenchmen with the idea of their importance under his government; and, at the same time, conveyed a more general impression of his conscious security: and, the better to impose upon the ignorant and credulous, the pope was summoned to Paris, to place the imperial crown upon his head.

This humiliated potentate, on the 29th of October, previously to his departure from Rome, addressed an allocution to a consistory, wherein he extolled the merits of Bonaparte, for having, by the "Concordat," restored the catholic religion over his vast and populous territory. "The same most powerful prince," continued his holiness, "our dearest son in Christ, Napoleon, Emperor of the French, who has so well deserved of the catholic religion for what he has done, has signified to us his strong desire to be anointed with the holy unction, and to receive the imperial crown from us, to the end that the solemn rights which are to place him in the highest rank, shall be strongly impressed with the character of religion, and call down more effectually the benediction of heaven."

Thus a foreigner, who could be a Catholic, Mahometan, any thing or nothing, as necessity prompted, was accepted as an Emperor by a people who had previously murdered their legitimate king, and who had then bitterly railed against absolute power. On the 19th of November, Bonaparte, attended by a numerous military escort, and followed by an immense train of equipages, as brilliant as could be procured, filled with persons of the highest rank in the government, accompanied by the pope, proceeded through streets strewn with sand, and lined by a prodigious concourse of curious spectators, to the cathedral church of "Notre Dame," which edifice was decorated, for the occasion, both within and without, with all the sumptuousness which French ingenuity could devise. There his holiness performed a solemn service, anointed the emperor with the sacred unction, and placed the crown upon his majesty's head. To this ceremony, in the evening, succeeded plays, pantomimes, singing, music, dancing, fire-works, illuminations, fountains flowing with wine; in short, every thing that could amuse and divert a giddy, inconsiderate populace. Impartial persons, however, who were eye-witnesses of this exhibition, have intimated that it was far from exciting that degree of enthusiasm which so shining and costly a spectacle might be expected to produce on a people who, more than any other, delight in public shows: that none seemed to take a sincere interest in it but those in power, or who were immediately benefited by the existing order of things; and that the lowest classes made merry, and danced, apparently from no other motive than because they found themselves supplied, free of expense, with the means of indulging in their favorite recreations.

To put the seal to this transaction, and to stamp it with still greater weight, the conservative senate, in pursuance of a former resolution, presented themselves in a body, on the 1st of December, at the palace of the Thuilleries, and their president, François de Neufchateau, addressed the emperor in a prolix and turgid complimentary oration, to which his imperial majesty replied:—

"I ascend the throne, to which the unanimous wishes of the senate, the people, and the army, have called me, with a heart penetrated with the great destinies of that people, whom, from the midst of camps, I first saluted by the name of Great. From my youth, my thoughts have been solely fixed upon them, and I must add, here, that my pleasures and my pains are derived entirely from the happiness or misery of the people. MY DESCENDANTS SHALL LONG PRESERVE THIS THRONE. In the camps they will be the first soldiers of the army, sacrificing their lives for the defence of their country—as magistrates, they will never forget, that contempt of the laws, and the confusion of social order, are only the result of the imbecility and uncertainty of princes. You, senators, whose counsels and support have never failed me in the most difficult circumstances, your spirit will be handed down to your successors; be ever the props and first counsellors of that throne so necessary to the welfare of this vast empire."

The tribunate having assisted at a similar solemnity, thus concluded this memorable event.

The session of the legislative body opened December the 26th, on which occasion, the members were assembled in extraordinary state, to receive the emperor, who was seated on a throne erected for the purpose; and, in his presence, an oath, in the following terms, was administered to each of the legislators, separately: "I swear obedience to the constitutions of the empire, and fidelity to the emperor."

The emperor then rose, the legislators uncovered themselves, and his majesty addressed them as follows:—

"Deputies from the departments to the legislative body, and members of my council of state.—I am come, gentlemen, to preside at the opening of your session. My anxious desire is to impress a more imposing and august character on your proceedings. Yes, princes, magistrates, soldiers, citizens, we have all of us, in the course we have to run, but one object—the interest of the country. If this throne, to which providence and the will of the nation have raised me, be dear in my eyes, it is because that throne can only defend and maintain the most sacred interests of the French people. Unsupported by a vigorous and paternal government, France would have still to fear those calamities by which she has been afflicted. The weakness of the supreme power is the deepest misfortune of nations. As a soldier, or first consul, I entertained but one thought—as emperor, I am influenced by no other—and that is, every thing which contributes to the prosperity of France. I have had the good fortune to illustrate France with victories, to consolidate her by treaties, to rescue her from civil broils, and to revive among her inhabitants the influence of morals, of social order, and of religion. Should death not surprise me in the midst of my labours, I fondly hope I may transmit to posterity a durable impression, that must serve as an example or reproach to my successors. The minister of the interior will submit to you a statement of the situation of the empire. The deputation from my council of state will present to you different objects that are to occupy the legislature. I have given instructions that there be laid before you the accounts which my ministers have given me of their respective departments; I am fully satisfied with the prosperous state of our finances; whatever may be the expenditure, it is covered by the revenue.—How extensive soever have been the preparations imposed upon us, by the exigencies of the war in which we are engaged, I call upon my people for no new sacrifice. It would have been highly gratifying to me, on so solemn an occasion, to see the blessings of peace diffused over the world; but the political principles of our enemies, their recent conduct towards Spain, but too strongly speak the difficulties that oppose it. I am not anxious to enlarge the territory of France, but to assert its integrity. I feel no ambition to exert a wider stretch of influence in Europe, but not to descend from that which I have acquired. No state shall be incorporated with the empire; but I shall not sacrifice my rights, or the ties which bind me to the states that I have created. In bestowing the crown upon me, the people entered into an engagement to exert every effort which circumstances may require, in order to preserve, unsullied, that splen-dour which is necessary for their prosperity, and indispensable for their glory, as well as for mine. I am full of confidence in the energy of the nation, and in the sentiments it entertains for me; its dearest interests are the constant object of my solicitude.

“Deputies from the departments to the legislative body, tribunes, and members of my council of state. Your conduct, gentlemen, during the preceding session, the zeal with which you glow for your country, your attachment to my person, I hold as pledges of the assistance for which I call upon you, and which, I trust, I shall receive from you during the course of the present session.”

On the 31st, the annual report, on the state of the nation, was made to the legislative body.

This paper stated that the internal situation of France was what it was in the calmest times—every where the improvements of public and private property attested the progress of confidence and security—that all classes of the community, both military and civil, had testified their love of order, even during the absence of their immediate chiefs, (adverting to their attendance at the coronation)—that the sovereign pontiff had, from the banks of the Po. to those of the Seine, experienced a religious homage, the effect of attachment to the ancient doctrines, on the part of a people revering a sovereign raised to the throne by his piety and virtues—that the discovery of a plot, laid by an implacable enemy, had awakened the nation to her true interests, and taught her the value of hereditary power. After expatiating on the flourishing state of the empire, both at home and abroad, and construing, agreeably to their wishes, the dispositions of various other powers, this representation concluded with observing, that, “whatever might be the movements of England, the destinies of France were fixed: strong in her union, strong in her riches, and in the courage of her defenders, she would faithfully cultivate the alliance of her friends, and would not act so as either to deserve enemies, or to fear them. When England should be convinced of the impotence of her efforts to agitate the continent—when she should know that she had only to lose by a war without end or motives—when she should find that France would never accept any other conditions than those of the treaty of Amiens, and would never consent to leave to “her the right of breaking treaties at pleasure, by appropriating Malta, England will then have arrived at pacific sentiments.—Envy and hatred have but their day.”

THE power of France, at this time, was very considerable. By the treaties of Luneville and Amiens, Switzerland, Lombardy, Holland, and Tuscany, were left in that state of dependent alliance with the French nation, that scarcely the appearance of right remained to Austria or Russia to question his conduct, if Bonaparte thought fit to annex them to his empire, separately, or altogether. With respect to Spain, and even Portugal, his power over those unfortunate countries seemed every day to be more confirmed and absolute. These states appeared to have been abandoned to his discretion by the treaty of Amiens; and if he did not take immediate possession of them, it was because he knew, that he could, at any time, effect this object, and that it would create less alarm among the other powers of Europe, to subjugate them gradually, by the various acts of intrigue and interference to which their weak governments but too much exposed them.

Notwithstanding this immensity of power, we have shown, in the preceding chapter, that the magnanimity of the Emperor of Russia did not slumber. In pressing for the execution of a treaty, which had for its objects the guarantee of the independence of Naples, and that of procuring an indemnity to the King of Sardinia for the loss of his dominions, he had at once increased the bitter enmity of the French ruler, and acquired the confidence and admiration of whatever yet remained independent in Europe, who saw, in this generous and noble conduct, a principle of action which might, at a future moment, check the strides towards universal monarchy of the restless Corsican. The fruits of the line of conduct which the Emperor Alexander had thus chosen, were perceptible in some uneasy movements on the part of France, and were not unuseful to the cause of England, as it occasioned the removal to Italy of many of those battalions which, stationed at Boulogne, were to form a part of the invading army destined to conquer Great Britain.

At the commencement of the year 1804, Austria appeared actively employed in repairing the losses which her armies had sustained in the late war, and in placing her military establishments on the best possible footing. The Germanic empire had, at this period, been for some time agitated, in consequence of some very arbitrary measures resorted to by the Elector of Bavaria, to oppress the equestrian order in his territories in Franconia, acquired by the indemnities. That body, considering itself under the immediate protection of the head of the empire, appealed to the Emperor of Germany, who immediately interfered, and sent a most dignified and energetic remonstrance, in the capacity of its supreme chief, to the court of Munich; and also, at the same time, assured the equestrian order of his support, by ulterior means, against the elector. There could be little doubt but that, in this proceeding, the elector had either been secretly stimulated by France, or else had relied, with confidence, on the support of that power in any aggressive project he might form, which should tend to the diminution of the influence of Austria; but, to his utter disappointment and mortification, a short period had only elapsed, after the delivery of the imperial declaration in favor of the order, when the French ambassador to the Bavarian government expressed the displeasure of the first consul at the conduct of the elector towards the head of the German empire; which, of course, terminated the affair. In the whole of this transaction, as well as upon the seizure of Oberhaus by the Bavarian troops, which occurred the year before, Austria evinced a sufficient share of energy and decision, to convince France, that her spirit was not so broken, nor her consequence at so low an ebb, as to allow herself to be insulted with impunity. Bonaparte had, in these instances, certainly endeavoured to ascertain how far that power would bear the attempt to diminish her weight and consequence in the Germanic body, without having recourse to the chances of war in their vindication. The result of the experiment served to convince him, that there was a line of aggression which he must not pass, so long as he should think it prudent to continue at peace with Austria.

Though great was the animosity which existed between the courts of St. Peterburgh and Versailles after the much-lamented fate of the Duc d'Enghien, yet Russia and France were too remote from each other for an immediate commencement of hostilities. While the latter power was engaged in war with England, it was impossible that her navy could act against that of the emperor; nor had Russia, unallied with some intermediate power, the means of conveying troops sufficient to make any impression on the compact mass of the French territory. The year, therefore, was passed by both powers in making warlike preparations, and in the increase of their military establishments. Prussia still seemed warm in the interest of France, and Austria maintained a strict and guarded neutrality.

The assumption of the imperial dignity by Bonaparte, gave a new interest to the political concerns of Europe. As soon as that event was notified to the court of Vienna, the Emperor of Germany resolved, immediately, upon conferring the hereditary dignity of emperor upon the house of Austria. The patent for the purpose stated the object of this measure to be, "the preservation of that degree of equality which should subsist between the great powers, and the just rank of the house and state of Austria among the nations of Europe. As the emperor and the Germanic body had acquiesced, with scarcely an exception, in the increase of title in the French ruler; so, on the other hand, did the self-appointed Emperor of France offer no opposition to the Austrian house assuming the same hereditary dignity. The measure in itself, indeed, appeared indifferent in the eyes of all the sovereigns of Europe, except the King of Sweden, who presented a note thereon, at Ratisbon, declaring, "that he considered it as a matter that ought to be seriously weighed and discussed at the diet there sitting, and not as the subject of a verbal communication by the Austrian minister." But this step, however, excited some uneasiness in the political circles of almost every country in Europe, as it appeared to be an act undertaken in concert with France: that this mutual assumption of title was the fruit of a perfectly good understanding between these powers, and many feared, that there was still a farther connection between them; a conjecture not disproved by any event which took place within this year. The French journals even insinuated, that Austria was extremely jealous of the preponderant influence Russia had gained over the councils of the Porte, and of her approach to Dalmatia, by the occupation of Corfu.

But the power, in Europe, which was most undisguisedly hostile to the French government, was the King of Sweden. All his notes on the subject of the German empire, of what nature soever, teemed with expressions of the utmost severity against France and her upstart emperor.

In the spirit of retaliation, Bonaparte thought proper to have inserted, in his official public paper, the Moniteur, an article of the most offensive and galling nature to the feelings of that monarch. It treated, with the utmost contempt, those notes which the King of Sweden wrote, with so much precipitation, "as he travelled post through the different states of Germany;" it ridiculed his travels, and affected to consider his Swedish majesty as a very weak young man, deficient both in understanding and experience; it upbraided him with shamefully deserting the German empire, of which he now boasted he was the guarantee, and with the making a separate peace for himself; it concluded by declaring, that France considered both him and all his movements as unworthy of her attention. A personal attack of this nature, inserted in a journal of authority, could not fail of irritating the Swedish monarch to the greatest degree: he immediately ordered a note to be presented to the French chargé d'affaires, at Stockholm, announcing, that, after an insult of that nature, all intercourse must cease between the French legation and the Swedish government; and declaring the offensive expressions in the Moniteur to be "the improper, insolent, and ridiculous observations which Monsieur Napoleon Bonaparte allowed to be inserted in his journal." After a transaction of such a nature, it was evident that Sweden, as well as Russia, was prepared, the first opportunity which presented any prospect of success, to commence hostilities with Bonaparte.

The want of decision and energy in the councils of the British empire, at the commencement of the present year, had produced a considerable degree of torpor and despondency in the public mind. On the part of England, the war with France had assumed no decisive character; and its immense resources seemed entirely absorbed in providing means of defence against the threatened invasion. On the capture of a few ill-defended French and Dutch West India settlements, it appeared as if the energies of the country could go no farther, or make the slightest attempt to shake or produce any impression upon the vast mass of territory and power acquired by her ambitious and encroaching rival.—While, on the contrary, the ruler of the French, although he appeared unceasingly engaged in securing advantages in Italy and Germany, much more than equivalent to any which England could gain in colonial warfare, yet pursued with unremitting exertion the equipment of his armament at Boulogne, which at once menaced the country with invasion, and obliged the English to confine within their own islands, for home defence, a considerable portion of that army which might otherwise have been employed in foreign service. It was in vain that the British government attempted to raise the hopes of the nation at home, or gain respect abroad, by suggesting the probability of coalitions being formed on the continent against France. Unfortunately, however, for such views, the grounds which Mr. Addington's administration had assumed on commencing hostilities, were fatal to any rational hope of continental co-operation. The objects which were known to govern Great Britain on that measure, were such as totally disconnected her interests from those of the other European powers. In the king's declaration, indeed, some stress had been laid upon the usurpations of Bonaparte, and his attacks upon the liberties of other nations, but a long period of acquiescence to those arbitrary measures, had sufficiently proved that they would still have been submitted to, if France had consented to have left Malta in the possession of England. To Austria and Prussia it was, indeed, matter of indifference in whose hands that island remained; but with Russia the case was different: that power had views of her own upon Malta, and certainly could not but see, with displeasure, the determination of Great Britain on its retention. It, therefore, was not matter of surprise, that England should have begun the war, and hitherto continued it, without a single ally, or the possibility of acquiring one, if the restless violence of Bonaparte did not compel the greater powers of Europe into a system of common defence against his encroachments.

The first military operations of any consequence which occurred in the course of the year, was the capture of the English settlement of Goree, on the coast of Africa, by a small French force, under the command of the Chevalier Mahé, which effected a landing on the rocks to the east side of the town, where the surf raged with the least violence, on the morning of the 18th of January: and having overcome the small force which Colonel Frazer, the commandant, had posted there, succeeded in penetrating through the town, and in surprising the main guard, of which he gained possession, though with some loss, and in the course of the day reduced Colonel Frazer to the necessity of capitulating; the force of the English being reduced to twenty-five white men, and that of the enemy being considerably augmented by the landing of the whole strength of the expedition, which had been fitted out at Cayenne for this purpose. This conquest, however, did not long remain in the hands of the enemy. On the 7th of the March following, Captain Dixon, of his majesty's frigate Inconstant, with a store-ship and some sloops under his command, having arrived off the island of Goree, and suspecting the settlement to be in the hands of the enemy, dispatched his first lieutenant to ascertain the fact: who not returning, nor making the signal agreed upon, Captain Dixon commenced hostilities by cutting out a ship in the harbour, and stationing his small force in such a position as to cut off all succours from Senegal. On the following morning, as he was preparing to attack the town, he was agreeably surprised to see the English colours hoisted over the French, and shortly after received information that the garrison had capitulated to the officer sent on shore! He consequently stood into the harbour, anchored, and disembarked a sufficient number of troops to secure his conquest.—Thus was the settlement recaptured, and 300 black and white troops made prisoners, without a blow being struck.

Early in spring, a most heavy calamity occurred, in the loss of the Apollo frigate, of 38 guns, Captain Dixon, and the greater part of her convoy, off Cape Mondego, on the coast of Portugal. She had sailed from the Cove of Cork, in company with his majesty's ship Carysfort, and sixty-nine sail of merchantmen, bound for the West Indies, on the 26th of March. On the 2d of April, the Apollo and her convoy went on shore, and with difficulty twenty-nine of the latter were saved, and proceeded with the Carysfort frigate on their voyage.

The loss to England was, that of a fine frigate, her captain, many of her officers, and sixty of her crew, with forty sail of merchant ships, richly laden, and more than 500 seamen. The cause of this disastrous event was never ascertained.

It having been declared, that the safety of England required the formation of a more efficient government, Mr. Addington, instead of attempting a fruitless resistance against the three parties now united, viz. Mr. Pitt, Lord Grenville, and Mr. Fox, very wisely gave in his resignation. The following were the new arrangements which took place.

Mr. Pitt, first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer, vice Mr. Addington.

Lord Melville (late Mr. Dundas) first lord of the Admiralty, vice the Earl of St. Vincent.

Lord Harrowby, secretary of state for foreign affairs, vice Lord Hawkesbury.

Earl of Camden, secretary of state for the department of war and the colonies, vice Lord Hobart.

And Lord Mulgrave, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster (with a seat in the cabinet) vice Lord Pelham.

Of Mr. Addington's administration, the following cabinet-ministers retained their several situations in the government formed by Mr. Pitt, viz.

The Duke of Portland, president of the council.

Lord Eldon, lord-chancellor.

Earl of Westmorland, lord-privy-seal.

Earl of Chatham, master-general of the ordnance. And Lord Castlereagh, president of the board of control.

Lord Hawkesbury, secretary of state for foreign affairs, under the late minister, also adhered to the present, but his office was changed to the home department, vice Mr. Yorke.

The government of Ireland continued unchanged, with the exception of Mr. Wickham, chief secretary, who retired, from ill health, and was succeeded by Sir Evan Nepean. Nor were there any changes made in the law departments of either country.

The alteration in the different public offices were as follow:

The Right Hon. W. Dundas, secretary at war, vice Mr. Bragge.

Right Hon. George Canning, treasurer of the navy, vice Mr. Tierney.

Right Hon. G. Rose	} Joint paymasters of the forces, vice	{ Mr. Steele, Mr. Hiley Addington.
Right Hon. Lord C. Somerset,

Duke of Montrose, joint paymaster-general, vice Lord Auckland.

William Huskisson, esq.	} Secretaries to the treasury, vice	{ Mr. Vansittart, Mr. Sargent.
William Sturges Bourne, esq.

With various changes in the high offices in the king and queen's household.

Mr. Pitt was gazetted on the 12th of May, and on the 15th his accession to the office of prime-minister gave the country a new naval administration. At this period, the situation of the British marine was, indeed, critical. The total want of stores, the neglected state of the dock-yards, and the universal dissatisfaction which pervaded both its civil and military departments, called loudly for new men and new measures. True it is, that the perseverance and unshaken spirit of loyalty in that service, gave just cause for national exultation; and the blockading system was still continued by those, whose shattered ships and worn-out crews hardly enabled them to obey orders, which, when executed, could neither add to their own renown nor to the advantage of the nation. But deep and loud murmurs daily broke forth at the instances which occurred of the inefficiency of that measure, which nearly two years' experience had completely exposed; while, from the abandonment of the gun-boat armament, the enemy sailed along his own coast in perfect security, (with the exception of the capture of two or three of his vessels, which boisterous weather had driven into deep water,) and assembled his immense flotilla, destined for the invasion, at Boulogne, in defiance of the sort of force which the admiralty had confidently boasted was the only class proper to be effectively employed on such service. Scarcely a wind that blew that did not bring an account of losses at sea, originating in want of judgment. In fine, an opinion universally prevailed, that the very existence of the British navy depended upon a speedy change of the admiralty.

A perfect knowledge of the weakness of this branch of the government, induced Mr. Pitt here to direct his principal attack, and may be assigned as one of the means which enabled him, eventually, to overthrow Mr. Addington's administration. Under the circumstances of unparalleled difficulty in which the naval affairs were situated, it certainly was matter of the utmost moment to place at their head a successor to the Earl of St. Vincent, who should, at once, be able and popular, and possess sufficient talents to restore them to the prosperous condition in which they had been left by Earl Spencer. The appointment of Lord Melville (heretofore Mr. Dundas) as first lord-commissioner of the admiralty, appeared, therefore, utterly strange and unaccountable, as it was well known, that although as a statesman he had filled almost every high office under the various administrations of this country for the last twenty years, he was utterly unqualified, by his total ignorance of naval matters, for his proposed situation. Whether this nomination arose from the want of some other person, of sufficient abilities, in the narrow circle of Mr. Pitt's political adherents to occupy so important a trust, or, that it was his lordship's own ambition, certain it is, it at the time was predicted (and which subsequent events but too fatally proved) one, not founded in judgment, nor likely to revive the drooping laurels of the favorite service of the country.

On the 16th of May, an unsuccessful attempt was made by Commodore Sir Sidney Smith, in the Antelope frigate, and some sloops of war, to prevent the junction of the enemy's flotilla from Flushing with that at Ostend. The failure of success principally arose from the want of gun-boats, which, from the depth of water in which these vessels move, could alone act against the enemy with effect. Fifty-nine sail of the Flushing division reached Ostend in safety, and the English force, on the falling of the tide, were obliged to haul off into deep water, after being nearly a whole day engaged, and the loss of about fifty men in killed and wounded.

Intelligence of a far more flattering nature was received by the British government on the 22d of June, in dispatches from the commander-in-chief of the land and sea service in the Leeward Islands, announcing the capture of the Dutch colony of Surinam, with very little loss on the part of his majesty's troops. This expedition sailed from Barbadoes, under the command of Major-general Sir Charles Green, and Commodore Samuel Hood, who hoisted his broad pendant on board the Centaur. On the 25th following, the squadron came to anchor about ten miles off the mouth of the river Surinam. On the next day a corps of 600 men, under the command of Brigadier-general Maitland, was detached to effect a landing at the Warappa creek, about ten leagues to the eastward of the Surinam river, where the enemy occupied a post. The same day Brigadier-general Hughes, with the 64th regiment, took possession of Braam's Point, after some slight resistance from the fort which defends the entrance of the river Surinam, and on that and the following day the greater part of the fleet anchored in the river. The Dutch governor being now summoned, after some short delay, refused to capitulate. On the 29th it was determined to send 200 soldiers and seamen, under Brigadier-general Hughes, to try for a practicable rout through the woods, to come in the rear of the forts Leyden and Frederici, which formidable defences of the river it was considered unadvisable to attack in front. Accordingly, about eleven at night, this force landed at Resolution Plantation, and proceeded, led by negro guides. After a most laborious march, of nearly five hours, by paths always difficult, but then almost impassable, in consequence of the great quantity of rain which had fallen, the detachment arrived in the rear of the Frederici battery, which was immediately assaulted and taken, the enemy flying to Fort Leyden, first setting fire to the powder magazine, by which a few British officers and men were severely wounded. A repetition of the same gallantry at Fort Leyden was attended with similar success. The success of Brigadier-general Maitland's division, in effecting a landing at the Warappa creek, was equally complete. By these operations the junction between the latter corps and the main army could always be effected, and the command of the finest part of the colony was secured. On the 3d of May, Brigadier-general Maitland, having overcome every obstacle, came up the Commewine river, and was reinforced by a detachment from the main body. On the next day he advanced through a wood, and approached fort New Amsterdam, situated on the confluence of the Surinam and Commewine rivers, and defended by eighty pieces of ordnance, but which formed the last defence of the settlement. When on the point of investing the fortress on every side, a flag of truce arrived from the commander-in-chief of the Batavian troops, with proposals to surrender on terms of capitulation, which, after some modifications, were agreed to, and fort New Amsterdam was taken possession of the same evening, and with it the whole of the colony, of which, General Green said, "the inhabitants seemed greatly to rejoice at the event which had taken place, restoring them to the powerful protection of the British government, and the solid advantages arising therefrom."

On this occasion there likewise fell into the hands of the captors, the Proserpine frigate, of 32 guns, and the Pylades sloop of war, of 18; the quantity of ammunition, ordnance, and stores taken, was immense. The loss of the English force on this occasion did not amount, in killed and wounded, to more than sixty men, whilst the prisoners taken, (navy included) exclusive of staff and departments, exceeded 2,000. In this affair, the only conquest Britain had to boast over the enemy within the year, the valor and perseverance of her soldiers and sailors were eminently conspicuous.

In the month of August, an attempt was made on that part of the French flotilla which lay at anchor in the road of Boulogne, by Captain Owen, of the Immortalité frigate, and the sloops of war and cutters under his command, but with slender success. And on the 24th of July, and 2d of August, Captain Oliver, of the Melpomene, was equally unfortunate in his attempt upon the enemy's vessels in Havre Pier: some damage, however, was done to the town, by the shells and carcasses thrown into it on that occasion.

In consequence of Admiral Rainier's ignorance of the re-commencement of hostilities, the French admiral, Linois, having escaped from the roads of Pondicherry, carried on a predatory warfare against the English commerce and possessions in that part of the globe, to a considerable extent. Not only had he, in the Marengo line-of-battle ship, of 84 guns, and some frigates, captured several of the East India Company's ships, and others of the private trade, but he had also made a successful descent on Fort Marlborough (Bencoolen) and plundered the settlement. Flushed with his uninterrupted success, and in consequence of a pre-concerted project of the French government, he now determined on a bolder game. About the beginning of 1804 he cruized with his whole force in the Indian Seas, near the entrance of the Streights of Molacca, with an intention of capturing or destroying, at a single blow, the whole of the homeward-bound China fleet. In this measure, sufficiently well concerted, were his courage equal to his views, severe indeed would have been the consequence to Great Britain.

An official letter from Captain Dance, who acted as commodore, dated the 6th of August, to the court of directors of the East India company, announced his defeat of the French squadron, which had lain in wait for him, and doubtless considered him an easy and certain prey. On the 5th of February, the fleet under his command, as senior captain, consisting of fifteen company's ships from China, twelve country ships, a Portuguese East Indiaman, and a fast-sailing brig, (destined to execute the orders of the commodore till he had passed the Streights of Malacca,) passed Macao Roads, on the night of the 5th of February, when the Portuguese vessel, and one of the company's ships, the Rolla, parted company and never joined the fleet again. On the 14th the signal was made by the headmost ship, of four strange sail in the south-west, which, upon reconnoitring, were perceived to be an enemy's squadron, consisting of a line of battle ship, three frigates, and a brig. The signal was immediately made, by the intrepid commodore, for his fleet to form a line of battle in close order. At sun-set the enemy was close up with the rear of the company's ships, and an immediate action was supposed inevitable. The country ships were then placed by the commodore on the lee-bow, for their more perfect protection. At day-break on the 15th, the enemy was three miles to windward, lying-to; at this moment both fleets hoisted their respective colours, when the French displayed a rear-admiral's flag, and battle was offered to him by the English, if he chose to accept the challenge. At one in the afternoon, Commodore Dance, not wishing to wait an attack, and fearful that his rear might be cut off, executed a bold and gallant manœuvre, which decided the fate of the day. He made the signal to tack and bear down on the French line, and engage them in succession. This order being correctly performed, the company's fleet bore down upon the enemy, under a press of sail. Admiral Linois then closed his line, and opened his fire upon the headmost of the English ships, which was not returned by them till a nearer approach, but before the three leading-ships of the latter could get well into action, the enemy's squadron hauled their wind and stood away to the eastward, under all the sail they could set. At two the commodore made the signal for a general chase, and pursued his dastardly antagonists for two hours. Thus did the intrepid valour of a handful of British merchant ships, and the gallantry and presence of mind of Captain Dance, of the East India company's service, bring to action and put to flight a French admiral, commanding ships of war superior in force and in men, to the indelible disgrace of the French navy, and the immortal honor of the British name. Nor should it be forgotten, that the property, so rescued from the insatiate gripe of France, was estimated at a million and a half sterling! On the arrival of Commodore Dance in England with his fleet, rewards were distributed, with an unsparing hand, by the East India company, to the various commanders and their brave crews; the wounded, and the representatives of the few killed in the action, were nobly remunerated; and, to crown the whole, the gallant captain (afterwards Sir Nathaniel) Dance, received the honor of knighthood at his majesty's hands.

Towards the latter end of the year a great proportion of the enemy's flotilla having assembled in safety and in considerable force at Boulogne, the alarm of invasion universally prevailed. It was at this period, that a project for its destruction was set on foot, of the success of which the greatest hopes were entertained, as it was well known, that Mr. Pitt and the first lord of the admiralty had given it their entire approbation, and that the partizans of the government anticipated a result which should at once confound the designs of France, and establish the superiority of the present naval administration over their predecessors in office.

This plan was one which, to every experienced naval officer, appeared open to the severest animadversion. It was principally to be carried into effect through the medium of copper vessels, of an oblong form, containing a quantity of combustibles, and so constructed as to explode in a given time, by means of clock-work. These vessels were to be towed and fastened under the bottoms of the enemy's gun-boats, by a small raft, rowed by one man, who being seated up to the chin in water, might possibly escape detection in a dark night. Fire-ships, of different construction, were also to be employed in this projected attack. The most active and enterprising officers were distributed in the different explosion vessels, and the whole put under the orders and direction of Admiral Lord Keith, commanding in the Downs, who was to cover the smaller force with his powerful squadron. The appearance of 150 of the enemy's flotilla on the outside of the pier of Boulogne, determined the moment of attack, and an early day in October was fixed upon for this important operation. It is not easy to describe the mingled sensation of anxiety and confidence, which the length of time, and the extent of the preparation for this enterprise had created in the public mind. The latter, however, far predominated, and was confirmed by the rumours which were industriously spread, that the first lord of the admiralty would himself superintend the execution of his plan, and that Mr. Pitt and other of the ministers were to be witnesses of its success from the elevation of Walmer castle. To such a pitch had this infatuation risen, that accounts in the public papers were published, on the first moment it was possible that the issue of the contest could be known in the metropolis, announcing, in the most enthusiastic and exaggerated terms, its complete success, in the utter destruction of 150 of the enemy's ships (the whole number on the outside of the pier) and congratulating the country on the acquisition of such a naval minister as Lord Melville, for whom they claimed the whole merit of the plan, and no small share of that of its execution! The joy and exultation to which those fabrications, (which were, doubtless, written in anticipation of the event) gave birth, were lowered gradually by the non-appearance of official statements; and when Lord Keith's account appeared some few days afterwards, totally subsided, and gave way to sentiments of a very opposite nature.

On the 2d of October, Admiral Lord Keith, with his formidable fleet, anchored at about a league and half from the north to the west of the port of Boulogne. In the course of the day, a sufficient force was thence detached to take up an advanced and convenient anchorage for covering the retreat, and to give protection to wounded men, or to boats which might be crippled; or, should the wind freshen, and blow in shore, to tow off the boats in general. While these preparations were going forward, the enemy was not inattentive or negligent in preparing his defences: the batteries were prepared, and the army drawn up in readiness for what might happen. At a quarter past nine, under a heavy fire from the advanced force, and which was returned by a tremendous one from the shore, the first detachment of fire-ships was launched. As they approached the French line, the vessels of the flotilla opened to let them through, and so effectually were they avoided, that they passed to the rear of the line without falling on board of any one of them.

At half-past ten the first explosion-ship blew up; it produced an immense column of fire; its wreck spread far and wide, but not the slightest mischief was done either to the ships or the batteries. A second, a third, and a fourth, succeeded no better: at length, after twelve had been exploded, the engagement ceased about four o'clock on the following morning; and the English smaller vessels withdrew in perfect order, and without the loss of a man. No mischief whatever was ascertained to be done to the flotilla, but, from the missing two brigs and some smaller vessels in their line, the next day, Lord Keith thought it possible they might be destroyed. The French reports acknowledged the loss of twenty-five men in killed and wounded. Thus terminated, to the confusion of the projectors, and the bitter disappointment of the public, an enterprize, in the preparation of which much time, expence, and ingenuity were wasted, and which fully committed the reputation of the government of the country to derision and contempt, both at home and abroad.

The invention on which so much reliance had been placed was not new: it had been experimented during the American war, by the rebel force against some English ships, in situations much more calculated to secure success to such a mode of attack than those at Boulogne, and had completely failed. It evinced, therefore, a great absence of common knowledge, as well as of professional information in the admiralty, to countenance, for a moment, this base and contemptible species of warfare, which henceforward was, in derision, termed "The CATAMARAN PROJECT," and which most deservedly fell into utter discredit after the first attempt had been made; nor were the public surprised or disappointed when a subsequent attack, by the same means, upon Fort Rouge, and the flotilla protected by it, in the harbour of Calais, was thoroughly unsuccessful. The public were now divided in sentiment, whether "The Stone Expedition" of the last year, or "The Catamaran" of the present, had more imposed upon their credulity, or were more deserving of reprobation. But it was recollected, that the latter was planned under the auspices of a man utterly ignorant of nautical affairs, whilst the former had its origin under those of one of the first naval characters of the age.

It is by no means necessary to detail some further attempts which were made, late in the year, by Captains Owen and Hancock, to prevent the junction of various portions of the enemy's flotilla at Boulogne, by the British cruisers, as they were attended with little or no remarkable success. In those efforts, the usual gallantry of the English character was uniformly, though unsuccessfully displayed, and many valuable lives were fruitlessly sacrificed.

The last transaction of the year which we have to notice, was the attack upon, and capture of, the Spanish homeward-bound treasure-ships, which was effected by Captain Moore, of the Indefatigable, and three other frigates under his command, off Cadiz. On the 5th of October, Captain Moore, who had been detached from the channel fleet for the purpose, fell in with four large Spanish frigates, which, upon being hailed (to induce them to shorten sail) without effect, were fired upon by the English force. A parley then ensued, when Captain Moore informed the Spanish rear-admiral, that he had orders to detain his squadron, and earnestly wished to execute them without blood-shed, but that his determination must be immediate. The officer dispatched on this message returning with an unsatisfactory answer, an engagement immediately ensued, each of the English frigates taking an antagonist. In less than ten minutes, one of the enemy's frigates blew up with a tremendous explosion. In half an hour more, two more of the Spaniards surrendered, and the fourth, after an attempt to escape, was captured long before sunset. The loss, on the part of the English squadron, was very trifling; that of the Spaniards was (independently of 240 lives lost by the explosion of the frigate) nearly 100 in killed and wounded. The ships thus captured were conveyed to England in perfect safety, and their lading was found to be of immense value, in coined and uncoined gold and silver, and precious merchandize, the produce of Spanish America.

A most melancholy circumstance took place in consequence of the explosion of the Mercedes, one of the Spanish squadron. In it was embarked a native of Spain, who was returning from America with his whole family, consisting of his lady, four daughters, and five sons. The daughters were beautiful and amiable women, the sons grown up to manhood. With such a family and a large fortune, the gradual savings of twenty-five years industry, did this unhappy man embark for his native country. A short time before the action began, he, with one of his sons, went on board the largest of the ships, and in a few minutes became the spectator of his wife, his daughters, four of his sons, and all his treasure, surrounded with flames, and sinking in the abyss of the ocean. This victim of almost unheard-of calamity, arrived at Plymouth, with the only remains of so many blessings, in Captain Moore's cabin, who was unceasing in his endeavours to administer all in his power towards the alleviation of his sufferings.

The justice of this procedure was called in question by many, since it took place before any formal declaration of war against Spain. To vindicate this conduct, it was said, that these vessels were only kept as hostages till Spain should give a satisfactory account of her formidable preparations, and the carnage on this occasion was charged to the account of the Spanish commander.

Spain declares War against England.—Animosity of the French Emperor.—His Letter to the King of Great Britain.—The Reply, and consequent Anger, of Bonaparte.—Preparations for the Invasion of England.—Bonaparte's Journey to Milan, where he is crowned King of Italy.—Genoa annexed to France.—Return of Bonaparte to Paris.—Treaty between Great Britain and Russia.—Accession of Austria and Sweden.—Remonstrances against the French Encroachments.—The French Emperor abandons his Project of invading England.—His Preparations for destroying the Combination formed against him.—Conduct of Austria towards Bavaria.—Bonaparte leaves Paris, and puts himself at the Head of his Army.

THE seizure of the Spanish treasure-ships immediately produced war between England and Spain. This act could easily have admitted of explanation and satisfaction; but the Spanish government demanded neither. Totally influenced and controlled by France, who was exasperated in the highest degree at seeing her prey snatched from her grasp; in obedience to her command, she issued a declaration of war against England, Dec. 12. The Spanish manifesto allowed, in its onset, "the extreme difficulty of Spain or Holland avoiding a war with the enemies of France, when the connections with the latter power were considered—" and rested the propriety of the conduct of the court of Madrid on an implied promise, if not an actual convention, that its neutrality should be strictly observed and respected by England, upon certain conditions, which it asserted and declared Spain had adhered to rigorously. To support this reasoning, the only fact adduced was, that Mr. Frere, in one of his notes declared, that his Britannic majesty wished, as long as possible, to suspend the period of hostilities, if certain conditions were adhered to; that Spain strictly observed them, and that, therefore, the British government was bound, by their own declaration, not to commence hostilities. These grounds for defending the Spanish declaration of war, were, it must be confessed, extremely narrow.

On the other hand, the British government positively denied that any such convention or declaration ever existed. That there was no system of public law which could countenance the principle, that the mere implied or constructive promise of an existing administration, at home, should have the power to bind every succeeding government to acquiesce in a conduct of actual hostility, carried on by a third power, under the name of neutrality. That the order to detain the treasure-ships was justified by the information then received; and that the execution of it was rather in the nature of an embargo and a precautionary measure, which might admit of explanation and satisfaction, than one of actual hostility. And, finally, that the war so much complained of, was the act of Spain, her declaration being, in point of fact, the first unequivocal and irretrievable measure of hostility which took place between the two countries.

BOOK VI. Such were the material points of argument upon which the governments of Spain and Great Britain rested their justification.

CHAP. VII.

1804-5.

The subject was warmly debated in both houses of parliament, and wide differences of opinion undoubtedly existed as to the justice and equitable conduct of the administration throughout this transaction. A great majority, however, seemed to allow, that Great Britain had abundant cause of provocation, and that an absolute necessity existed for attacking Spain.

The unceasing jealousy and hatred of the French government towards that of England, were sufficiently manifested in this affair, but the sentiments of the French were never more strongly depicted than in Bonaparte's address to the members composing the legislative body of the nation, on the very last day of the year.

After informing this body, that however extensive the preparations for war had been, yet the flourishing condition of the country rendered it unnecessary to impose fresh burdens upon, or demand new sacrifices from, his people; it would have been grateful to him, he added, at so solemn an epoch, to see peace reigning throughout the world, but the political principles of their enemies, and their recent conduct towards Spain, sufficiently made known the difficulty of it. He had no ambition to exercise in Europe a greater influence, but he would not sink in that which he had acquired. No state should be incorporated in the empire, but he would not sacrifice his rights, nor the ties that attached him to the states which he had created!

In order, however, that neither his own subjects, nor those of the other sovereigns of Europe, should remain in ignorance of his sentiments, some short time after, he caused his legislature to be informed, through the medium of the proper functionary, (after dilating upon the strength, resources, and general prosperity of every part of the French empire, the valor of his troops, his confidence in the prowess of his navy, and the flourishing state of his finances,) that "whatever may be the movements of the English, the destiny of France is fixed. Strong in the riches and courage of its defenders, she will faithfully cultivate the alliance of friendly nations. France will neither merit enemies nor fear them. When England shall be convinced of the impotence of her efforts to agitate the continent, when she shall feel that she cannot but lose in a war, without motive or object, that France will never accept of any other conditions than those of the treaty of Amiens, and never will consent that she shall exercise the right of breaking, at pleasure, those treaties, by appropriating Malta to herself, then England will really obtain pacific sentiments,—hatred and envy exist but for a time."

Having thus laid down, with a tone sufficiently confident and decisive, the only terms upon which he would accord peace to England, Bonaparte resolved to address his Britannic majesty personally, and in a letter written with his own hand, dated January 2, 1805, he deprecated the further continuance of a war, in the prosecution of which so much useless blood was shed, without any view or object whatever; he thought it no disgrace to take the first step towards conciliation, in a moment which afforded the most favorable opportunity to silence the passions, and listen only to the sentiments of humanity and reason. He abjured his majesty not to deny himself the happiness of giving peace to the world, nor to leave that delightful task to his children. He reminded the British monarch, that the latter had gained more, in the last ten years, both in territory and riches, than the whole extent of Europe; that his country was at the highest pitch of prosperity, and could only hope to form another coalition of some powers upon the continent against France. But that the only effect of such a measure would be to increase the preponderance and continental greatness of that country. "Did England hope to renew the internal troubles of France, or destroy her finances, or deprive her of her colonies? A war would produce no such effects: the French were happy; a flourishing state of agriculture was the support of their finances, and the colonies were but a secondary object to France; besides, had not the King of England, at that moment, more than he knew how to preserve?" After some more reasoning of the same kind, this curious document concluded, in a high-wrought strain of pathetic expostulation, in the following words:—"If your majesty would but reflect, you must perceive, that the war is without an object; without any presumable result to yourself. Alas! what a melancholy prospect! To cause two nations to fight for the sake of fighting! The world is sufficiently large for our two nations to exist in it; and reason is sufficiently powerful to discover means of reconciling every thing, when the wish for reconciliation exists on both sides. I have, however, fulfilled a sacred duty, and one which is precious to my heart."

It must be evident, that the ruler of France had little else in view, when making this extraordinary overture, than that of indulging himself in the exercise of an act of indecorous presumption, and the satisfaction of indulging himself in the assumption of that tone of equality, with his brother the King of Great Britain, to the use of which he considered himself entitled by his novel dignity of Emperor of the Gauls. Perhaps, too, he was not averse from the desire of appearing in the eyes of Europe as anxious for peace; and proposed to himself the taking great credit with the continent for the magnanimity of this offer, while England, on the contrary, by listening to the overtures thus made, would render those powers, yet friendly towards her, shy, and suspicious of a closer connection; or if she rejected them, would appear that ruthless and unappeasable disturber of the general tranquillity, which was in truth the character of her wily opponent. Be that, however, as it may, it is observable, that, in this important state paper, there is no longer to be found that tone of arrogant superiority which characterised the language of the French government in the preceding year: no reference to the impossibility of England contending "single-handed" with France, nor any apparent wish to consider the former but as a powerful and equal rival.

Early in the month of February, this letter was communicated to the legislative body, by order of Bonaparte, together with the answer to it, written by one of the principal secretaries of state of the British government, and addressed to M. Talleyrand, the French minister for foreign affairs. In this reply, to which it is impossible to refuse the character of dignity, temper, and moderation, Lord Mulgrave acknowledged, on the part of his Britannic majesty, the receipt of a letter from the head of the French government. That there was nothing nearer to the heart of his majesty, than the obtaining the blessings of peace for his people, provided that it were such as would secure it to them permanently, and guard the essential interests of his states; that this great end could only be obtained by arrangements which should also ensure the tranquillity of the rest of Europe. That, conformably to this sentiment, his majesty could not attend more particularly to the overture which had been made him, until he should have consulted the powers of the continent, with whom he was engaged in confidential connections and relations, more particularly with the court of St. Petersburg; and concluded with a well-merited eulogium upon the Emperor Alexander.

M. Segur, in presenting the above, introduced them with a speech, which plainly evinced that the French government was by no means pleased with the answer they had received. He denied the existence or the chance of a coalition on the continent of Europe against France; he asserted that Russia would not embark in a war merely to gratify England, and that the emperor had received the most unequivocal testimonies of the amicable dispositions of Austria and Prussia. In a word, that the hopes of England, in a third coalition, were vain and chimerical, and that "it only remained for French bravery to display its whole energy, and to triumph, at last, over that eternal enemy to the liberty of the seas and the repose of nations."

The two other great public bodies, the tribunate and the conservative senate, were also at this period separately addressed by the proper functionaries, to the same effect with the oration of M. Segur. Both contained only illustrations, corollaries, and amplifications of the same scheme and design, namely, the presenting a flattering picture of the French resources and government upon the one hand, and on the other, to falsify and discolour the truth, in every particular, connected with Great Britain and her continental allies. From the speech of M. Talleyrand, however, to the tribunate, it seemed that it was the wish of the French government, that this overture should be considered as yet open, and, that after Russia had been consulted, farther discussions, of an amicable nature, might take place. "The character that pervades this answer," said the orator, "is vague and indeterminate. One single idea only presents itself with some precision, that of having recourse to foreign powers, and this idea is by no means pacific; a superfluous interference ought not to be appealed to, if there be not a desire to embarrass the discussions and to render them endless. The ordinary consequence of all complicated negotiations is to weary out good intentions and to throw back nations into a war, become more furious from the vexation of an unsuccessful attempt at accommodation.—Nevertheless, on a question regarding a multitude of interests, and of passions which have never been in unison, we should not rest upon a single symptom. Time will soon develop to us the secret resolutions of the government of England. Should they be just and moderate, the calamities of war will cease: should, on the contrary, this first appearance of accommodation prove but a false light, intended only to answer speculations of credit; to facilitate a loan, the acquisition of money, purchases, or enterprises, then we shall know how far the dispositions of the enemy are implacable and obstinate; we shall have to banish all hope from a dangerous lure, and trust without reserve to the goodness of our cause, to the justice of Providence, and to the genius of the emperor."

Corresponding with the tone and temper of those angry ebullitions, the French official gazette at the same time published the speech of the King of England to his parliament, with a comment upon each paragraph, indicative of the same sentiments as had pervaded the orations. The whole of these manifestoes already alluded to, (for they can be considered in no other light than as such,) concluded with general denunciations of vengeance against the shores of Britain, which were threatened with immediate and irresistible invasion; and against its government, whose very existence was menaced by the exhaustion which BOOK VI. the country must endure from a continuance of the present formidable posture of France, for ten years to come!

CHAP. VII.

But whatever were the views of the French emperor, in having thus extended the olive-branch, and his holding out to Europe that it was possible it might yet be accepted, it is certain, that no means were left unattempted by him, which could increase and consolidate his power, or annoy that enemy who could alone check his career and put bounds to his ambition. His flotilla, destined for the invasion of England, was hourly augmenting, and becoming more concentrated at Boulogne, the common place of rendezvous. Powerful batteries were erected for the protection of this flotilla, the numbers of which were truly formidable. The army destined for the same purpose, and encamped on the heights commanding the town and harbour of Boulogne, had now increased to upwards of 100,000 men, perfectly disciplined, under the command of the best officers of France, and constantly exercised in embarking and re-landing in and from the flotilla, with a view of perfecting them in the great object of their destination.

Although the French ruler had assumed the title of Emperor of the Gauls, respect for the form of government he had so recently established in the northern and middle provinces of Italy, induced him to forego, at the moment of his advancement to the imperial diadem, the personal sovereignty of that country, and which still therefore retained the name of "republic," of which Bonaparte was the nominal head.

The entire success, however, of the experiment which the emperor had tried upon the feelings of the French nation, and the acquiescence of the greater part of the European courts to the assumption of his new dignity, emboldened him, in the course of the present year, to extend his views of family aggrandizement, and the iron crown of Charlemagne was destined to circle the brows of Bonaparte. Policy, and the lust of conquest, had, no doubt, an equal share with ambition, in exciting him to seek this honor. The southern provinces, and fertile island of Sicily, operated upon the mind of the French emperor, who disguised his real intentions.

In affected compliance with the addresses sent from the various constituted authorities of the Italian republic, Bonaparte, accompanied by his empress, set off for Milan, where he arrived early in the month of May. Meetings were immediately convened, and the whole republic, at the feet of Bonaparte, humbly besought him to relieve them from the burden of governing themselves, and to take upon himself, and his heirs, the Italian diadem. To this flattering request the French emperor was not found inexorable; and, on the 26th day of May, he added to his other titles that of "King of Italy." The coronation took place at Milan, with the utmost splendour, solemnity, pomp, and the most imposing magnificence. The emperor, seated on a superb throne, having on his right the honors of the empire, on the left the honors of Italy, and before him the honors of Charlemagne, was invested with the usual insignia of royalty by the cardinal archbishop, and finally ascending the altar, seized upon the celebrated iron crown there deposited, and placed it upon his head, saying, at the same time, with a loud voice, and in a tone of defiance, (it being a part of the ancient ceremonial on the enthroning of the Lombard kings) the remarkable words—" Dieu me la donne; gare à qui la touche!" (God gives it to me; beware those who touch it!)

After the ceremony, than which nothing could be more magnificent, a constitutional code, being the third which this country had received from France, was communicated to the states, and eagerly accepted by them. The most remarkable of its provisions were, the placing the regal authority solely in the person of Bonaparte, with the privilege of naming his successor; after which, however, the crown, with certain limitations, was to be hereditary. It was decreed that, hereafter, the monarch must constantly reside within the Italian States; but that, while the present king retained the crown of Italy, he might cause himself to be represented by a viceroy, who must, however, reside within the boundaries of the kingdom. After the death of Bonaparte, the kingdom of Italy must never again be vested in the same person with that of the French empire, but be entirely disparted and separated from it; and ample means were allowed and provided for the maintenance of the regal dignity, the endowment of the queen, and every other expense incident to the high station the country had placed in the hands of Napoleon, the first of that name, King of Italy.

Immediately after the promulgation of this body of laws, Prince Eugene, (Beauharnois) son-in-law to the new monarch, was appointed viceroy:—a new order of knighthood was instituted, that of "the iron crown," with considerable revenues attached to it; and the organization of the new kingdom was entirely arranged and completed.

By causing himself to be crowned King of Italy, the French emperor meant to strengthen his frontiers, and guard against his inveterate enemy, the King, or rather the Queen of Naples. He had now resolved to unite Genoa to his own territory; this also took place at Milan; on the 4th of June, the Doge of Genoa, in a full meeting of the great officers of state, intreated the French emperor to grant the Genoese the happiness of being his subjects. He returned the following answer:—

“ I will realize your wish ; I will unite you to my great people. It will be to me a new means for rendering more efficacious the protection I have always loved to grant you. My people will receive you with pleasure. They know that, in all circumstances, you have assisted their arms with friendship, and have supported them with all your means. They find besides, with your ports, an increase of maritime power, which is necessary to them to sustain their lawful rights against the oppressors of the seas. You will find, in your union with my people, a continent. You have only ports and a marine. You will find a flag, which, whatever may be the pretensions of my enemies, I will maintain, on all the seas of the universe, constantly free from insult, and from search, and exempt from the right of blockade, which I will never recognize but for places really blockaded, as well by sea as by land. You will find yourselves sheltered under it from this shameful slavery, the existence of which I reluctantly suffer with respect to weaker nations, but from which I will always guarantee my subjects.”

Having arranged all his weighty affairs, he left Italy, and arrived at Paris on the 12th of August, from whence he repaired without delay to Boulogne, to organise his army and flotilla for the invasion of England. The Moniteur gave a long account of the splendour of his reception, from which the following is an extract:—

“ At noon the emperor left his hut, and a salute from all the batteries of the coast announced his arrival; on his appearance the drums began to beat, and shouts of joy from the army and spectators marked his presence; the drums then beat a charge, and the different columns instantly closed their ranks.

“ All in their turn received the reward of honor from the hands of Bonaparte; the decorations were held up by several officers in the helmets and bucklers of the armour of Dugueselin and Bayard.

“ The emperor passed the evening in his hut, and all the legionaries were entertained at the tables of Prince Joseph; the minister at war, the minister of marine, Marshal Soult, and Admiral Bruix, in tents decorated in a military style, and the health of the emperor was drunk with enthusiasm amidst the report of all the artillery of the batteries on the coast.”

Such were the daily aggressions and increasing pretensions of the chief of the French, that laudable exertions were at length made to assert the independence of Europe, and set bounds to his ambition. On the 11th of April, a treaty of concert between the King of Great Britain and the Emperor of Russia was signed at St. Petersburg, whereby, after observing that the state of suffering in which Europe was placed demanded speedy remedy, the contracting parties mutually agreed to consult upon the means of putting a stop thereto, without waiting for further encroachments on the part of the French government. In this view, they agreed to employ the most prompt and efficacious means to form a general league of the states of Europe; and, in order to accomplish the end proposed, to collect together a force, which, independently of the succours furnished by his Britannic majesty, might amount to 500,000 effective men, and to employ the same with energy, in order either to induce or to compel the French government to consent to the re-establishment of peace, and of the balance of Europe.

The objects proposed to be effected by this league were, the evacuation of the Hanoverian territory and the north of Germany; the establishment of the independence of the republics of Holland and Switzerland; the re-establishment of the King of Sardinia, in Piedmont, with as large an augmentation of territory as circumstances would permit; the future security of the kingdom of Naples, and the complete evacuation of Italy, the island of Elba included, by the French forces; the establishment of an order of things in Europe, which might effectually guarantee the security and independence of the different states, and present a solid barrier against future usurpations.

His Britannic majesty engaged to contribute to the common efforts, by employing his forces, both by sea and land, as well as vessels for transporting troops in the general plan of operations,

CHAP. VII.

It was mutually agreed that, in the event of this league being formed, they would not make peace with France, but with the common consent of all the powers who should become parties to it.

Sweden and Austria had already entered into these views; however, no intention was manifested on the part of these powers to proceed to hostilities, until an attempt to attain, by negotiation, the objects of the concerted alliance had proved abortive; on the contrary, a Russian envoy (Baron Novosiltzoff) was nominated to negotiate with France, and had actually proceeded to Berlin, on his way to Paris, when the intelligence arrived of the annexation of Genoa to the French empire. Under this change of circumstances, he applied to his court for fresh instructions: the result was his immediate recal. But, before his departure, he addressed a note, dated the 10th of July, to Baron Hardenberg, the Prussian minister, which was communicated by him to M. la Forêt, the French resident at Berlin, explaining the cause of the interruption of his mission.

This was a signal to Austria formally to become a member of the league, and accordingly a treaty to that effect was signed on the 9th of August, by her plenipotentiary at St. Petersburg.

About the same period, a note was addressed, by the Austrian ambassador at Paris, to the French minister for foreign affairs, expressive of the anxious desire of his court to concur with the courts of London and St. Petersburg, in their endeavours to promote a general pacification, when the overtures to be made to the French government, by M. Novosiltzoff, were suddenly broken off, by the changes recently made in the condition of the republics of Genoa and Lucca. That these events still further urged the court of Vienna to recommend the renewal of measures of conciliation, in which she was willing to lend her most earnest assistance.

In reply to this note, it was observed, by M. Talleyrand, that, from the conduct of England and Russia, little hopes could be entertained of the sincerity of their pacific intentions; that Austria had it in her power to compel them to have recourse to what they professed; for neither of those powers could act with effect against France, without the co-operations of Austria or Prussia, and that the latter was the steady ally of France. It was asked, what reliance could be placed in these professions of Austria, when she continued to maintain an army of 72,000 men in Italy, whilst France had only 50,000 in that country, 15,000 of whom were stationed at the extremity of the kingdom of Naples? He then adverted to the military preparations on foot in Poland, and in Italy, the evident result of combined operations. In this state of things, what other course had the Emperor of the French to adopt, than to anticipate his enemies? But if Austria would issue a declaration similar to that made by Prussia, and reduce her army in Italy and the Tyrol, and reduce her military force to the peace establishment, peace with England must ensue; the crowns of France and Italy should be separated for ever, and Europe would be indebted to the wisdom of Austria for her tranquillity and security; but a contrary conduct would precipitate Europe into a situation which could not be foreseen or calculated.

This was followed by another note from the French minister for foreign affairs, to the Austrian ambassador at Paris, wherein the former topics were repeated, terminating with the demand, "That the twenty-one regiments which had been sent to the German and Italian Tyrol should be withdrawn, and that those troops only should remain in the said provinces which were there six months before.

"That the camp fortifications should be discontinued, including those at Venice.

"That the troops in Stiria, in Carinthia, in Friuli, and the Venetian territory, be reduced to the numbers at which they stood six months before. And

"That Austria declare to England her unshaken determination to preserve an exact neutrality."

On the 31st of August, a declaration was officially made, by the Russian ambassador at Vienna, the material substance of which was, that in compliance with the Austrian court, his majesty, the Emperor of all the Russias, had resolved to accede to the request of renewing the negotiation for peace, which had been broken off, by the recal of M. Novosiltzoff, as soon as the head of the French government should assent thereto. And, as a measure of precaution, to cause two armies of 50,000 men each, to march to the Danube, in order to give weight to the negotiations, solemnly declaring, that it was his imperial majesty's intention to recal those troops as soon as the so much-desired security of all the states of Europe should be obtained.

To this succeeded a second note, from the court of Vienna to the French government, which was transmitted on the 3d of September, declaring, that "that power had no other view than that of maintaining peace and friendship with France, and of securing the general tranquillity of the continent; that the maintenance of peace did not consist solely in a forbearance from any positive attack; that it required the fulfilment of those treaties upon which peace had been founded.

"The peace existing between Austria and France originated with the treaty of Luneville; that treaty guaranteed the independence of the Italian, Helvetic, and Batavian republics; Austria had to complain that these stipulations were violated; that the maintenance of general tranquillity required, that each power should confine itself within its own frontiers, and respect the rights of other nations, whether weak or strong: in fine, France sets herself up as an arbitress to regulate the common interests of nations, and wishes to exclude every other state from taking any part in the maintenance of general tranquillity and the balance of power.

"The emperor had never ceased to demand the execution of the before-mentioned stipulations: however, the Emperor Napoleon, notwithstanding his frequent and solemn assurances, in his character of president of the Italian republic, that he was far from entertaining any plans for further aggrandisement, or of infringement on the independence of the Italian states, thought proper to assume the title of King of Italy, and to accompany this measure with threats and military preparations.

"This did not prevent the court of Austria from concurring in the pacific overtures made by Russia and England, but at the very moment when the requisite passports were transmitted to the negociator for that purpose, fresh attacks were made on the political existence of other independent states in Italy—an encampment of 30,000 men, in the plain of Marengo, was speedily followed by another of 40,000 on the frontiers of the Tyrol and the Austrian Venetian provinces.

"His majesty thus found himself under the necessity of providing, without delay, for his own safety. This was the cause of his present armament. The emperor armed not with hostile views; he armed not to operate a diversion against a landing in England; he armed for the maintenance of the peace existing between him and France, for those stipulations without which this peace would become illusory, and to attain that just equipoise which is calculated to secure the balance and permanent tranquillity of Europe."

This paper concluded with a declaration, that Austria was ready to enter into a negotiation, in conjunction with Russia, for maintaining the peace of the continent on the most moderate terms compatible with the general tranquillity and security; that whatever should be the issue of the negotiations, even should hostilities commence, they pledged themselves to abstain from every interference with the internal concerns of France, or to alter the state of the existing relations in the German empire, and to defend, to the utmost of their power, the integrity of the Ottoman Porte. And, finally, that the sentiments of England were conformable to those expressed in the above paper.

Bonaparte, who had till now apparently devoted his entire attention to the maturing of his projects for the invasion of Great Britain, immediately, upon the receipt of this note, which was sufficiently explanatory of the intentions of Austria, resolved to march, without delay, his whole military force, in order to disperse and destroy the combination which he perceived was formed against him. Promptitude in his operations he considered the more necessary, inasmuch as the Russian troops, which were intended to co-operate in favor of Austria, had not yet passed their own frontier.

His first step was to reinforce his army in Italy; he then dismantled his flotilla at Boulogne; caused the major part of his troops in Holland and in Hanover, to march, by the most rapid movements and the most direct routes, to meet the Austrians, who were collected on the Danube, and 60,000 men were decreed to be raised, by conscription, to recruit the armies.

These measures were accompanied by a note, presented by the French minister to the diet of Ratisbon, stating, that the conduct of Austria menaced a new war; that that power had extended her territory on the right side of the Pavia, and made acquisitions in Swabia, subsequently to the treaty of Luneville, which had materially altered the relative situation of the neighbouring states of Germany; that the debt of Venice had remained undischarged, contrary to the spirit and the letter of the treaties of Campo Formio and of Luneville, and that the people of Milan and Mantua had, contrary to formal stipulations, been denied justice to their demands; that Austria had recognized the right of blockade arrogated by England; that the French emperor had evacuated Switzerland, and had kept in Italy only a sufficient number of troops to maintain the positions which they occupied at the extremity of the peninsula, in order to protect the commerce of the Levant, and to insure an object of compensation which might determine England and Russia to evacuate Corfu. That his operations had been solely directed to the re-establishment of the equilibrium of commerce, and the equal right of all flags upon the sea. For this purpose, he had collected his forces upon the borders of the ocean, far distant from the Austrian frontiers, and had employed all the resources of his empire to construct fleets, to form his marine and improve his ports; that, at this moment, Austria rose from a state of repose, placed her forces on the war establishment, sent one army into the states of Italy, and another into the Tyrol, made new levies of cavalry, formed magazines, strengthened her fortresses, terrified, by her preparations, the people of Bavaria, Swabia, and of Switzerland, and manifested an intention of making a diversion favorable to England, and more injurious to France than would be a direct campaign, and an open declaration of war. Austria professed that she had no hostile intention against France:—against whom then were these preparations directed? Were they against the Swiss? Were they against Bavaria? Or were they directed against the German empire itself? His majesty the Emperor of the French declared, that he would consider as a formal declaration of war against himself, every aggression against the German body, and especially against Bavaria; he would never separate the interests of his empire from those of the princes of Germany who were attached to him.

To this note Austria replied, “that, so far from causing any interruption to a general peace, that she had offered her mediation, which had been refused by France, but that France wished not for peace, for that situation was not peace, but more destructive than actual war, in which a single power, already too formidable by its greatness, continued alone armed, and was prevented by no opposition from occupying with its troops, and oppressing and subjecting one independent state after another.

“To put an end to this state of things was the true object of the arming on the part of Austria and Russia, and that the two courts were ready to prove the disinterestedness of their views, by entering into any negotiation founded on principles of justice and moderation, and that it became the more necessary to take active measures of precaution, as, from certain indications, it was apparent, that several princes of the frontier circles had been encouraged by France to take up arms against their emperor and co-estate, and to this end, that new engagements had been entered into inimical to those existing.”

A rupture now became inevitable, and several powers placed themselves in an attitude to meet hostilities. Bavaria, of whom strong suspicions were entertained, was summoned to incorporate her troops with the Austrian army, and the latter in full force passed the Inn early in the month of September, and endeavoured to enforce this command.

It must be acknowledged, that the Austrians acted with little circumspection towards Bavaria:

heavy exactions were made upon the country, the paper money of Vienna was forced into circulation at its nominal value, whilst it had fallen to a great discount at home. These proceedings were attempted to be justified on the ground of political necessity.

The Elector immediately retired from Munich to Wurtzburgh, and the Bavarian troops effected a retreat into Franconia.

On this intelligence, Bonaparte prepared to place himself at the head of his armies, which were already advanced upon their march; but, prior to his departure, he repaired, on the 23d of September, to the senate-house, and caused to be read to that body, an exposition of the comparative conduct of France and Austria, since the conclusion of the peace of Luneville. His earnest desire to have preserved the peace of the continent was therein expressed; the charges against England and Austria particularly were reiterated; and after observing upon the invasion of the Bavarian territories, it concluded with a solemn declaration, “that the Emperor of the French would never lay down his arms, until he had obtained full and entire satisfaction, and complete security, as well for his own estates as for those of his allies.”

At this sitting, the senate passed a decree for raising 80,000 additional conscripts. Bonaparte then informed the senators “that he was about to place himself at the head of his army, in order to succour his allies; that the war had already commenced, by the invasion of Bavaria, the Elector of which had actually been driven from his territories.” He exhorted the French people to support their Emperor in the present unprovoked war, and concluded his address in the following words:—“Frenchmen, your Emperor will do his duty, my soldiers will do theirs, you will do yours.”

Bonaparte, having appointed his brother Joseph to superintend the government during his absence, set out from Paris on the 24th of September, to place himself at the head of the army, and arrived at Strasburgh on the 26th: he was accompanied by the Empress Josephine, Marshal Berthier, and a numerous suite. On his arrival, he was received by the mayor of that town with the usual compliments.

THE French army, estimated at about 140,000 men, moved in six divisions to the scene of action: the first corps, under Marshal Bernadotte, commenced its march from Hanover, about the same time that the army set out from Boulogne, and reached Wurtzburgh, in Franconia, on the 23d of September, by the route of Gottingen and Frankfort. General Marmont proceeded from Holland to Mentz, at the head of the second corps, passed the Rhine at Cassel, and the third corps, commanded by Marshal Davoust, passed the Rhine, on the 26th, at Mannheim, and advanced by Heidelberg and Neckar-Eltz, on the Neckar. The fourth corps, under Marshal Soult, passed the Rhine on the same day, by a bridge thrown over it at Spire, and advanced towards Heilbrun, on the Neckar. Marshal Ney, with the fifth division, likewise crossed that river on the 26th, by a flying bridge opposite Durlach, and marched towards Stutgardt. The sixth corps, commanded by Marshal Lasnes, passed the Rhine on the 25th, at Kehl, and advanced towards Louisburgh.

Prince Murat, with the reserve of cavalry, likewise passed the Rhine at Kehl, and took a position in which he remained, during several days, before the defiles of the Black Forest, as it were to make the Austrians believe the French army meant to take that route.

On the 30th, the great park of artillery passed the Rhine, at the same place, and advanced upon Heilbrun.

The main body of this army being now on the German side of the Rhine, Bonaparte issued a proclamation to his troops, wherein he stated, "that the third coalition had commenced; the Austrian army had passed the Inn; and, in violation of all treaties, had attacked and driven his ally from his capital. We will not stop," continued he, "until we have secured the independence of the Germanic body, relieved our allies, and confounded the pride of unjust assailants.—Our politics shall not again suffer by our generosity; for we will not make peace, without a guarantee for its execution. Soldiers! your emperor is in the midst of you. You are but the vanguard of the great nation; if it be necessary, it will in a moment rise, at my voice, to dissolve this new league, which British gold and hatred have woven. We have to expect privations and hardships of every description, but we will conquer every obstacle, and we will not rest, until we have planted our eagles on the territories of our enemies." Having left his court, accompanied by his staff, and a part of his guards, he crossed the Rhine at Kehl, on the 29th, to join the army. That night he passed at Ettlingen, where he received the compliments of the Elector and Princess of Baden; and the next day, he proceeded to Louisburgh, and took up his abode in the palace of the Elector of Wirtemberg.

On the same day the divisions of Marshal Bernadotte and General Marmont formed a junction with the Bavarians at Wurtzburgh, and commenced their march to the Danube. Marshal Davoust's corps marched from Neckar-Eltz, and pursued the route by Engelfinghen, Dunkelsbuhl, Attingen, and Donawert. Marshal Soult, with his corps, took the route from Ochringen, Absegmund, Aalen, and Nordlingen. Marshal Ney, with his corps, marched from Stutgardt, and proceeded by Eppingen, Wissenstein, and Nahum; and Marshal Lasnes' corps broke up from Louisbourgh, and took the route by Plutershausen, Aalen, and Oodlingen. The position of the French army on the 4th of October, was as follows:—Marshal Bernadotte and the Bavarians were at Weisenburg; Marshal Davoust at Attingen, on the river Reinitz, Marshal Soult at Donawert, Marshal Ney at Kessingen, Marshal Lasnes at Neresheim, and Murat, with his cavalry, on the borders of the Danube.

On the other hand, the Austrian army, consisting of between eighty and ninety thousand men, under the command of General Mack, had advanced to the defiles of the Black Forest, apparently with the intention of preventing the French army from penetrating. They had thrown up fortifications on the river Iller, and were strengthening Memmingen and Ulm; but all these measures of precaution were of little avail, as the French army had taken a rout not suspected by their adversaries, and were already in the rear of the Austrians.

A division of Marshal Soult's corps had, by a forced march, made themselves master of a bridge at Donawert, which was defended by the regiment of Coloreds, after the loss of a few men.

The next morning, at day-break, Murat arrived there with his dragoons, passed the bridge, which he had caused to be repaired, and, in conjunction with the cavalry commanded by General Walther, advanced towards the Lech, where he forced the enemy, who were there posted, to retreat with some loss; Murat remained that night at Rain.

On the 6th, Marshal Soult, with the two divisions of Vandamme and Le Grand, marched towards Augsburg, while General St. Hilaire, with his division, advanced to the same point, by the left bank of the Danube. On the same morning, Prince Murat, at the head of the divisions of cavalry commanded by the Generals Beaumont, Klein, and Bensouty, in the view of cutting off the communication between Ulm and Augsburg, on his arrival at Wertingen, encountered a considerable body of the enemy's infantry, supported by four squadrons of Albert's cuirassiers. Marshal Lasnes, who, with the division of Oudinot, followed these corps of cavalry, succeeded in defeating and making the greatest part of this portion of the Austrian army prisoners, together with their artillery and baggage. The loss of the Austrians, upon this occasion, was eight standards, the whole of their cannon, two lieutenant-colonels, six majors, sixty officers of inferior rank, and four thousand rank and file.

On the same day, Marshal Davoust arrived at Neuburg, and likewise General Marmont with his corps, and Bernadotte and the Bavarians had advanced to Aichstettin.

Marshal Soult, after having put to flight a body of Austrians, which had retreated to Aicha, entered Augsburg on the 7th, with the divisions of Vandamme, St. Hilaire, and Le Grand.

Davoust, who had passed the Danube at Neuburg, arrived on the evening of the 7th at Aicha with his three divisions. Marmont, with the divisions of Boudet, Gruchy, and the Batavians under General Dumonceau, had taken a position between Aicha and Augsburg.

Bernadotte, with the Bavarian army under Generals de Roy and Verden, had taken possession of Ingolstadt; and the imperial guard, commanded by Marshal Bessieres, together with the division of cuirassiers, under General Hautpoul, arrived at Augsburg.

By this time Murat, with Klein's, Beaumont's, and Bensouty's divisions of cavalry, had occupied the village of Zusmarshausen, to intercept the road from Ulm to Augsburg. Lasnes, with the divisions of Oudinot and Suchet, took post at the same village on the same day. Here Bonaparte reviewed the troops, and testified his satisfaction at their conduct at the battle of Wertingen, and distributed marks of honor to two dragoons, who had particularly distinguished themselves on that occasion.

The action of Wertingen was shortly after followed by one at Guntzburgh. Marshal Ney, who with the divisions of Malher, Dupont, and Loison, the dismounted dragoons of Baraguay d'Hilliers, and the division of Gazen, having re-ascended the Danube, attacked the enemy in their position at Grünberg, succeeded in passing the river at Guntzburgh, notwithstanding a gallant resistance on the part of the Austrians, who had advanced from Ulm to that place, with the view of collecting a sufficient force to act offensively. This force occupied Guntzburgh, rested with its right on the village of Limpach, and its left on Keisersburgh, and was in possession of the bridges on the Danube as far as Leipheim. A small corps which had passed the river, had, as already stated, been driven back with loss. The French pursued their advantages, and attacked the bridges, which were defended with some obstinacy. The division under General Malher at length overcame the principal obstacle, by making themselves master of the bridge and causeway leading to Guntzburgh. The Archduke Ferdinand made a brave attempt to defend this post, but was finally forced to abandon it; and he retreated to Ulm, with the loss of nearly 3,000 men, and the greatest part of his cannon. The assailants suffered considerably from the grape-shot of the Austrians; however, they were amply recompensed by the possession of a fine military position.

During these transactions, the centre of the French army passed the Danube at Donawert, Neuburg, and the left wing still lower down at Ingolstadt. This latter portion of the army, under the orders of Bernadotte, took post at Pfufferhausen, on the road to Munich, whilst the main body proceeded across the Lech, by Zimmershausen to Augsburg, which place became the French head-quarters.

At the passage of the Lech, Bonaparte harangued his troops, informing them of the critical situation of the enemy, and that they were shortly to expect a general engagement. By this succession of bold and rapid movements, the whole of the French army was now placed between Vienna and the Austrian forces under General Mack. The corps under Bernadotte, in conjunction with the Bavarians, forming together a body of about 40,000 men, were ordered to advance towards the Inn, in order to make head against the Austrian and Russian reinforcements, whilst, with the remainder of the army, Bonaparte marched against Mack.

Bernadotte entered Munich on the 12th, when he made about 800 prisoners, having captured on his march the baggage of the Austrian guards. He lost no time in crossing the Inn at that town, and continued his march on the high road to Brannau, where the first Russian column had arrived, and joined the troops under General Kienmeyer, which had evacuated Bavaria, and had fallen back upon that fortress. On the 15th he fell in with some Austrian detachments at Wasserburg and Haag, took a few hundred prisoners, and several pieces of cannon. He then took up a strong position near the Inn, from which he could observe the combined army, and attack to advantage, should they attempt to pass that river. By this manœuvre, Bonaparte was enabled to direct his main force against Mack.

On the 10th, Marshal Soult was detached from the left with his corps to occupy Landsberg; they fell in with a corps of Austrian cuirassiers, who, after a short conflict, were compelled to retreat to Ulm, with the loss of some prisoners and two pieces of cannon. By this event the French gained possession of a pass of considerable importance, as forming a communication between Ulm and the Tyrol.

The army under General Mack was now confined to narrow limits; it occupied a line from Memmingen to Ulm, in which latter place, and the adjacent outworks, that general and the principal part of his force were collected, and which contained magazines abundantly supplied.

In this posture of affairs, Bonaparte determined upon surrounding the whole of the army. With this view he caused the left wing of his troops under Marshal Soult to advance upon Memmingen, a place of some importance, which had now become the station of the Austrian right, and which was likewise a considerable depôt for military stores, whilst he proceeded in person, with a most formidable force, to the neighbourhood of Ulm. On the 11th, the advanced corps under Marshal Ney made an attack on a body of Austrians strongly posted before Ulm: they were received with great firmness, and obstinately resisted, until the arrival of Bonaparte with strong reinforcements. The attack was renewed, and the French, after a desperate opposition, succeeded in carrying all the entrenchments without the town, by some of which it was completely commanded. Soult had arrived before Memmingen on the 13th, and immediately surrounded the place, which surrendered on the day following. The most striking articles in the capitulation were, that the garrison, to the amount of many thousands, should be prisoners of war, and the officers released upon their parole, to be suffered to retain their property, for the conveyance of which the French stipulated to provide carriages.

On the 15th, Soult advanced in pursuit of the Archduke Ferdinand, who had retreated to Biberech; but finding that the prince had retired from that place towards Ulm, he directed his course towards Bregentz, in order to intercept that pass into the Tyrol. The army, concentrated at and about Ulm was, by these operations, completely cut off from all communication with the Austrian states, and the whole of the French army in Germany, (with the exception of the corps under Bernadotte, which had advanced into Bavaria,) surrounded that place.

The Archduke Ferdinand had now no alternative left, but either to share the fate of the army at Ulm, or endeavour to force his way to Bohemia through Franconia. He boldly attempted the latter measure, crossed the Danube, and advanced by Nordlingen and Nuremberg, pursued by Murat and Lasnes. He was overtaken near Nordlingen, when one whole division, under Lieutenant-general Werneck, amounting to about 12,000 men, were obliged to lay down their arms. The French pursued their advantage, and again fell in with the remains of the Archduke's corps, between Traun and Nuremberg, on which occasion he took several prisoners, and the greater part of the Austrian artillery. The French now desisted from the pursuit, and the Archduke made good his retreat with the remnant of his corps, chiefly cavalry.

In the mean time Bonaparte had so completely invested Ulm, that no possibility of escape was left to Mack and one-third of his original force, but by opening a passage through an army four times superior to his. This determination was not to be attempted with any probability of success, in the then situation of the two armies, whatever might have been done had offensive

BOOK VI. operations been had recourse to earlier. General CHAP. VIII. Mack had thought too highly of the position of 1805. Ulm, and so much was he wedded to this opinion, (which might have had some weight, had the French army penetrated, as it had heretofore done, by the Black Forest) that he overlooked the possibility of what had actually occurred. But the great error of the Austrian commander-in-chief seems to have been too wide a dispersion of the different corps composing his army, so that the French were allowed to attack them severally in detail, by a force so superior as to render their resistance ineffectual; whilst it may be presumed, had he pursued a similar plan, and had attacked the several divisions of the French army separately, as they advanced, before they had concentrated themselves in force, the event might have been as favorable as, under the other circumstances, it had proved disastrous.

Notwithstanding the Austrian commander-in-chief had 30,000 men, the city of Ulm was completely invested, and the French troops already in possession of the neighbouring heights that commanded the fortifications, which were in themselves extremely imperfect, and incapable, under more favorable circumstances, of being defended for any length of time. Indeed, General Mack seems to have abandoned all idea of making such an effort.

Bonaparte, eager to avail himself of his present advantage, in order to hasten the surrender of the place, on the 15th made preparations, as it were, to storm the town, and issued an address to his army, wherein he informed them, that "the following day would be an hundred times more celebrated than that of Maringo, for the Austrian troops were now placed in a similar situation:
 But," continued he, "merely to conquer the enemy would be doing nothing worthy either of yourselves or your emperor. Not a man should escape, and that government which had violated all its engagements, should first learn its catastrophe by your arrival under the walls of Vienna."
 This proclamation was immediately followed by a summons to Mack, requiring him to capitulate without loss of time, and threatening, in case of refusal, to storm the town.

These measures had the desired effect, and Mack, after a short deliberation, acceded to the terms proposed. Accordingly, on the 17th of October, he agreed to surrender the city of Ulm, with all its artillery and magazines, and that the garrison, (consisting of about 30,000 men) after marching out, with all the honors of war, should lay down their arms; the field-officers to be allowed to return to Austria, upon their parole, but the subalterns and soldiers to be sent prisoners into France, there to remain until exchanged. It was stipulated, however, that the Austrian commander-in-chief should not be obliged to carry this capitulation into effect before twelve o'clock at noon on the ensuing 25th; and, further, that if an Austrian or Russian army arrived in sufficient force to raise the blockade of Ulm before twelve o'clock at midnight on the 25th, the garrison should, in that event, be entirely released from

Impatient at the delay which these terms would have produced, and eager to lose no time in making head against the Austrians and Russians collecting on the Inn, Bonaparte invited General Mack to an interview on the 19th, the result of which was, that Mack, on the assurance of the French marshal Berthier that no succour could possibly arrive before Ulm, signed an additional article, by which he agreed to evacuate the place, and surrender the army, on the next day, the 20th, on the mere condition that the corps commanded by Marshal Ney, consisting of twelve regiments of infantry and four of cavalry, should not advance beyond ten leagues from Ulm and its environs before the 25th at midnight, the period when the former capitulation was to have expired. Mack's conduct, in this latter proceeding, can only be accounted for either by folly or treachery; but whatever were his motives, the Austrian garrison, in compliance with the new capitulation, marched out the day following, and, after filing before the French emperor, laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Bonaparte, who had taken an advantageous station to behold this operation, sent for General Mack and the other Austrian generals, and, while their troops were filing by, addressed them to the following effect: "Gentlemen, your master wages an unjust war: I tell you plainly I know not for what I am fighting; I know not what can be required of me; my resources are not confined to my present army. Those prisoners of war, now on their way to France, will observe the spirit which animates my people, and with what eagerness
 they flock to my standards. At a single word 200,000 volunteers crowd to my standard, and in six weeks become good soldiers; whereas, your recruits only march from compulsion, and do not become good soldiers till after several years. Let me advise my brother, the emperor, to hasten to make peace. All states must have an end, and, in the present crisis, he must feel serious alarms, lest the extinction of the dynasty of Lorraine should be at hand." He concluded by saying, "I desire nothing further upon the continent; I want ships, colonies, and commerce, and it is as much your interest as mine that I should have them."

General Mack replied, "that the Emperor of Germany had not wished for war, but was compelled to it by Russia."—"If that be the case," said Bonaparte, "you are no longer a power."

Several of the other Austrian generals expressed their dislike to the war. The French emperor treated these officers with civility, and, by way of consolation, observed to them, "that the chances of war were various, and that the conquerors might be conquered in their turn."

Thus, by gross and unaccountable misconduct, the main Austrian army in Germany was rendered totally useless.

Bonaparte, as a reward to his troops for their very great exertions, and with a view to animate them to further enterprizes, judiciously decreed, on the day after the surrender of Ulm, that the month Vendemaire, year 14, should be reckoned as a campaign to all the individuals composing the French grand army in Germany, and be so charged to the state, in the computation of pay and military services; and, likewise, that the war contributions, as well as such as should be levied in Suabia, and likewise all magazines taken from the enemy, should belong to the army, with the exception of the artillery and provisions. At the same time Bonaparte issued an address to his soldiers, exulting in their having performed a campaign in fifteen days, and chased the Austrians from the territory of his ally, the Elector of Bavaria. He observed, that of an hundred thousand, of which the Austrian army consisted, 60,000 were prisoners, who would replace the French conscripts in the labour of the field. But, said he, "we shall not stop here; you are impatient to commence a second campaign, and we shall make the Russians undergo the same fate. Then shall be decided the question, which indeed has been already proved in Switzerland and Holland, whether the French infantry were the first or second in Europe. But as there were no generals amongst them, opposed to whom he had any glory to acquire, his sole care should be to obtain victory with the least effusion of blood. That his soldiers were his children!"

Bonaparte having ordered the states belonging to the house of Austria, in Suabia, to be taken possession of, directed the march of the Austrian prisoners for France, and the demolition of the fortifications of Ulm and Memmingen, and set out with his army, with the exception of the corps under the command of Marshal Ney, which, by stipulation, was not to leave the vicinity of Ulm until after the 25th, at midnight, on the 21st for Augsburg, on his route to Bavaria. He ordered têtes de pont to be constructed on the bridges over the Lech, and magazines to be established beyond them. On the evening of the 24th, he reached Munich, where he was received with great honors. He was joined here by Murat, who had left a division of the troops, with whom he had pursued the Archduke Ferdinand, under the command of Mortier and Beraguay d'Hilliers, on the other side of the Danube, to descend that river, and to observe the movements of the Austrians in Bohemia.

The Elector of Bavaria not having returned to his capital, Bonaparte dispatched an aid-de-camp to offer him escorts on the road; and receiving intelligence of the opening of the campaign in Italy, the former prepared to rejoin the army, now in full march for the Inn.

The disposition of the French army was thus arranged: Bonaparte, at the head of the main body, advanced towards Vienna, and had in his front a corps of Austrians, which had been reinforced, shortly before, by the first column of the Russian army. Their combined force did not exceed 45,000 men. To protect his flanks and rear, Bonaparte caused the division under Mortier, which was on the left shore of the Danube, to watch the motions of the Austrians in Bohemia, under the Archduke Ferdinand: thus he had nothing to apprehend on his left. His right was protected by Marshal Ney, who mounted the Lech to the confines of the Tyrol, and opposed the corps stationed in that country under the Archduke John. In addition to these corps, the division of Marshal Augereau, which had subsequently passed the Rhine, occupied the parts of Suabia contiguous to the lake of Constance, so as to prevent any attempt which might be made on the rear of the French army, from the Voralberg, and, perhaps, to make head against any Prussian corps which might, since the violation of the territory of Anspach and Bareuth, cross the Danube with a similar intention.

The centre of the French army having reached the Inn, where the Austrians and Russians were posted, on the 28th effected a passage over that river, in the vicinity of Brannau. Marshal Bernadotte, who had advanced by Wasserburgh, proceeded, on the 27th, to Altinmarkt; there he found the bridge broken down, and a strong fort opposed to him; but a corps of French and Bavarians, who had proceeded by Roth to Rotherheim, found the passage of the river more practicable at that place, and succeeded in crossing it. The enemy were obliged to retreat, and, in consequence, both this bridge and that at Altinmarkt were repaired.

Davoust's corps, which took the route by Freyung, after some opposition, passed the bridge at Mulldorf. Murat caused a brigade of cavalry to pass the river at the same time, and as soon as the bridges of Octing and Marchiel were repaired, he crossed the Inn in person with the reserve. The Austrians and Russians, finding their force inadequate to prevent the passage of the river, retreated step by step towards Vienna. In the mean time an effort was made for the defence of that capital. The citizens capable of bearing arms were summoned to embody themselves; and a proclamation was issued, wherein the emperor declared that he would trust in the justice of his cause, and the love and energy of his twenty-five millions of people, aided by the powerful assistance of his Russian auxiliaries.

The right bank of the Inn being left destitute of defence, the remainder of the French army passed it without opposition; and whilst the Austro-Russians were pursued by the French, who had already passed the river, the corps under Lasnes, on the 29th, took possession of Brannau, a place of considerable strength, containing large magazines of artillery, ammunition, and provisions. The Russians, who had occupied Brannau, left behind them a quantity of powder and other military stores. This was a seasonable supply to the French army. On the 30th, Bonaparte arrived, and placed his head-quarters in that fortress.

Bernadotte was hereupon detached from the left of the army to the right, in order to occupy Salzburg, so as to be in a situation to intercept the communication between the army under the Archduke Charles in the Venetian territory, and the Austro-Russians; a corps of 6,000 Austrians, who were there stationed, retreated before the arrival of Bernadotte, in the direction of Wells. They were pursued by the advanced guard, under Kellerman, and were overtaken near Pasling. Notwithstanding the strength of the position of the Austrians, they were compelled to retire with the loss of some hundreds of prisoners. This operation facilitated the advance of the main body of the army under Bonaparte, which moved rapidly in pursuit of the enemy.

Prince Murat, with his cavalry, was the first to overtake the Austrian rear-guard, about 6,000 strong, posted on the heights of Ried. They were charged with great impetuosity by the French horse, and forced to give way. The enemy, however, rallied to protect their baggage, but, after an obstinate conflict, they were put to flight, leaving 4 or 500 prisoners. The position of Ried was, after this affair, taken possession of by Murat, to which point the main body was in full march.

Murat continued the pursuit, and, on the 31st, again fell in with the enemy's rear, in the vicinity of Lambach. Some show of resistance was made for the purpose of protecting the retreat of the combined army, and the allies lost about 400 men, of whom 100 were Russians, and a few pieces of cannon.

The object of the allies was now to take a position behind the Ens, but they were closely pursued by the French advanced guard, with whom they had some skirmishes. Murat took possession of Wells on the 1st of November, and on the same day his reserve of cavalry, under General Milhaud, entered Lintz, in which town were found considerable magazines. The main body of the army were at the heels of the advanced guard; Marshal Lasnes, with his division, arrived at Lintz on the 3d, and Davoust approached Steyr on the Ens. Bonaparte, whose head-quarters were at Lambach, made his arrangements for driving the enemy from the banks of the Ens, the last line of defence which remained to them between that river and Vienna. With this view General Marmont was detached with his corps to Leoben, to turn the left of the allies.

On the 4th, Murat proceeded to the town of Ens, and General Walther, with a corps of dragoons, passed the Traun at Ebersberg, where he discomfited a few hundred Austrians, who were stationed to impede the passage of that river, and advanced, without opposition, to the Ens. The allies having observed the dispositions, when made for turning their left flank, and the enemy advancing with such boldness in their front, abandoned the defence of the river, and retired slowly towards Vienna. The French army lost no time in crossing the Ens, and pressed forward with eagerness towards the Austrian capital, which was in a state of great consternation and confusion.

The Russian army made a stand on the heights of Amstettin, in order to retard the progress of the French. They were furiously attacked by Murat's cavalry and Oudinot's grenadiers, and several times they repelled their assailants, but were at length obliged to quit the field, leaving 400 killed and 1,200 prisoners. The French likewise sustained a considerable loss in this affair. The Russians, in their retreat, destroyed the bridges over the Ips, and took the direction of St. Polten, an advantageous post, and only thirty miles distant from Vienna.

On the 7th, at night, Count Giulay arrived at Bonaparte's head-quarters, at Lintz, with proposals, in the name of the Emperor of Germany and his allies, to conclude an armistice of a few weeks, as a preliminary step towards a negotiation for a general peace. Bonaparte expressed his readiness to accede to the armistice, on condition that the Austrian monarch would cause the allied troops to return home, the Hungarian levy to be disbanded, and the duchy of Venice and the Tyrol to be occupied by the French army. With this reply Count Giulay returned to his court, and Bonaparte continued his plan of operations.

Murat had already restored the bridges over the Ips, and on the 7th established his head-quarters at the celebrated abbey of Moelk: his advanced posts were pushed to St. Polten. Mortier had contrived, with part of his corps, to keep pace on the left bank of the Danube, with the main army on the opposite side, so as to render it material assistance. Davoust now advanced from Steyr by Naydhoffen, Mariuzel, and Lilienfeldt, with the project of coming upon the left of the allies stationed at St. Polten, whilst Bonaparte, with the centre, consisting of the corps of Lasnes and Soult, together with the imperial guards, moved forward to attack the front.

On the 8th Davoust's division fell in with a corps of Austrians under General Meerfeldt, marching for Neustadt, to cover Vienna on that side. They attacked them with great impetuosity, at a few leagues from Meninzel. The action was obstinate and bloody. The French, however, succeeded, after an engagement of some hours, in routing their opponents. They took three standards, sixteen pieces of cannon, and 3,000 prisoners. The remainder, in great disorder, took the direction of Hungary. Davoust pursued his march, the day following, along the great road leading to Vienna. Bernadotte and Marmont remained on the right, to observe the archduke Charles, who was now retiring before Mas-sena.

The Russians, who were posted at St. Polten, thinking their situation too critical to attempt to maintain it, and fearful lest their retreat should be cut off, formed the resolution of passing the Danube, and on the 9th they crossed that river at Krems, and destroyed the bridge.

Bonaparte's head-quarters were at the abbey of Moelk, and the road to the Austrian capital was open to the French army. At this place he was waited upon by a deputation from the magistracy of Vienna, imploring him "to treat their city with lenity, as the unfortunate inhabitants were not the cause of the war." He returned for answer, "that the inhabitants of Vienna must take care not to open their gates to the Austrians or Russians, but only to the French army."

On the 7th, the Emperor Francis, finding all the means in his power insufficient to defend his capital against a superior and victorious army, retired with his court to Brunn, in Moravia, and at the same time the greater part of the nobility fled from Vienna into Hungary.—The bulk of the inhabitants waited patiently the arrival of the French, and indeed they were prepared to look forward to that event from the period of the disastrous capitulation of Ulm. The people of the Austrian states had been long weary of the war. The supplies which they were called upon to contribute, pressed hardly upon them, whilst the depreciation of the currency had amounted to a most serious evil. In addition to these causes of dissatisfaction, the complaints of the peasantry against the conduct of the Russian troops were eagerly listened to, so that little exertion was necessary to induce the inhabitants to submit to the commands of the conqueror. A national guard was hereupon appointed, in aid of the police, so that the peace of the city was scarcely disturbed.

On the 11th, the advanced guard of the French army appeared before Vienna, and took up their quarters in the suburbs of the city. On the following day the main body arrived, and were lodged in the suburbs, where they conducted themselves in an orderly and quiet manner. Bonaparte fixed his head-quarters at Rukersdroff, two German miles distant from Vienna.

The French did not enter the city until the 13th, when they found it totally evacuated by the Austrian troops, and the military duty performed by the inhabitants.

Murat, who commanded the advanced guard, marched through the city without halting, and passed the bridge over the Danube without resistance. There was indeed a corps of Austrians stationed, under Prince Auerssberg, at the bridge, for the purpose of destroying it in case of necessity, and their preparations were made for so doing. Murat, aware of this circumstance, rode up in full speed to this officer, assured him, on his word of honor, that an armistice had been concluded, and, by this artifice, he prevailed upon his credulity so far as to prevent the destruction of the bridge, which might have considerably retarded the advance of the French army into Moravia.

On the 14th, the divisions of Marshal Soult and Davoust passed the river, treading in the footsteps of Murat; part of the latter corps, however, was detached down the Danube, towards Presburgh, in Hungary. On this day, likewise, Bonaparte made his entry into Vienna, and he employed a great portion of the ensuing night in visiting his outposts, beyond the Danube. Bonaparte then retired to the Imperial palace of Shoenbrun, which he had chosen for his residence.

The French found, at Vienna, an immense quantity of military stores of all kinds, ammunition in great abundance, and a vast number of pieces of artillery, of various sorts. The number of muskets, found in the arsenal, was likewise very considerable, 15,000 of which Bonaparte presented to the Elector of Bavaria, and he likewise caused to be restored to that prince the artillery taken, on former occasions, from the electorate; great requisitions of cloth, and wine, were also made for the supply of the army. On this day Bonaparte received a deputation of the citizens, and told them, that they might assure the people of Vienna of his protection.

On the 25th the French Emperor, having appointed General Clarke Governor of Upper and Lower Austria, passed through Vienna, to join the army, which was now advancing into Moravia, to meet the Russians. It has been already mentioned, that the Russians who had been driven back from Brannau to St. Polten, crossed the Danube at Krems; on the 9th, they were met on the left bank of the river by Mortier's corps, consisting of about 6,000 men; on the 10th, in the vicinity of Diernstein, the Russians were attacked, and forced to retire from Weiskirchen to Stein. The Russians, in their turn, attacked the French the next morning early. They were much superior in force to their opponents, being about 20,000 strong. They met, however, a firm opposition from the French, who repulsed them, after repeated attempts. But the Russian general had calculated on another manœuvre, and had detached two columns, by a difficult pass, to turn the enemy. This plan partly succeeded; Mortier was obliged to cut his way through the Russian lines, which was accomplished with great difficulty and considerable loss; besides a great number of killed and wounded, 2,000 were made prisoners. In this affair, General Mortier was severely wounded. The loss on the side of the Russians was not unimportant, but none more to be regretted than the death of Lieutenant-general Smidt, an officer of great repute, in the Austrian service, who acted as quarter-master-general to the Russian army. General Smidt possessed the confidence of the Archduke Charles to an eminent degree. After this event, the Russians judged it advisable to fall back upon Brunn, where they expected reinforcements under General Buxhovden.

BOOK VI.

CHAP. VII.

The French army advanced so rapidly into Moravia, that the imperial court, from motives of precaution, removed from Brunn to Olmutz. Previously to his quitting Brunn, the Emperor issued a proclamation (on the 13th) in which he communicated his late proposal for an armistice, together with the inadmissible demands of the French emperor. That, under such circumstances, nothing remained for him to do, but to trust to resources to be found in the fidelity and strength of his people, united to the undiminished forces of his high allies, the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, and to persist in this determination until the French emperor should consent to conditions of peace, consistent with the honor and independence of a great state.

On the evening of the 14th, Marshal Lasnes reached Stokeran, and found there an immense quantity of clothing. Eight thousand pairs of shoes and half-boots, and cloth sufficient to make great coats for the whole army. General Milhaud, who commanded the advanced guard of Marshal Davoust's corps, captured, about the same time, many pieces of artillery, with their ammunition, together with 400 men. Almost the whole of the Austrian artillery was now in possession of the enemy.

By this time Bernadotte, who had made a circuit to the right of the French army, by Salzburg and the confines of Hungary, passed the Danube to join the main army.

On the 15th, Murat and Lasnes came up with the Russian army at Holbrun. The French cavalry charged the enemy, who abandoned their ground, leaving some of their baggage behind. The Russian general finding himself hard pressed, and desirous to gain a little time, had recourse to a device, in which he was authorized by the stratagem used by the French in passing the bridge at Vienna. A flag of truce presented himself at the French advanced posts, and the Baron Winsingerode, aid-de-camp to the Emperor of Russia, demanded leave for the Russian army to capitulate, and separate from the Austrians. This appeared too specious not to be listened to, and Murat, who was himself the author of the above-mentioned deception, communicated the information to Bonaparte. It soon became suspected, and Bonaparte refused to agree to the proposed terms, on the grounds that the Russian was not duly authorized to treat, but he declared that if the Emperor of Russia would ratify the convention, he would likewise do it. Hereupon the French army advanced. The Russians, during this parley, were making their preparations to retreat, but were attacked, the next day, near Guntersdorff. The Russians behaved with great bravery, and repulsed the enemy at the point of the bayonet. Marshal Lasnes attacked them in front; General Dupas, with a brigade of grenadiers, turned their left; whilst Marshal Soult was on their right, so that they were compelled to give way. Night put an end to the pursuit.

The loss on both sides was considerable; that on the part of the Russians was 2,000 prisoners, and nearly as many in killed and wounded, together with twelve pieces of cannon, and many baggage-waggons. On the part of the French many were killed and wounded, above 3,000 men; amongst the latter were General Oudinot and his two aid-de-camps. General Duroc was ordered to replace Oudinot during his confinement.

On the 17th Bonaparte's head-quarters were removed to Znaim: here were found the sick of the Russian army, which they had been obliged to abandon, and likewise a quantity of flour and oats.

On the 18th General Sebastiani succeeded in cutting off part of the Russian rear-guard, and made nearly 2,000 prisoners; and on the same day Murat entered Brunn, which had been evacuated by the Russians. Brunn is a regular fortress, and capable of sustaining a siege. Sixty pieces of ordnance were found in this place, with 3,000 cwt. of gunpowder, magazines well supplied with grain, and a considerable quantity of clothing.

On the 20th Bonaparte removed to Brunn, and received a deputation from the states of Moravia, with the bishop at their head. He caused the citadel to be taken possession of, in which were found 6,000 stand of arms, and a considerable quantity of ammunition. The Russians made an attempt to defend the road leading from Brunn to Olmutz, and for this purpose collected all their cavalry, amounting to about 6,000 men. They were attacked by the French Generals, Walther, Hautpoult, and Bessieres, with a selected corps of the French cavalry. The Russians maintained their ground the whole day, but towards night they retired. Two or three hundred men on each side were killed and wounded.

The main body of the French army did not move forward for some days; in the mean time Bonaparte caused Brunn to be put in a state of defence. They then advanced and took a position near Wishau, in face of the Austro-Russian army, who were posted between that place and Olmutz. The Russians here received reinforcements, and a general and decisive action seemed to be the determination of both armies.

Position of the hostile Armies.—General Massena passes the Adige.—The Austrians make a gallant but unavailing Resistance.—Battle of Caldiero.—Defeat of the Austrians.—The French capture Vicenza.—Affairs of the Tyrol.—Innsbruck taken by the French.—The Archduke John effects a Junction with Prince Charles.—Ineffectual Attempt to negotiate for the Neutrality of Hungary.—State of the opposed Armies.—The Emperor of Russia joins his Army.—Bonaparte's Chicanery.—Battle of Austerlitz.—Disastrous to the Allied Army.—Advance of the French.—The Austrians solicit an Armistice.—Humiliating Terms granted.—The Emperor of Russia refuses to be a Party thereto.—State of the Austrian Armies, &c.

THE command of the French army in Italy, which had been strongly reinforced, had been given to Marshal Massena; while the Austrian army, which was equally powerful, was commanded by their favorite Archduke Charles.

The fortified passes in the Tyrol were strengthened, and a considerable body of troops stationed under the command of the Archduke John, to defend that country, and to maintain the communications between the armies in Germany and the Venetian territory.

At the same time a combined force of Russians and British were collected at Corfu and Malta, for the purpose of making a descent in Italy, while another army of Russians, Swedes, and English, were prepared, in the north of Germany, to invade Hanover, and for further enterprize, when occasion should serve.

The Archduke Charles and General Massena being in face of each other, on the opposite sides of the Adige, waited only for the signal of attack, which appears to have been calculated by the French from the time that their army in Germany should have come in contact with the Austrians in that quarter. Accordingly, on the 17th of October, Massena prepared to force the passage of the Adige. His army amounted to about 90,000 men, while that of the Archduke Charles did not exceed 75,000.

Early on the morning of the 18th, the French general caused two false attacks to be made, one on their right, the other on their left, while, with the centre of his army, he attempted the passage of the river, at the bridge at Verona. This bridge was barricadoed, and some of the arches cut. These impediments the French overcame with great fortitude, and twenty-four companies of light troops, selected from the divisions of Gardanne and Dubesme, pushed forward across the river, and were soon followed by the whole division of General Gardanne, and shortly after by the remainder of the army. The Austrians made a gallant resistance, but were obliged to retire to the heights, at some distance, where they had entrenchments. The attack was renewed here, and the French gained some advantage, but so inconsiderable, that they judged it expedient to recross the Adige, and occupy their former ground. The loss sustained by the Austrians was seven pieces of cannon, eighteen waggons, and about 1,200 prisoners. There were many killed and wounded on both sides.

On the 20th, the French renewed the attack. After passing the Adige, they mounted and took possession of the heights of Val Pantena, surrounded the castle of San Felici, and obliged the Austrians to evacuate Venoretto. They still advanced on the road of St. Michael, where they met with serious opposition from the Austrian troops. The French however succeeded in driving the Austrians from St. Michael, taking 1,500 prisoners, and two pieces of cannon. This advantage was not obtained without much bloodshed.

Hitherto Massena was rather confined in his operations, being cautious not to advance too far until he had received information of the state of the campaign in Germany. After the action of the 20th, he took a position within a few miles of Caldiero, near which place the archduke was strongly posted. Nothing material occurred between the two armies for several days. In the mean time intelligence of the surrender of General Mack's army reached him, and of Bonaparte's intention to proceed, without loss of time, to meet the combined Russian and Austrian forces.

Under these circumstances it became a matter of great importance that he should give full occupation to the archduke, and press forward with the utmost diligence, in order to execute the plans of co-operation assigned to him.

Accordingly he commenced, on the 30th, a very vigorous attack upon the whole line of the army opposed to him. The division of Molitor formed the left, the centre was commanded by General Gardanne, and the right by General Dubesme. The action began upon the left, and the three successive attacks were bravely resisted by the Austrians, who were, however, at length forced to retire to the adjacent heights. The battle was renewed on the part of the Austrians. Twenty-four battalions of grenadiers, and some other regiments, were ordered, by the archduke, to advance against the enemy. Both armies fought with great fury. The French cavalry at length made some impression, and being well supported by several battalions of grenadiers who fought with the bayonet, the Austrians, after a desperate resistance, in which they were assisted by the fire of thirty pieces of cannon, were finally driven from the field, with the loss of above 3,000 prisoners. In so obstinate an engagement the carnage must have been very great, so much so indeed as to induce the archduke to demand a suspension of arms, for the purpose of burying the dead. This was not the only loss sustained by the Austrians in this affair. A column of 5,000 men, which it should appear was detached from the corps of Rosenburgh, with the view of falling upon the rear of the French army, was, by the issue of the battle, completely cut off. General Hillinger, who commanded it, at first manifested an intention to defend himself, and even compelled a regiment of light infantry, sent against him, to take shelter under the walls of the castle of San Felici. Massena then repaired in person to the spot, and ordered four battalions of grenadiers to surround the column. General Hillinger, perceiving no chance of escape, entered into a capitulation, and laid down his arms.

Although the army under Massena had been successful, it had not made any very considerable progress. The archduke, however, for a variety of reasons, came to the determination of making a positive retreat. He seems to have been principally actuated by the desire of relieving the Austrian capital, now imminently in danger, while he could have little hopes of contending successfully against the army of Massena, which was reinforced by 25,000 additional troops, under General St. Cyr, which had evacuated the kingdom of Naples, in conformity with the terms of a convention entered into with his Sicilian majesty. The archduke began his march on the night of the 1st of November, with great caution, so that it was not discovered by the enemy before the next morning. He was then pursued by the French light troops, and harassed during the day. The Austrians had about 500 men made prisoners.

On the 2d, the main body of the French army advanced in pursuit of the Austrians. After halting a short time at Monte Bello, it marched to Vicenza. Massena summoned the city to surrender, but received a refusal. On preparations being made, the next morning, for assaulting it, the gates were thrown open, and the army entered. In Vicenza were found 1,000 wounded Austrians, and the remains of some magazines.

On the archduke's arrival at Bassano, he had the option either of attempting his retreat by Trent, into the Tyrol, or by Treviso, through Carinthia, or Carniola. The disposition of the French German army appears to have determined him to adopt the latter course. He would, in his progress towards Vienna, by the former route, have had to oppose the corps of General Marmont and Marshal Bernadotte, whilst Ney was in force on the confines of the Tyrol on one side, and Augereau on the other, who were stationed to intercept him, and a superior force under Massena was close upon his rear. By taking the latter route he might, if necessary, reach Hungary, without meeting any opposition in front, and there he would find the means of recruiting his army. In either way his retreat was difficult, being continually galled by the enemy's light troops.

The French advanced guard arrived at the Brenta immediately after the Austrians had passed that river, and were endeavouring to destroy the bridge. This brought on a cannonade from the opposite banks, and the French were prevented from crossing till the next morning. Early on the evening of that day, Massena entered Castel-Franco, and the chasseurs of the army were in possession of Salvaternada and Albando. Here the French army was allowed some repose, being much exhausted from their incessant exertions. In their advance from Monte Bello 1,500 prisoners fell into their hands. They also levied heavy contributions upon the great towns through which they passed.

Massena met with no opposition worth mentioning between the Brenta and the Tagliamento. Behind the latter river Prince Charles made a show of resistance, and posted his troops as if determined to oppose the passage of the river. Massena was somewhat imposed upon by this appearance, so that he did not seriously attempt to pass the river until his main force was arrived. On the 12th the division of chasseurs commanded by General d'Espagne, together with the cuirassiers and dragoons under Generals Marmont and Pulley, were posted in front of the Austrians, while the divisions of Duhesme and Suas were stationed at St. Vito, and those of Molitor and Gardanne at Valoasonna. Nothing occurred on that day but some skirmishes between a squadron of French, which had crossed the river, and a party of Austrian cavalry, except a heavy cannonade, which continued the whole day. The attack was to have taken place on the next morning; but the archduke retreated during the night, and directed his march to Laybach in Carniola, without attempting to defend Palma Nova, though a place of some strength; his object being to effect his retreat with as little delay as possible, in order to succour the hereditary states.

On the 15th the French army advanced, in two columns, to the Isonza. The advanced guard, under General d'Espagne, after a feeble opposition from the Austrians, entered Gradiska early on that evening. The French continued the pursuit towards Goritzia, with the intention of passing the river below that town, but their pontoons not having arrived, they were unable to execute their project.

The Austrians had now retired under the walls of Goritzia, when Massena made his dispositions for a general attack upon them on the morning of the 17th. But the archduke had retired on the night towards Laybach, harassed without intermission by the French light troops. The magazines formed at Udina and Palma fell into the hands of the French army, who now took up a position beyond the Isonza.

Here the French general judged it advisable to arrest his progress, until he should be informed of the state of things in his rear. On commencing the pursuit of the archduke's army, he left the Tyrol occupied by a considerable corps of Austrians: under these circumstances, his advancing further might be attended with great risk. Whatever apprehensions he might entertain on this score were not of any long continuance, for the Austrian corps in the Tyrol, commanded by the Archduke John, were closely pressed from the sides of Suabia and Bavaria.

Augereau, early in November, had made himself master of Lindau and Bregentz, on the high road to Hungary.

There remained in the Tyrol a corps of Austrians, consisting of about 7,000 infantry and 1,000 cavalry, commanded by the Prince of Rohan, which were placed in a most critical situation by the late events. The only possibility of escape seemed to be to reach Venice, by passing behind the army of Massena. Accordingly, they proceeded across the mountains, between the Tyrol and Italy, and actually arrived, on the 24th, at Bassano, and took the road to Castel-Franco. In the neighbourhood of this place, they were opposed by detachments from the army of St. Cyr, who was stationed at Padua, (to observe Venice, which was threatened by a descent from a Russian and British force) while Massena marched to attack them on the other side. On the 25th, the Austrians attacked a corps of French, under General Regnier, which was posted at Piombino, to cut off the road to Venice, with such fury, as to compel them to retire from the field. At this moment General St. Cyr came up and fell upon the Austrian rear. Resistance could now avail but little, so that the greater part of this corps, together with the Prince of Rohan, and several other officers of distinction, were made prisoners.

By these operations Italy and the Feldkirch were completely evacuated by the Austrians, and the division under Augereau compelled the corps of Generals Jellachich and Wolfskehl to capitulate, with the condition not to serve against France during a year. Augereau, however, did not advance out of Suabia, but remained in the neighbourhood of Ulm, as it were to protect the rear of Bonaparte's army, and to make head against a corps of Russians, assembled in Franconia apparently with a hostile intention.

In the mean time Marshal Ney, supported by a corps of Bavarians, under their General Deroi, entered the Tyrol at Fuessen, and having turned, by passes of extreme difficulty, and little known, the forts of Scharnitz and Newstark, carried both places by assault, taking one standard, sixteen field-pieces, and about 1,700 prisoners. On the 16th he entered Inspruck, where he found an arsenal and magazines, well supplied with stores. Ney pursued his advantage, and on the 20th fixed his head-quarters at Bolzano, having his out-posts advanced as far as Trent.

The Archduke John, finding his force insufficient to maintain himself in the Tyrol, nearly surrounded on all sides, planned and effected, with much boldness, a junction with the Archduke Charles in Carniola. This attempt, however, was not accomplished without considerable loss. The two brothers then hastened their march towards Vienna.

The Tyrol being completely cleared of the Austrian troops, Massena advanced to Laybach, which had been evacuated by the Archduke Charles, whilst his left formed a communication with Ney's division, which extended itself from Saltzburgh to Carinthia.

The detached corps of the French army having executed the operations consigned to them, Bonaparte had at his immediate disposal almost the whole of his army, to face the united forces, composed of the remnant of the Austrian-German army, and of the Russians, who had received great reinforcements. Upon the reduction of the Tyrol, the corps of Ney and Marmont approached the Danube, to support the main body of the French army, whilst Massena took up positions with the intention of occupying the attention of the Archduke Charles. Marshal Davoust, upon the capture of Vienna, had marched to Presburgh, and attempted a negociation with the Archduke Palatine, for the neutrality of Hungary. But in hearkening to these overtures, the Hungarians seem to have had no other object in view than to amuse the French, for the purpose of delay. No conditions were concluded, and Davoust with his corps joined the main army, preparatory to a general action, which was daily expected to take place.

The state of the opposed armies appears to have been nearly equal in point of numbers. The Russians amounted to about 50,000 men, the Austrians to about 25,000, the latter chiefly new levies. The French force, after the junction of Bernadotte and Davoust, consisted of between 70 and 80,000 men, but they were flushed with victory, and out of all measure superior to their antagonists in military skill, confidence, and discipline.

The two armies were now in presence of each other, both determined to make a stand. However, on the 29th of November, Counts Stadion and Ginlay were commissioned, on the part of the Emperor of Germany, to open a negotiation for peace with Bonaparte, and at the same time Count Haugwitz arrived at Vienna to offer the mediation of the King of Prussia, who, it was supposed, was strongly inclined to take a part in the war against France. Bonaparte seemed to listen to the proposition, but, as the event proved, merely with the view of putting the allies off their guard; for having so many advantages on his side, his object was to draw the enemy to a decisive action; and, under the semblance of diffidence and moderation, he redoubled his vigilance, and made his preparations to meet such an event.

On the morning of the 28th the Russians, who were no parties to the proposed accommodation, attacked the advanced posts of the French army at Wishau, forced them to fall back, and made some prisoners. The Emperor Alexander, who had lately joined his army, advanced to that place, followed by the main body of his troops, who took up a position in the rear of the town.

Bonaparte, on hearing of the Emperor of Russia's arrival, dispatched General Savary, one of his aids-de-camp, avowedly to compliment that sovereign. This officer remained a day or two within the Russian lines, during which time he had an opportunity of observing the state and disposition of that army. On his return to the French head-quarters, he reported that a great degree of confidence and presumption prevailed on the part of the Russian officers, which he attributed to the influence which several young men had over the Emperor Alexander.

To encourage this delusion, and to lull them into still greater security, Bonaparte ordered his army to retreat in the night, and to take a favorable situation three leagues in the rear, which he manifested much eagerness in fortifying, by throwing up works and placing batteries. In this position he proposed an interview with the Emperor of Russia, who sent, on his part, his aid-de-camp, Prince Dogorucki. Bonaparte, to impress him, as it were, with an idea that he was unwilling to permit him to witness the apprehensions of the French troops, went to meet him at the outposts. This circumstance, accompanied by the preceding retreat of the French army, induced him to believe what Bonaparte wished, namely, that the French army was under great alarm. Prince Dogorucki, actuated by these sentiments, had the boldness to insist upon the whole of the demands with which he was charged. He peremptorily required that Bonaparte should renounce the possession of Belgium, and likewise the crown of Italy. Bonaparte returned no definitive answer, and left the Russians to indulge the notion that he and his army were intimidated.

Circumstances induced the allies to risk a general action at a time when procrastination was far more politic. It was said, that the whole of the Russian reinforcements had arrived, and that the allied forces, from the loss of the magazines at Brunn and other places, were extremely straitened for provisions, owing partly to the neglect of the Austrian commissariat, and partly to the detension of the horses of the country, in the rear of the army, by the Russians. Relaxation in discipline and licentiousness began to manifest themselves, so that it was resolved to abandon the position in front of Olmutz, for the purpose of attacking the enemy.

The grand French army, which had passed the Danube, and advanced into Moravia, consisted of the corps under Prince Murat, Marshals Soult, Lasnes, and Bernadotte. The last of these corps had been opposed to the Archduke Ferdinand, and joined the main army only the day before the battle of Austerlitz. Marshal Davoust, who, as already mentioned, had proceeded with his corps to Presburgh, joined the main army about the same time. This force was composed of eight divisions, each of which was about 7000 strong. In addition to this was a corps de reserve, composed of the imperial guards, under Marshal Bessieres, and a body of grenadiers under General Duroc, making together 15,000 men.

The combined forces immediately opposed to them consisted of 104 battalions, 20 of which were Austrians, and 159 squadrons, 54 of which were Austrians, and 40 of Cossacks, which might be computed at about 72,000 men. The Russians were commanded by General Kutusoff; the Austrians by Prince John of Lichtenstein. The infantry of the latter were chiefly raw recruits, who had not been embodied above a month. Such was nearly the state of the two armies immediately before the battle of Austerlitz.

As the allies had determined upon resuming offensive operations and of immediately giving battle, the following were the dispositions made by them for the attack. On the 1st of December, there was a good deal of firing, during the morning, along the whole chain of advanced troops; the Austrian General Kienmeyer's out-posts on the left were at Sitchen, and near Menitz, a village which had been abandoned by the French. He was reinforced towards the evening by five battalions of frontier troops, under Major-general Cameville; the left of the combined army, commanded by General Buxhoevden, and the centre by the General-in-chief Koutousoff, after having dined, moved forward in five columns. The first, under Lieutenant-general Docktorow, composed of 24 battalions of Russians, took up a position in two lines on the heights near a village called Hortieradeck, and a regiment of chasseurs was posted at Aujut, between the foot of the mountain and the lake of Menitz. The second column, commanded by Lieutenant-general Langeron, consisting of 18 battalions of Russians, took up a position on the heights of Pratzen, also in two lines, on the right of the first column. The third, commanded by Lieutenant-general Przybyszewsky, composed of 18 battalions of Russians, took up a position on the heights to the right of the village of Pratzen. The fourth, commanded by the Austrian General Kollowrath, was composed of 12 battalions of Russians, under Lieutenant-general Miloradowitsch, and of fifteen of Austrians, who were in the rear of this column. This corps intersected the road from Austerlitz to Brunn, and took post in two lines behind the third column. The fifth, composed of cavalry under Prince John of Lichtenstein, consisting of eighty-two squadrons, took post under the heights in the rear of the third column.

The corps of reserve under the Archduke Constantine, composed of ten battalions and eighteen squadrons of guards, posted itself on the heights in front of Austerlitz, with its left towards Krzenowitz, and its right towards the high road from Austerlitz to Brunn. The advanced corps, under Prince Bagration, extended beyond Holubitz and Blasowitz, in order to facilitate the march of the third and fourth columns, upon their points of formation.

General Kienmeyer, as soon as the columns in front of Austerlitz and Krzenowitz had taken their position, placed himself, having marched by Pratzen, in front of Aujut, where he arrived at nine o'clock at night: his corps was then composed of twenty-two squadrons of Austrians, ten of Cossacks, and five battalions of Croats. The head-quarters were at Krzenowitz.

This offensive movement was made by the army in open day, and in sight of the enemy, who did not offer to interrupt it; on the contrary, some of the French out-posts were withdrawn, and, what seemed extraordinary, during the night, there was no chain of out-posts established in front of the position occupied by the allies. The two armies were separated by the defiles of Tellnitz, Sokolnitz, and Schlapanitz, and had the allies wished to remain upon the defensive, they were advantageously posted for the purpose, and ready, at the same time, to act offensively; but they were determined on giving battle the next day.

Bonaparte, who had distinctly observed these operations of the combined army, is said to have exclaimed to those around him, "before to-morrow night, that army will be in my power." He kept his troops concentrated in massive columns, ready to act according to circumstances.

Marshal Bernadotte, who had joined the army a day or two before, and who remained a little in the rear, in order to rest his men, was ordered to take post near the village of Girschikowitz. This corps was composed of the divisions of Rivaux and Drouet, and formed the centre of the French army. Prince Murat's cavalry was in the rear of Bernadotte and on his left; Marshal Lasnes formed the left wing, with the divisions of Souchet and Caffarelli; this last was connected with the left of Murat. The right of the army, commanded by Marshal Soult, was placed between Kobelnitz and Sokolnitz. The division of Le Grand, forming the extreme right, was posted between Kolnitz and Tellnitz, and occupied these villages with strong detachments of infantry. The division of Vandamme was on the left, and that of St. Hilaire in the centre of Marshal Soult's corps.

The reserve of the army, composed of ten battalions of the imperial guard, and ten battalions of grenadiers, under General Oudinot, the whole commanded by General Duroc, was near Turas. The division of Friant, belonging to the corps under Marshal Davoust, which had just arrived from Presbourg, was sent to the convent of Reygorn, on the river Schwartz, to observe and keep the enemy in check, should he approach by the route of Auspitz. The division of General Gudia, with some dragoons, likewise belonging to Davoust's corps, advanced from Nicholsburg, on the right of the French army, to keep in check the corps of General Count Merveldt, who had penetrated through Hungary to Lundenburgh.

This general had with him his own regiment of hulans and the emperor's hussars, and six battalions of infantry, all very much weakened by a difficult retreat, and little exceeding 4,000 men. The French army had also opposed to it a detachment of O'Rielly's light cavalry, and some Cossacks, which were sent to Gros-Niemschitz, to observe that point.

Bonaparte, after having discovered the intention of the allies, issued an address to his troops, to the following effect: "that the Russian army, which they had beaten at Hollabrunn, and who had been flying before them, were now before them to avenge the defeat of the Austrians at Ulm; that the French army occupied a formidable position, and that while the enemy marched to attack his right, they would expose their flank; that he should himself direct all the battalions, and if victory became for a moment doubtful, that he should put himself in front of the battle; that this victory would finish the campaign, and that a peace would follow worthy of his people, of his army, and himself."

In the course of the night, he visited, incognito, the out-posts. He was soon recognized by the soldiers, who manifested their enthusiasm by loud acclamations.

The disposition for the attack of the French army was delivered to the general officers of the Austro-Russian army soon after midnight on the morning of the 2d of December. But the imperfect knowledge which was possessed of the enemy's position, although scarcely out of the range of the musketry, rendered the suppositions upon which the plan of the attack was founded very indefinite. It was imagined, that the French army was weakened in its centre to reinforce its left. The combined army out-flanked the right of the French. It was supposed, that, by passing the defiles of Sokolnitz and of Kobelnitz, their right would be turned, and that the attack might afterwards be continued in the plain between Schlapanitz and the wood of Turas, thus avoiding the defiles of Schlapanitz and Bellowitz, which it was believed covered the front of the enemy's position. The French army was then to be attacked by its right, which was to be done with great celerity and vigor. The valley between Tellnitz and Sokolnitz was to be passed with rapidity. The right of the allies (on which were the cavalry of Prince John of Lichtenstein and the advanced corps under Prince Bagration,) was to cover this movement. The first of these generals was on the plain between Krug and Schlapanitz, on each side of the causeway, occupying the heights situated between Dwaroschna and the Inn of Lesch, with his artillery. With this view the five columns, as already mentioned, received orders to advance, and accordingly, at seven o'clock the next morning, they put themselves in motion, from the heights of Pratzen.

At the dawn of day Bonaparte collected his generals on a commanding height: he waited until the sun had appeared above the horizon before he issued his last orders: they then rode off, at full gallop, to join their respective corps. He himself passed, with great rapidity, along the whole line, and was received with great enthusiasm by the troops.

The movements of the allies were perfectly discernable to the French, who could not but perceive considerable intervals between the columns, in proportion as they approached the valleys of Tellnitz, Sokolnitz, and Kobelnitz. The action began on the left wing of the allies.

The corps of General Kienmeyer, posted in front of Aujut, was nearest the enemy, and destined to force the defile of Tellnitz, and to carry the village of that name as soon as possible, in order to open a passage for the first column, which had a great circuit to make before it could arrive at the point which would bring it in a line with the second column.

The French had some infantry posted on a hill in front of the village: General Kienmeyer attacked them. His troops were twice repulsed, but, receiving reinforcements, he at length succeeded in gaining possession of it with two battalions, under General Stutterheim. The Austrian cavalry suffered considerably from the French sharpshooters, who were placed in the vineyards and other inclosures round the village. The French still defended the village. The action had lasted above an hour before the first Russian column made its appearance: at length General Buxhoevden arrived, who detached a force to their support, by which means the French were dislodged. The French, reinforced by 4000 men, from the corps of General Davoust, which was stationed at the convent of Reygan, availing themselves of a sudden fog, again obtained possession of the village and the hill beyond it. As soon as the fog dispersed, the allied troops again moved forwards, and the French abandoned the village. This being accomplished, the defile was passed without difficulty, and the plain occupied between Tellnitz and Turas. Here they wished to form a communication with the second column; but this, and likewise the third column, had met with some opposition from a part of the division of Le Grand, which occupied Sokolnitz, and, in passing that village, they were further delayed by some confusion in their movements.

The French troops had hitherto remained upon the defensive; but Bonaparte had not failed to remark the want of concert and consistency in the movements of the Austro-Russian army; and perceiving that by the circuitous route their left was obliged to take, it became more distant from the centre in proportion as it advanced, immediately put in motion the massive columns, which he had kept together, with a view of marching against the centre, and by that manoeuvre cutting off the left wing, which still continued to advance for the purpose of turning the French army in a position which he did not occupy. During this operation, the reserve of the French army remained upon the heights between Schlapanitz and Kobelnitz, and had not occasion to fire a shot.

Marshal Soult, with the two divisions of St. Hilaire and Vandamme, traversed the villages of Kobelnitz and Puntswitz, to attack the heights and the village of Pratzen. At the same time Marshal Bernadotte, after having crossed the rivulet at the village of Girschicowitz, with the division of Rivaud on his left, and that of Drouet on his right, took his direction on the heights of Blasowitz. The cavalry, under Prince Murat, formed several lines on the left of Bernadotte, and marched between Girschicowitz and Krug. Marshal Lasnes, having on his right the division of Caffarelli, and on his left that of General Suchet, moved forward on the left of Murat. From that time the centre and right of the allies became engaged in all quarters.

The grand Duke Constantine was destined, with the corps of Russian guards, to form the reserve of the right, and quitted the heights in front of Austerlitz, at the appointed hour, to occupy those of Blasowitz and Krug. He had scarcely arrived at this point, before he found himself engaged with the sharpshooters of Rivaud's division, and Murat's light cavalry, commanded by General Kellermann. The grand duke hastened to occupy the village of Blasowitz, with the light infantry battalion of the guards, at the same time Prince John of Lichtenstein arrived with his cavalry, and detached ten squadrons to protect Prince Bagration's left flank, which was opposed to part of Murat's cavalry. Prince John of Lichtenstein found the grand duke in presence of the cavalry under Kellermann, supported by the infantry of Bernadotte's left, and Lasnes' right. It was determined to charge the enemy: and the Archduke's regiment was the first that pushed forward. This was executed with intrepidity, but with too great precipitancy, for the French cavalry, retiring through the intervals of their infantry, the Russian cavalry pursued, but being thus placed, between the fires of Caffarelli's division, on their right, and that of Rivaud on their left, the hulans lost above 400 men, and the Archduke's regiment was put completely to the route. In this state, it reached the corps under Bagration. This last general had now moved forward from Pororsitz, to oppose the left of Marshal Lasnes, which rested on Kovalow-witz. The villages of Krug and Holubitz were occupied by three battalions of Russian infantry.

It will appear that the centre of the combined army had been very much weakened by the strong force which was detached to so great a distance on their left, with the view of turning the enemy's right, while the division on the right was not sufficiently strong to divide the French forces. Bonaparte, whose intention was to take advantage of this circumstance from the moment he discovered the plan of the allies, brought a very superior force to act against their centre. It is computed that, in this point, the Austro-Russians did not exceed 12,000 men, while the troops destined to attack them were at least double that number. The centre of the allies was thus perfectly insulated. However, according to the original plan, they prepared to advance about eight o'clock, the Emperor Alexander having arrived at the head of the fourth column, which was commanded by the Austrian General Kollowrath. The action therefore near Tellnitz had already begun, and the left was in motion, when the centre formed, and broke into platoons from the left. These measures had hardly been taken, when a massive column of French infantry was discovered in a bottom, in front of Pratzen. This column was composed of the divisions of Vandamme and St. Hilaire.

The Russian commander-in-chief, General Koutousoff, whom this movement of the French had taken by surprise, (thinking himself the assailant, and seeing himself attacked in the midst of his combinations) felt all the importance of maintaining the heights of Pratzen, against which the enemy were moving. It was the summit of these heights which decided the fate of the day. It was the key to the position, which the allied army had just quitted, and, from the confined state of the different columns, their fate depended upon whoever was master of this height. Koutousoff, on being informed that the enemy was so near him, gave orders for shewing him a front, and for occupying the height; at the same time, he sent for some cavalry, from the column under Prince John of Lichtenstein, who sent him four Russian regiments.

Besides the corps of Vandamme, and St. Hilaire, another body of French made its appearance on the right of Pratzen, and threatened to pass through the interval, between the fourth column and the cavalry under Prince John of Lichtenstein. This column was part of the corps under Marshal Bernadotte. The Russian infantry, belonging to the fourth column, now marched to the right of Pratzen, and sent a reinforcement to the advanced guard, which occupied a hill in front of that village. But this advanced guard, being attacked by superior numbers, was compelled to abandon the position.

The Russians then made an attack, but they opened their fire at too great a distance, while the French continued to advance without firing a shot, until they came within a hundred paces of the enemy: hereupon they opened a very destructive fire of musketry, and forming in several lines, marched rapidly towards the height, resting their left on the church of the village, and their right on the elevated points of the heights. Having reached them, they formed in an angular direction, for the purpose of opposing the rear of the third column. This was composed of the brigade under General Kaminskoy, which had separated from the column, and shewed a front upon the heights, menacing the right flank of Marshal Soult's corps.

The allies, sensible that the fate of the battle depended upon the possession of the heights, made several efforts to dislodge the enemy. The Emperor Alexander, who had constantly remained with the infantry of the fourth column during this desperate conflict, ordered his battalions to advance, and try to take the enemy in flank: General Kollowrath received orders to check him on the left; and two regiments of Russians, who had been left in reserve, upon the ground occupied during the night by the second column, to which they belonged, were ordered to reinforce the brigades under General Kaminskoy.

On this occasion the French generals manœuvred their troops with their usual ability, the result of a military eye and of experience, taking advantage of the inequalities of ground, to cover their men from fire and to conceal their movements.

The only chance that now remained to the allies of turning the fate of the day, was by a general and desperate attack at the point of the bayonet. The Austrian brigades, with that under General Kamenskoy, accordingly charged, but they were received by the French with steadiness and a well-supported fire, which made a dreadful carnage in the compact ranks of the Russians. General Miloradowitch advanced upon the right, but the Generals Berg and Repninsky being wounded, their troops lost that confidence in themselves, without which nothing is to be done in war. The ardour of this attack soon evaporated; nevertheless, the example of some of their officers had, at one moment, the effect to induce the left wing again to advance with intrepidity, and for an instant the right wing of the French began to give way.

The French, in their turn, attacked the allies, who were without any support, and absolutely abandoned by the left wing of their army. Resistance became of no avail, and the fourth column of the combined army lost the heights of Pratzen beyond the possibility of recovery, together with the greatest part of their artillery, which was entangled in the deep clay that prevails in that part of the country. The French advanced their artillery, and vigorously cannonaded the retreating army, by which it was put into great confusion. This action on the heights of Pratzen lasted two hours, and the issue of it was decisive of the battle.

The fourth column retired to the position of Hodiégitz and Herspitz, where it collected its battalions, the French remaining in possession of the heights of Pratzen.

Whilst the action took this turn in the centre, the cavalry, under Prince John of Lichtenstein, attempted to make head both to the right and left against the French infantry and a part of Murat's cavalry, in order to check, or at least retard, their success. This general succeeded in rallying some Austrian battalions, which, like the Russian infantry, were retreating in disorder. His horse was killed under him by a grape-shot. The cavalry continued to occupy the foot of the heights of Pratzen, between the village of that name and Kozenovitz, until night. The grand Duke Constantine also found himself in an obstinate contest. The village of Blasowitz, which he had caused to be occupied, was attacked by the corps under Bernadotte. The grand duke wishing to stop the enemy's progress, left the commanding heights on which he was posted, and advanced in line upon the French columns; a sharp fire of musketry ensued. The French sharpshooters, who covered their columns, were driven in by a charge with the bayonet, which was ordered by the grand duke. A sharp cannonade, attended with much execution, then took place on this point. The grape-shot made a dreadful carnage; but, at the moment when the prince approached the enemy, the cavalry of the French guards, which had been posted in the intervals of the infantry, made a charge upon the Russian line, which being without support, was driven back, after a brave resistance. In order to disengage the infantry, the grand duke's regiment of horse-guards made a charge on the enemy's flank, checked and routed their cavalry, and afterwards attacked the infantry, which had advanced to their support. On this occasion the French lost a standard belonging to the fourth regiment. The Russian guards were, however, obliged to retire; but they succeeded, after considerable loss, in rallying and forming on the heights which they had quitted, whence they continued their movements upon Austerlitz, marching towards Krzenowitz. The French cavalry renewed the attack, but they were checked by the Russian horse-guards and some squadrons of hussars, who charged them at the very moment when they were about to assail the infantry during its retreat. The Russian cavalry was likewise closely engaged with the French horse grenadier-guards, who had come up, under General Rapp, to reinforce the French cavalry.

From that moment the Russian guards effected their retreat upon Austerlitz, without further molestation from the French, who remained on the heights in front of Blasowitz. Prince Repnin, colonel of the horse-guards, was wounded, and made prisoner, with some officers of the same corps, which suffered severely.

On the right of the allies was Prince Bagration, in front of Posornitz. General Uwarow, with the cavalry under his command, was upon that prince's left near Holubitz; but Marshal Lasnes arriving with his troops in columns between these two corps, put a stop to the march of the right of the allies, and Lasnes, to secure the retreat of the left wing of the French army, in case of disaster, posted eighteen pieces of cannon, protected by a regiment of infantry, on a commanding height to the left of the road leading to Brunn. This height was to have been occupied by Prince Bagration.

This prince maintained himself for some time in his position; but the enemy continuing to advance in column, supported by part of the cavalry under Murat, and having driven the Russians from the villages of Krug and Holubitz, he retired upon the right of Rauswitz, and in the evening marched to Austerlitz. General Ulanus, who commanded the Russian cavalry, by great intelligence and bravery retarded the rapid progress which the French would otherwise have made, while General Uwarow, with a corps of cavalry, protected the retreat. Prince Bagration took post in the rear of Austerlitz, while the cavalry under Prince John of Lichtenstein occupied the heights in front of that place.

It is necessary now to revert to what was passing on the left of the combined army at Tellnitz and Sokolnitz. The first, second, and third columns continued to march upon the points fixed in the original plan of attack, without advert- ing to the enemy's movements, and without having discrimination enough to take that direction, which the nature of the ground, and the position of the enemy, ought to have suggested to them. These three columns were composed of fifty-five battalions, exclusive of the brigade of Kamen- skoy, which remained behind to oppose General Le Grand, and a part of Marshal Davoust's corps. Had the left of the allied army taken advantage of the ground, and seized the means which it presented for again concentrating itself, the defeat might at least have been rendered less decisive. The offensive movement on the part of the French disconcerted the attack of the allies, from which they never recovered.

The French being in possession of the heights of Pratzen, beyond the left of the allies, so that the Russians, who were at Sokolnitz, were surrounded, General Przibischewsky, who had the command of this corps, was made prisoner, together with 6,000 men, and the whole of their artillery. The relics of the second column retreated upon Aujut in disorder, and what continued embodied fell back upon the first column. This latter, informed, when too late, of the attack made by the French upon the centre, intended to move to its support, but took a wrong direction to be capable of making a diversion in its favor.

The Austrian cavalry, which had been left beyond Tellnitz, retired through that village, leaving some battalions of infantry, and a few cavalry, on the hill fronting it, to secure the march of General Buxhoevden, who was retiring upon Aujut, by the route he had advanced. To protect the flank of the Russian infantry, the Szeckler hussars, under Prince Maurice of Lichtenstein, and O'Reilly's light cavalry, with two regiments of cossacks, under General Stutterheim, were advanced upon the plain, between the foot of the hills and the villages of Tellnitz and Sokolnitz. General Norlitz, with the hussars of Hesse Hombourg, marched with the column.

The French, after their success in the centre, had already brought forward their reserve, consisting of twenty battalions, and had extended along the brow of the heights that were occupied in the morning by the allies, from Pratzen to the chapel above Aujut, but as yet they were not in force, and had no cannon above that village.

As soon as this column of the allies arrived in Aujut, the division of Vandamme rushed like a torrent down upon the village, of which, after a short resistance, they took possession. Four thousand men were made prisoners, and lost their artillery. But General Buxhoevden, with a few battalions, succeeded in rejoining the army near Austerlitz. Many fugitives perished in the lake, which was not sufficiently frozen to support them.

After the French had occupied Aujut, the centre and rear of the first column fell back, under the orders of General Docktorow, upon the plain between Tellnitz and the lake. The only retreat left them was over a narrow dyke between two lakes, on which two men only could pass abreast. General Kienmeyer, with a body of hussars, was sent over in advance, in order to observe the enemy, who, it was feared, might attempt to cut off the retreat by coming round the lake. The Russian infantry was likewise protected by the cavalry under Prince Maurice and General Stutterheim.

The conclusion of this battle is very remarkable, since the troops of the right wing of the French army turned their backs upon Austerlitz, to attack the left of the allies, to do which they quitted the same heights whence the allies had marched to attack them. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon: the action was decided along the rest of the line, when the division of Vandamme advanced to complete it. The Russian infantry, in proportion as it passed the dyke, retired to an eminence in the rear of Tellnitz. That village, as affording some means of defence, was likewise occupied by a regiment of infantry, in order to give time to the rest of the column to file off. General Doctorow continued the retreat. Tellnitz was attacked and taken, wherein were found many Russian stragglers.

During this scene of confusion, the Austrian cavalry behaved with the greatest courage, and they suffered prodigiously from the enemy's artillery; yet nothing could prevent them from continuing to cover the retreat of the Russians, which was long protracted, owing to the fatigue and exhaustion of the infantry. The Russian column, when it reached Newhoff, formed still a corps of at least 8,000 men. It was then four o'clock, and already began to grow dark; the Russian battalions, after being restored to some order, continued to retreat by Boscowitz, and marched the whole night under a heavy fall of rain, which completed the destruction of the roads, so that the remaining artillery was abandoned. The Austrian cavalry formed the rear-guard, without being pursued by the French.

The victorious army took up the position occupied by the allied army on the preceding night. The latter retired completely behind Austerlitz, into the position of Holiegitz. But the very considerable loss sustained in killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing, more especially of the first, second, third, and fourth columns, placed this army in a very feeble state, with respect to its disposable force. The Austrian cavalry, which had been commanded by Prince John of Lichtenstein, had alone some detachments in front of Austerlitz, and formed the rear-guard of the army. Thus closed this ever memorable day.

The loss sustained on both sides was immense. By killed, wounded, and prisoners, the allied army was diminished more than a fourth part. Forty standards and the greatest part of their artillery and baggage were taken, and such was the number of wounded left upon the field, that they could not all be dressed until two days after the battle.

On the day following (the 3d of December) the French army advanced. The cavalry, under Murat, which on the preceding evening had pushed forward detachments upon Rausnitz and Wischau, advanced beyond Prosnitz, and sent out strong parties to Kremsin. Marshal Lasnes marched to gain the right of the allies by Butshovitz and Stanitz. Marshal Soult and Bernadotte, with the imperial guards, and the grenadiers of the reserve, were posted on the route towards Hungary. Marshal Davoust marched upon the left flank of the Austro-Russian army, by the routes of Nicholsburg and of Auspitz.

A trifling affair took place in the course of the day: Prince Bagration was attacked in the neighbourhood of Urschutz: he maintained his post. He retired, however, in the evening, towards Czeitsch.

On the 4th the allied army crossed the river March, and arrived at Hollitsch. The Emperor Alexander took up his quarters in the castle of Hollitsch, whilst the Emperor of Germany remained at Czeitsch.

Prince John of Lichtenstein had been sent, on the night of the 2d of December, to the French emperor, to propose an armistice on the part of the Emperor Francis; and it was agreed, that a suspension of hostilities should take place, to commence on the 4th, at day-break. The prince arrived at head-quarters the evening before, but it appeared that the French was not apprised of this transaction in sufficient time to prevent the hostile movements made on the 4th.

In consequence of this agreement, an interview took place between the Emperors of Germany and France, in the open air, at a small distance from the village of Nasedlowitz, near a mill, by the road side. This conference lasted a considerable time, when the Emperor Francis returned to Czeitsch, which place he reached in the evening, and immediately dispatched an Austrian general to communicate the result to the Emperor Alexander. General Savary was appointed by Bonaparte to attend the Austrian general to the Russian head-quarters. The Emperor of Russia received them with politeness, and, at the same time, made no positive objection to the armistice, though he did not formally concur in it.

In conformity with the terms of this agreement, the French army was to remain in possession of its conquests, namely, part of Moravia and Hungary, all Upper and Lower Austria, the Tyrol, the state of Vienna, Carinthia, Styria, Carniola, the country of Goritz and Istria; and lastly, in Bohemia, the circle of Montabar, with the whole space to the eastward, from Tabor to Lintz. The French army was to hold this immense tract until the conclusion of a definitive peace, or the rupture of the negotiations; in the latter of which case it was stipulated, that hostilities should not re-commence within fourteen days, and that the cessation of the armistice should then be announced to the plenipotentiaries of both powers, at the head of their respective armies. It was further agreed, that the Russian army should evacuate the Austrian states, Moravia, and Hungary, within the period of fifteen days, and Galicia within a month; the routes to be prescribed to the Russian army; that there should be no levy or insurrection in Hungary, nor any extraordinary raising of troops in Bohemia, nor that any foreign army should be permitted to enter the territory of the house of Austria; and, finally, it was conditioned, that negociators from both powers should meet at Nicholsburg, for the commencement of a treaty, in order to effect, without delay, the re-establishment of peace between the two emperors.

To these humiliating conditions, derogatory to the dignity of his throne and the interests of his allies, the Emperor Alexander, with that magnanimity which had distinguished his majesty on all occasions, refused to become a party, and accordingly caused his army, although under very distressing circumstances, to commence its retreat, on the 6th of December, from the Austrian states.

Prince John of Lichtenstein, on the part of Austria, and M. de Talleyrand, on the part of France, were deputed to conclude the definitive treaty.

Although the allies suffered so signal a defeat on the 2d of December, their army was far from being annihilated, so that, by prudence and fortitude, they could still, at least, have engaged a great proportion of the French army. The Archduke Ferdinand, who commanded a corps of about 20,000 Austrians in Bohemia, before intelligence could reach him of the conclusion of the armistice, attacked and defeated, with considerable loss, a corps of Bavarians under General Wrede, and was rapidly advancing in the rear of the French army; and, almost at the same time, the Archduke Charles made his appearance from Hungary, within a day's march of Vienna, on the right bank of the Danube, with his army in excellent order, and consisting of about 80,000 men. Under these circumstances, it is to be presumed, that, had the Emperor Francis not been so precipitate in concluding a treaty with Bonaparte, that the fortune of war might have taken a very different turn, at least Austria might, doubtless, have obtained conditions infinitely more favorable; for, in case of defeat, or even a severe check, at the distance at which the French army was from its frontier, it risked being totally destroyed. Indeed, it was said, that the Archduke Charles, impressed with this notion, was mortified, in the highest degree, on receiving intelligence, when he summoned the city of Vienna to surrender, of this pusillanimous transaction, which incapacitated him from making further efforts for the honor and advantage of the house of Austria and his country.

Pending the negotiation for peace, the French grand army occupied the following positions. Marshal Bernadotte resumed his station in Bohemia; Marshal Mortier remained in Moravia; Marshal Davoust returned to Presburg, the capital of Hungary; Marshal Soult occupied Vienna; Marshal Ney, Carinthia; General Marmont, Styria; and Marshal Massena, Carniola; whilst Marshal Augereau, with the reserve, continued in Suabia.

of the council. The return of the Addingtons to a share in the administration, did not cause much surprise either to the friends or enemies of that party;—but that the minister should again ally himself to the man, whose conduct in office he had arraigned, in terms of the bitterest sarcasm and severest invective, with reference to his general conduct of the public interests, both at home and abroad; whom he had repeatedly held up to view as ignorant and inefficient, and whom he had so recently exposed with all the bitterness of the most reproachful scorn, indeed excited universal astonishment.

On April 6, Mr. Whitbread brought under the consideration of the House of Commons the subject of the tenth report of the commissioners of naval enquiry. He began by describing the origin of the commission, praised the integrity and perseverance of the commissioners themselves, and complimented the late board of admiralty, by which they were appointed; after which he passed on to the nature of the charge he had to bring against Lord Viscount Melville, and in which were implicated the conduct of Mr. Trotter, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Mark Sprot. He then referred to the act, of which Lord Melville was the supporter, in 1785, for regulating the department of treasurer of the navy, and the order of council by which his salary was advanced from 2,000*l.* to 4,000*l.* a year, in lieu of all profits, fees, or emoluments he might before have derived from allowances of the public money in his hands. Lord Melville was, himself, at that time treasurer of the navy, and though the act was passed in July, it was not till the subsequent January that the balances were paid into the bank, pursuant to the terms of the act, and this delay in the transfer could only be accounted for on the score of private emolument. He then stated his three heads of charges against the noble lord,—first, his having applied the money of the public to other uses than those of the naval department, in express contempt of an act of parliament, and in gross violation of his duty.—Secondly, this conniving at a system of peculation in an individual, for whose conduct, in the use of the public money, he was deeply responsible, and for this connivance he denounced him as guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor.—Thirdly, his having, himself, been a participator in that system of peculation; but as this only rested on suspicion, at present, he would not then much insist upon it; but, if the inquiry should be instituted, he pledged himself to follow it up, with moderation, on his own part, but with firmness and steadiness for the country.

After having exhorted gentlemen of all descriptions in that house to join with him in bringing such enormous delinquency to punishment, he concluded with reading thirteen resolutions, founded on the subject-matter of his speech, but added, that for the present he should only press the first eleven of them.

The utmost efforts of administration failed in screening Lord Melville from the effect of these resolutions; the mode of procedure against his lordship, as a delinquent, having been warmly contested. The friends of the accused, who were, at first, adverse to the measure of impeachment, and had pledged the house to a prosecution in the courts of law, thought, afterwards, that it would be more to the advantage of Lord Melville to be tried by his peers, and suddenly veering round, moved, that he should be impeached, which measure, though with great difficulty, they carried. During the whole of these proceedings, the new president of the council and his adherents separated from the minister, and took an eager and an active part in bringing Lord Melville to the bar of public justice:—conduct which must have been considered as a defection from the government, of which they formed a part, and, as such, must have been deeply resented by the minister.

Other causes of disagreement, it was rumoured, existed between Mr. Pitt and Lord Sidmouth at this period; for, on the 10th of July the Viscount Sidmouth and the Earl of Buckinghamshire resigned their respective offices, and were succeeded in them by Earl Camden and Lord Harrowby.

The success of Mr. Whitbread's motion against Lord Melville having driven his lordship from the councils of his majesty, he was also soon removed from his high station of first lord-commissioner of the admiralty, in which he was succeeded by Sir Charles Middleton, newly created a baron of the realm, by the title of Lord Barham.

Immediately after the tidings of the surrender of General Mack at Ulm had reached England, Mr. Pitt was observed to droop. His health, already much impaired, became daily worse, and he was compelled, however reluctantly, to quit all public business, and repair to Bath for the benefit of the waters.

The declaration of war against Spain, which opened a new scene of adventure to the British seamen and officers, may well be supposed to have been a popular measure with the navy. The increase of the French fleets, by the junction of those of Spain, rendered them more enterprising than they had of late been, and afforded an opportunity to the English of asserting their superiority in a nobler field than had lately been attempted in the warfare of the catamaran system.

On the 18th of September of the preceding year, Captain Lind, at that time commanding the Centurion, of fifty guns, was, while refitting in Vizagapatam roads, in the East Indies, attacked by the French admiral, Linois, in the Marengo, of eighty guns, with two heavy frigates, forty and thirty-six guns each.—After a close and severe action of two hours, the Centurion succeeded in obliging this formidable squadron to sheer off, with very considerable damage in rigging, and in loss of men. An action, deservedly named, by Admiral Rainier, commanding in chief in those seas, as “ranking with the most famous of the defensive kind ever recorded in the annals of the British navy!” From events of a more recent date, it seems this predatory French naval hero was destined to be foiled and disgraced only when encountered by an inferior British force!

In the Mediterranean also, an action of inferior note, but not less distinguished by skill and intrepidity, occurred in the course of this year, well worthy the historic page. The Arrow sloop, and Acheron bomb-vessel, having convoy, were attacked by two of the largest-sized French frigates, to which their commanders were obliged to surrender, after a desperate action, but not until they had the satisfaction of seeing the merchantmen they were in charge of in safety, and their own vessels sunk!

But if the greatest advantages were to be looked to, by the enterprising British seamen and officers, from the declaration of war against Spain, as holding forth new and great prospects of attaining individual wealth and national glory, the effect of the union of the Spanish fleets with theirs, seemed still more to animate the French nation. Their public orators, boastful of this accumulated strength, took every opportunity of exaggerating its power, and of threatening England with its irresistible effects. Their official gazettes teemed with matter of the same sort, but couched in a strain of mysterious warning, calculated, as they supposed, to terrify and distract the British councils. “Years,” they said, “it was true, had elapsed, but they had not been passed inactively. Arms, ships, and men, had been secretly in preparation, and fleets were now to be poured forth from all her harbours. The ocean was no longer to belong to England; she was bade to tremble in every quarter of the globe, for in every quarter of the globe would her possessions be assailed!”

Nor were the proceedings of the French naval force confined only to empty boasting; a squadron of six sail of the line, and two frigates, in Rochefort, which had remained strictly blockaded for more than two years, found means to elude the British force off that port, and put to sea. On the 15th of the same month, the Toulon fleet, of eleven ships of the line and two frigates, which had been long in a state of complete equipment, also pushed out of the harbour, without being perceived by the squadron under Lord Nelson, then cruising at some distance agreeably to the system of that great man, who, more than a twelvemonth in those seas, never strictly blockaded the port, but gave the French fleet every fair opportunity of putting to sea.

It may easily be supposed that much alarm prevailed at home when it was known that two such formidable fleets of the enemy were actually at sea, and which was aggravated by reports of strong detachments of the Brest fleet having also escaped, with a view to some grand combined exertion of the enemy. Where the blow was to fall, occupied the public mind. Malta, Brazil, the British West Indies—a general junction of the whole of the combined force of the enemy, in order to cover a descent upon Ireland. In short, every possible point of annoyance or attack was warmly agitated in the public mind. At length intelligence was received, upon the 6th of May, from the British commander-in-chief of the forces in the windward and leeward islands, that Dominica had been attacked on the 22d of the February preceding, by a French armament of one three-decker and four other line-of-battle ships, three frigates, two brigs of war, and a schooner, with about 4000 landmen on board. Brigadier-general Prevost, the governor of the island, immediately made the best dispositions for its defence, and opposed, with the small force under his command, the landing of the French, inch by inch. At length the whole of the enemy's force, consisting of 4000 men, under cover of the tremendous fire of the Majestueux of 120 guns, four seventy-fours, and the frigates, having landed, and having made such a disposition as threatened to cut off the retreat of the governor, and his few remaining troops, from the town and fort of Prince Rupert, and thereby reduce the whole island; General Prevost, with the utmost promptitude and presence of mind, directed the regular force, under Captain O'Connel, to make a forced march across the island, and join him at Prince Rupert's; to which place he himself, attended only by his staff, repaired, and arrived in twenty-four hours: the troops also arriving there with their wounded, after four days continued march through the most difficult country existing. The governor immediately took the necessary precautions to place the fort in the best state of defence, and his appearance was so formidable, that the French commander-in-chief, after having in vain summoned him to surrender, thought proper, after levying a contribution upon the inhabitants of Roseau, which town had been set on fire in the moment of attack, and had suffered severely by the conflagration, on the 27th, to reembark his whole force, and, after hovering a day or two in the bay, and about the port of Prince Rupert, made easy sail towards Guadaloupe. Throughout the whole of this transaction the highest praise was due to the conduct of the governor, and the British troops under his command. At one period, 200. of the latter were opposed to more than 2000 of the enemy, and under the command of the gallant Major Nunn, who unfortunately received a mortal wound in the action, and subsequently under Captain O'Connell, succeeded in withstanding them for more than two hours, and then effected their retreat, after having made much slaughter of the invaders. Nor were the militia of the island without their due share of praise, for their exemplary bravery and steadiness. Upon the whole, it may be stated, with perfect propriety, in the words of General Myers, that in this affair, "had not the town of Roseau been accidentally destroyed by fire, we should have little to regret, and much in which to exult."

BOOK VI.

CHAP. X.

In pursuit of the predatory system of warfare the French seemed to have adopted in this expedition, their squadron, on the 5th of March, appeared in Basseterre roads, in the island of St. Kitt's, where he landed and levied a contribution of 18,000*l.* sterling, and burnt some merchantment, richly laden, lying there, and then quickly re embarked, without attempting Brimstone-hill, where the small British force under Major Foster were ready to receive him. The island of Nevis was also laid under some slight contribution by this marauding armament, and here ended its exploits in the West Indies. The arrival of Admiral Cochrane in those seas, who had been dispatched from England as soon as the sailing of the Rochefort squadron was known, with a force of six sail of the line, quickly determined its conduct, the French squadron precipitately sailing for France, where it arrived in safety, having been fortunate enough to escape the different English fleets then at sea, and some detachments cruising expressly for its interception.

Having thus accounted for the smaller division of the enemy's force, which had occasioned no small share of alarm, we must return to the much more formidable one under Admiral Villeneuve, which had evaded Lord Nelson, and had put to sea from Toulon with impunity. That great man, who, although at the time out of sight of the port whence the enemy had sailed, was not so remote as not to be speedily informed of the event, doubtless rejoiced in a circumstance which would terminate the tedious inactivity he had endured for more than a twelvemonth, and lost not a moment in shaping his course towards the most likely point to overtake or encounter with the adversary. At this period the opinion universally prevailed, that it was the object of the French ruler again to establish a footing in Egypt, and that the armament which had been so long equipping at Toulon, was destined for an attempt upon Alexandria. Thither, therefore, Lord Nelson determined to proceed—but his pursuit was in vain. He traversed the Mediterranean with the utmost celerity, having a force of ten sail of the line with him, but no enemy was to be heard of. In fact, Admiral Villeneuve, whose views were far otherwise than those attributed to him, having, a few days after his sailing from Toulon, encountered a violent storm, in which his fleet suffered considerably, he deemed it prudent to return to that port to refit, nor was it till the 30th of March that he again ventured to sea.

During this anxious period, Lord Nelson, with unwearying activity, cruized in every likely direction in the Mediterranean, agreeably to his own surmises of the course of the enemy, or as he was led by the various intelligence he collected from every quarter, and finally took his station in the Sicilian seas, where he eagerly waited the approach of the enemy.

The new board, if it may be so termed, pursued, without any deviation, those wholesome measures begun by the one preceding, and in consequence of the restored, and indeed increased, energy of the dock-yards, now replenished, and full of naval stores, were enabled to fit out forty-six sail of the line in a comparatively short period, although at a very considerable rate of enlarged expenditure, the necessary consequence of the unfortunate measures of a former economic administration, and which brought home conviction to the most incredulous, of the truth of the different charges which had been adduced against it, both within and without the walls of parliament. These ships, so supplied in this critical moment, enabled the government to reinforce the British squadrons in every part of the world, and thus rendered them equal to the achievement of the glorious victories which followed.

Other regulations of this new board were also attended with the best effects. Supplies of timber and stores began to pour into the exhausted arsenals of the royal dock-yards, and the usual order and methodical arrangement, in the different civil departments of the navy, which had been superseded by a tyrannical, arbitrary, and capricious contempt of all former usage and system, again took the lead. In no respect did the abilities of Lord Barham appear more conspicuous, than in the steady official regularity he introduced. A new board was also appointed to survey and report upon the state of the coasts, and to examine the sea-fencible establishment, a sort of defence which had been most ostentatiously boasted of by Lord Castlereagh, and others of the former administration, as a most efficient strength, but which, when explored by the accurate eye, and brought to the test of the great professional experience of the gallant admiral who was appointed to this duty, was found to be useless and expensive in the extreme; and so far from answering the vaunted ends for which it was raised, that it was proved, in his masterly and comprehensive reports upon the subject, to be highly detrimental to the navy and militia of the country, by screening the most active and able men from the impress and ballot; a new code, which went to the entire correction of these abuses, was suggested by this excellent officer, Admiral Berkeley, which met with the most unqualified approbation of the minister.

About this time, the project of converting the harbour of Falmouth into a royal arsenal, for refitting the ships of the channel fleet, was adopted, and endeavoured to be carried into execution, as being farther to the westward than Plymouth, and approximating more to the ports of the enemy. In the prosecution of this wild and visionary scheme, much expence was incurred, and many buildings were erected for different offices. But a very short trial verified the predictions of some of the most intelligent of the old officers of the navy, who had early asserted, that its diminutive size and the narrowness of its entrance, would preclude line-of-battle ships from getting readily to sea; and after nearly risking the loss of two three-deckers, and a seventy-four, this plan, perhaps originating in interested motives, was at length abandoned.

It was, however, to be regretted, during this period, in other respects honorable to the naval administration of the country, that a total want of intelligence of the enemy's designs, state of preparation, or movements, prevailed in an unaccountable degree.

Not only the frigates and single ships of the enemy, but even their entire fleets, escaped from their ports, which were supposed to be in a state of strict blockade, and it was only by the accounts of their depredations, or the news of their return to Europe, that even their having sailed came to be known!

An action took place, arising out of a circumstance of this kind, so honorable to the parties concerned, that it is worthy of particular mention. The Cleopatra, a small 32-gun British frigate, commanded by Sir Robert Laurie, after sustaining a very long but unequal contest with the Ville de Milan, one of the enemy's largest frigates, was compelled to surrender, but not until he had so completely disabled his huge opponent as to render both vessels, (now French,) an easy capture to the Leander, Captain Talbot, one of the most promising young officers in the service, who, by this means, and scarcely firing a gun, had the option of commanding one of the very finest and most desirable frigates in the French navy. But with that generosity of spirit, which ever characterises the British officer, Captain Talbot referred this material object to

Sir Robert Laurie, to whose spirit, bravery, and perseverance alone, he generously ascribed the double capture of the Ville de Milan, and her prize the Cleopatra, as if the Frenchman had not been so beaten, she certainly would not have proved so easy a prize.

Before we proceed to the account of the ever-memorable transactions of Lord Nelson, whom we left waiting the arrival of the Toulon squadron in the Sicilian seas, it may not be deemed uninteresting to state another proof of the genuine nobleness of character of the British seaman, which was perhaps never more fully conspicuous, than as exemplified in an attack upon some vessels in Muros Bay, on the coast of Spain, by the Loire frigate, Captain Maitland, who not only captured the ships, the object of the enterprise, but stormed and took the fort which protected them; at the same time, he manifested so much humanity towards the inhabitants, as to call forth the personal thanks of the bishop of the diocese:—conduct, which must have impressed the Spaniards with the most exalted ideas of British humanity and heroism!

The alarm existing in the public mind, respecting the proceedings of the Rochfort squadron in the West-Indies, had scarcely been calmed, before it was again, and in a much more serious manner, excited, by the certain information, received about this period, that Admiral Villeneuve had again put to sea. This officer, who returned to Toulon to refit, having been much shattered upon his first cruise, once more tried his fortune upon the ocean, and under more auspicious circumstances. He, on the 30th of March, sailed to Carthegena, with the intention of strengthening himself by the Spanish ships of the line equipping in that port, but not finding them in a state of sufficient readiness, he continued his way unmolested to Cadiz; whence, having been joined there by one French and six Spanish sail of the line, he directly proceeded to the West-Indies, with an accumulated force of eighteen sail of the line, carrying, beside their full complement of seamen, and in a perfect state of equipment, ten thousand veteran soldiers! On the approach of Villeneuve to Cadiz, Admiral Sir John Orde, who blockaded that port with five British sail, of the line, thought it prudent to retire, which he did without molestation or notice, on the part of the enemy, and succeeded in joining the English fleet off Brest under Lord Gardner.

It may easily be conceived, how great must have been the apprehension and uneasiness throughout the British empire, when the sailing of so considerable an armament became known; but the consternation was at its height, when it was certainly announced, that it had proceeded for the West-Indies, intelligence of which was received about the beginning of May, but none whatever of the movements of Lord Nelson.

During this anxious period, that great man, after having traversed the Mediterranean, with his squadron of ten sail of the line, and visited Alexandria, whither he had conceived Villeneuve to have proceeded in the first instance, and had taken in provisions and water at Palermo, again put to sea, and cruised in those latitudes, in eager expectation of the arrival of the enemy. It was not until the middle of April, that he received indubitable information of Villeneuve having quitted the Mediterranean. His lordship immediately proceeded for the Straits of Gibraltar, and anchored in the Bay of Tetuan, on the Barbary coast, early in May. From the various accounts which he received here, as well of their number as strength, he no longer doubted of the West-Indies being the place of the destination of the combined squadrons of the enemy. The dangerous situation in which their arrival there would place the British colonies, with all the train of evils which would attach to the mother-country upon their capture; rose at once upon his mind, and he instantly took the heroic determination of pursuing the enemy thither, with a force of little more than one half their strength! His lordship having hastily taken in, at Tetuan, such articles of the first necessity as the wants of his fleet immediately required, next proceeded to Lagos Bay, where he was fortunate enough to find some transports and store-ships belonging to Sir John Orde's squadron, when that officer had retired before the French fleet. From these vessels he received still farther supplies of stores and provisions, and being more and more confirmed in the course which the enemy had steered, on the 11th day of May he sailed in pursuit of them.

To appreciate, as it deserves, all the merit of this extraordinary man, (in this part of his glorious career of public duty, perhaps the most glorious) many circumstances should be taken into consideration. Let it be remembered, that, with ten sail of the line, foul, and after a cruize of more than two years, he undertook to pursue, across the Atlantic, or to whatever part of the globe they might have shaped their course, the enemies' combined squadrons of eighteen sail of the line, in a state of the most complete equipment, fresh from their ports, with their full complement of sailors on board, carrying 10,000 land-troops, commanded by some of the best officers of France and Spain, and under the positive commands of the French ruler to strike a grand and decisive blow against the British power and empire in the West Indies, and destroy her commerce upon the western ocean!

Considerations of the purest patriotism, acting upon the most heroic mind, and combined with the utmost professional science and judgment, determined this energetic character; who, therefore, despising the superior force of the enemy, and setting at nought the vast responsibility he incurred, by thus acting without orders, in a case of the utmost risk and emergency; superior to every personal consideration, he hazarded his great name and reputation upon the issue. That Providence, to whose watchful care he had so often piously and wisely ascribed the glory of his greatest and most splendid actions, did not now desert him, and Lord Nelson was once more to be hailed as its instrument in saving his country.

Before we proceed to the further particulars connected with the pursuit of the combined squadrons by Lord Nelson, it may be necessary to mention a movement, at this period, of the enemy's Brest fleet, evidently calculated to divide and distract the attention of the British government, keep its naval force divided, and spread a wider alarm in the minds of the English nation. Having been sometime in the bustle of preparation, about the middle of May the French fleet put to sea from Brest, apparently with a design to fight the English squadron blockading that port, commanded by Lord Gardner: the former consisting of twenty-five sail of the line, the latter but of seventeen. Notwithstanding this great disproportion of strength, the French fleet returned into harbour, satisfied with the bravado of having ventured once out of it in so many years, and left the English admiral to pursue his system of blockade, without any attempt at its further interruption.

The expedition of Lord Nelson had been such, that, on the 15th of May, he was twenty leagues to the eastward of Madeira, and on the 4th of June he came to anchor in Carlisle bay, off Barbadoes, after a fortunate passage, where he received intelligence that the combined fleet, under Admiral Villeneuve, had arrived at Martinique on the 14th of May, nearly three weeks before; but that, most providentially, this powerful armament had hitherto remained inactive, with the exception of its having attacked and carried the Diamond Rock, by a force detached for that purpose. The most sanguine hope or expectation of Lord Nelson could hardly have suggested this extraordinary inactivity to have resulted from such great preparation and such real strength; he, accordingly, having been joined by Admiral Cochrane, and two ships of the line, prepared to sail in quest of the enemy, to attack them wherever they might be found.

The joy and exultation which prevailed in the British islands, at this period, may easily be conceived. Abandoned of all hope, they had seen their successive and entire destruction, in the arrival of one of the most formidable fleets that had ever been witnessed in that quarter of the globe, without any force adequate to even the chance of effectual resistance. From this gloom of despair, they were roused by the appearance, on a day auspicious to the prospect of their deliverance from the surrounding peril of the British fleet, on the anniversary of the birth of his Britannic majesty; and that fleet commanded by Lord Nelson. From that moment not a doubt remained of relief: the inferiority of force, great as it was, was never once taken into consideration; for Nelson and victory were inseparable, even in idea; nothing was looked for but the discomfiture and disgrace of the arrogant invader.

To what the strange inactivity of the enemy's force was owing, was not clearly understood: by some it was attributed to the mortality among the troops, of whom it was asserted, not less than 3,000 perished in Martinico, from the disorders incident to those climates, while the remaining force was sickly in the highest degree. By others, it was as confidently stated, that the best understanding did not exist between the French and the Spanish commanders, as to the objects of the enterprise. Probably their inertness might have proceeded from both causes, for the first alleged fact was certain; and, without any apparent motive, it was ascertained, that the Spanish squadron under Admiral Gravina had, about this period, separated from that of the French, and was supposed to have sailed upon some secret expedition.

As the recovery of the island of Trinidad, the ancient possession of Spain, would, probably, be the object of Admiral Gravina, and concurring reports strengthening this conjecture, Lord Nelson having employed only twenty-four hours in taking in water for the whole fleet, and in embarking 2,000 troops under Sir William Myers; on the 5th of June steered to the southward, and arrived off Trinidad on the 7th. Here, however, he found, that the enemy had not made his appearance; and, much disappointed, he quitted the island on the following day, and reached Granada on the ninth, where he had the mortification to learn, that the enemy's squadrons, again acting in conjunction, and consisting of seventeen sail of the line, had, that very morning, sailed from Martinique, and had taken a course to the northward. Immediately conceiving that Antigua must now be the object of the enemy; to prevent that island from falling a prey to such a formidable force, he lost no time in proceeding thither; but here again disappointment awaited him, and he was clearly ascertained in a fact he scarcely could give credit to, that this superior fleet, terrified by the news of his arrival, and profiting of the delay which his ill information had occasioned, betook himself to a precipitate and shameful flight, and was actually on his return to Europe! A transaction, which, while it stamped the highest reputation upon the British name and arms, covered with indelible disgrace the naval character of the enemy.

When assured that Admirals Villeneuve and Gravina had declined the contest in those seas, the unceasing activity of Lord Nelson impelled him to, what even his modesty could not refuse the term of, a pursuit, and the novel scene presented itself to an admiring world, of seventeen sail of French and Spanish ships of the line flying before a force of eleven of the same class, bearing the British ensigns, the Spartiate ship of the line Lord Nelson having taken with him from the West Indies, as an addition to his original force. Lord Nelson, accordingly, having debarked the troops at Antigua, once more set sail, in the hope of overtaking the fugitives before they reached a friendly port in Europe. In taking this resolution, his lordship, however, was not so occupied by the hurry and bustle necessarily attendant upon its being carried into effect, as to neglect those means which his unerring judgment suggested, of apprizing the different British squadrons at sea, as well as the government at home, of the proceedings of both fleets, in order that every means should be taken to intercept the enemy on his return, should he not be fortunate enough to overtake him. Accordingly, his lordship dispatched the Curieux sloop of war to England, on the 13th of June, and on the 15th the Decade frigate to Lisbon, the latter with instructions to cause any light vessels he might find there or on his passage, to spread the intelligence of the return of the enemy in every direction, and then proceed herself upon the same service. The Marten sloop was sent off to Gibraltar for a similar purpose: measures of precaution equally wise and efficacious, and which, subsequently, were greatly instrumental to the glorious events which took place, as, by this timely information, the different British squadrons were reinforced, and collected in the most probable situations of meeting with the enemy on his return to Europe.

The safety of the West Indian colonies being now ascertained at home, the mind of the British public was at its greatest stretch of hope and expectation. It was not unreasonable to expect, that the combined squadrons, baffled and disgraced, might fall in either with Admirals Calder or Collingwood, who were cruising in different directions, with strong divisions of the British fleet on the watch, to prevent his return to port, either in France or Spain. Many imagined it possible that Lord Nelson might overtake his prey, and contemplated, with hope, alloyed by some slight reflection on the disproportion of strength, the tremendous conflict which must have ensued. Nor were there wanting some sanguine enough to see the possibility, if not the probability, of his lordship coming up with Villeneuve when he should be engaged with one of the British squadrons already adverted to, and thus place him between two fires, to his inevitable destruction.

These expectations, however, were but partially realized. Lord Nelson reached the straits on the 19th of June, without having seen the enemy, after having, in seventy-eight days from the time he quitted Tetuan bay to his return to Gibraltar, twice traversed, with his whole fleet, the Atlantic ocean; and visited all the Leeward West India islands, without calculating the time necessarily employed in taking in provisions and stores, and the embarking and re-embarking troops, together with the delay induced by collecting information of the enemy: a scene of activity unparalleled, and within a space of time inconceivably limited. Having ascertained that the enemy had not entered the Mediterranean, Lord Nelson found himself constrained, from the absolute want of water and provisions, to steer for the bay of Tetuan, where he anchored on the 22d. Having here procured some supplies, he made sail again, on the 26th, and re-passed the Straits, in hopes of encountering the fugitive fleet of the enemy, which, in fact, he had outstripped, off the Capes of St. Vincent, or, by taking a northward direction, fall in with him in a higher latitude.

It should seem, however, as if fate had decreed, that Nelson should have the immortal honor of saving his country, upon this occasion, merely by the terror of his name, and without his firing a gun; circumstances which, at the time, were doubtless of extreme mortification to this great man; but which, in point of fact, redound more to his fame, and place it higher than even his most splendid victories.

His lordship neared Cadiz on the 27th of July, but finding the enemy had not entered that port, he sailed for Cape St. Vincent, and subsequently traversed the Bay of Biscay without seeing or hearing any thing of him. With unabated perseverance and zeal, this indefatigable man next pursued his course, as a last hope, to the north-west coast of Ireland, where being still disappointed, and being worn out with an activity, which seemed only fated to meet with mortification, he resolved on returning to England; his last measure being, with his usual sagacity and foresight, to dispatch nine ships of the line to reinforce the channel fleet under Lord Gardner, lest the enemy, by making for Brest, should, with the co-operation of the French fleet in that port, place his lordship in a dangerous situation, by their great superiority of force.

On the 18th of August Lord Nelson, in the Victory, accompanied by the Superb, arrived at Portsmouth, and on the 20th reached London, where the reception he received, from the crown to the meanest citizen, was such as to console him for the fatigues and disappointments he had endured, and must have been the more gratifying to him, as he saw that his want of success in the main object of his late cruize, was attributed to its true cause; and that a reflecting and a grateful people saw in his conduct, upon that occasion, a public service as useful as any, though, perhaps, generally speaking, less splendid than some of his former brilliant achievements. Scenes of activity, however, yet awaited the hero, and the year was not to pass over without witnessing a further, though fatal, proof of his energy and prowess!

We must now return to Admiral Villeneuve, who had nearly accomplished the object of his precipitate flight from the West Indies, and had almost reached a friendly port in Europe, without the so-much dreaded encounter with a British force: but it was decreed that that event should not take place before he suffered yet additional disgrace and shame. His fleet, now increased to twenty sail of the line, French and Spanish, three large ships armed en flûte, five frigates, and three brigs, fell in with the English squadron under the command of Admiral Sir Robert Calder, consisting of fifteen sail of the line, two frigates, a cutter, and a lugger, and which was cruising off Cape Finisterre, in the hope of intercepting the enemy. This event took place on the 22d of July, three days after Lord Nelson had reached Gibraltar, on his return from the West Indies.

An action immediately took place, which was begun by the English admiral with skill, intrepidity, and judgment, and lasted four hours, the enemy fighting the whole time with the most determined resolution. At the end of that period, two of the enemy's ships of the line, the St. Raphael of 84 guns, and the El Firme of 74, having been captured, Sir Robert Calder deemed it necessary to bring to the squadron, to cover them; a measure rendered still more necessary by the state of the weather, which was so foggy as to prevent the English ships seeing the vessels a-head or a-stern of them; of course it was impossible to manœuvre with any effect, and all the advantage which could be derived from superiority of naval tactics, was no longer to be looked for. The wind and weather were, during the whole of the day, highly favorable to the enemy. The night was spent by both fleets in the necessary repairs, and the following morning the combined squadrons seemed disposed to renew the action, which it was completely in their power to have done, having the advantage of the wind; but they never approached nearer the British line than four leagues, the English admiral constantly keeping such a course as would best protect the captured ships, and the Windsor Castle, one of his own, which had been so much crippled in the action, as obliged it to be taken in tow by a line-of-battle ship. Repeatedly, in the course of the day, the enemy bore up in order of battle, and as often hauled their wind upon perceiving no disposition in the English admiral to avoid him. At night the fleets were about six leagues asunder, and when day broke on the 24th, the enemy were seen steering away about south-east, under easy sail, and kept this course till six in the evening, when they could no longer be distinguished.

Thus terminated an affair in which British valour and skill were eminently conspicuous, and which, considered abstractedly, may certainly be deemed as matter of pride and triumph to the country. That fifteen sail of the line should not only withstand twenty of those of the enemy, and three large 50-gun ships, but also capture two of their largest vessels, was an event certainly well calculated to maintain the character of superiority which the navy of England so justly challenges. At the same time, it must be confessed that all was not done, upon this occasion, that the public thought it had a right to expect. It had happened, unfortunately, that the admiral's dispatches, as well as the verbal report of the officer who brought them home, gave the strongest foundation for the belief that the action would be renewed upon the following day; the result of which, to an enemy already beaten, must be deemed almost total destruction. The disappointment therefore was extreme, when intelligence arrived which put an end to all hopes of the kind, and led to the belief that the shattered squadrons of the enemy had gained, without further molestation, a Spanish port. The murmurs of disapprobation at the conduct of the British admiral became indeed so frequent, and so little restrained, that Sir Robert Calder returned to England for the purpose of demanding an investigation of his proceedings; to which government having acceded, he was tried by a court-martial in Portsmouth harbour, on the 22d of December; when, upon a full examination of the circumstances which took place posterior to the action of the 22d of July, the court decided that the admiral had not done his utmost to take or destroy every ship of the enemy which it was his duty to engage; but, at the same time, ascribed such conduct to error in judgment, acquitting him absolutely of any imputation of fear or cowardice, and therefore only sentencing him to be severely reprimanded.

The desultory attempts which took place during the summer, to impede the assemblage of the enemy's flotilla at Boulogne, or to destroy them in that harbour, although frequent, were attended with too little success to merit particular mention, were they not, on every occasion, conducted with the utmost skill and gallantry by the naval officers entrusted with the service. The shallowness of the water, and the strong defences of the harbour, prevented any thing serious from being achieved; little good resulted from the attempt, save that the British sailors were kept in constant action, and accustomed to contemn a force with which they were hourly becoming more familiar.

It became now certainly known, that the combined squadrons, after the encounter off Cape Finisterre, having reached the port of Ferrol in safety, had there received a very considerable augmentation of strength, and were seen on the 13th of August at sea, to the number of twenty-seven sail of the line, and eight vessels of war of a lower order; which event was speedily followed up by news arriving of its having entered Cadiz on the 21st of the same month, the small force under Admiral Collingwood in that station not offering it any opposition, which it would have been equally rash and ineffectual to have attempted; and, indeed, it seems to have been the result of the utmost prudence and judgment, which enabled that officer to maintain his footing there until reinforced from England.

It is little to be doubted, but that the French emperor severely felt the mortification arising out of the complete failure of the vast armament he had sent out to the West Indies, its shameful flight home before the small squadron of Lord Nelson, and the event of the action with Sir Robert Calder, each and all of them disgraceful in themselves, and totally subversive of his boasted project of striking a fatal blow to the colonies and commerce of Great Britain. Great resources, however, yet remained to him: the accession of ships of the line which Admiral Villeneuve had received at Ferrol, together with those which he found at Cadiz, amounted in the whole to a very formidable force, and with which much might still be done. It was also essential to the views of Bonaparte, as war was now inevitable on the continent, to have as large an armament on foot as possible, in order to divert the attention of the English to whatever quarter it might be directed, and to act in the Mediterranean as circumstances might require. Fortunately this design could not immediately be put in execution; the disabled state of the ships engaged with Sir Robert Calder was such as to require some time for their re-equipment in port, nor could they be got ready for sea till the British fleet in that quarter became again respectable.

As the designs of the enemy were become sufficiently manifest, and they were also known to be in a state of the most active refitment at Cadiz, scarcely had Lord Nelson arrived in London, when he was, in the month of August, offered the command of an armament, to be prepared immediately, of sufficient force to cope with that of France, in any quarter of the world to which it should be destined to act. His lordship, without a moment's hesitation, embraced the opportunity of again bearing his country's flag triumphant over all opposition. To this situation the public suffrage universally called him, and, on him all eyes were turned with hope, in a moment when every other circumstance around appeared gloomy and unpromising. The successes of the French upon the continent were no longer equivocal, and serious apprehensions were entertained of the fate of the allied powers. It was in this crisis that Lord Nelson once more hoisted his flag on-board the Victory, which had been completely refitted on the 14th of September at Portsmouth, and put to sea on the following day. There were then at that port five ships of the line and a frigate, which were under orders to sail with him; but not finding them in sufficient readiness, so anxious was he to repair to that spot, the scene of his future glory, where his duty called him, that he sailed with the Euryalus frigate only in company. Off Plymouth he was joined by two ships of the line, the Ajax and Thunderer, and thence proceeded directly for the coast of Spain.

On the arrival of Lord Nelson off Cadiz, he received the command of the British fleet from Admiral Collingwood, which, having had reinforcements poured into it from every quarter, had become equal to the task of coping with the enemy, and of punishing his temerity, should he venture out of port. As far as it could be ascertained, the combined fleet was nearly ready for sea, and its probable destination was the Mediterranean, where, if it collected to itself the ships of war yet remaining in the different French and Spanish ports in that sea, it would have formed together an accretion of force, which might eventually have overpowered all opposition in that quarter, for a time at least, to the great detriment of the British interests. Ever averse, however, from the system of blockade, as leading ultimately to the ruin of the navy, Lord Nelson determined to give the enemy an opportunity of putting to sea, and even employed stratagem to induce him to take that step; one which his confidence in his officers, his sailors, and himself, led him to hope would end in the total destruction of the adversary. At this period, a frigate was constantly stationed off the harbour of Cadiz, for the purpose of communicating any movement of the enemy to a detachment of ships of the line who were stationed barely within sight of the port, and whose object it was to prevent single ships, or small divisions of the combined fleet, from pushing out to sea. Between this detachment and the main body of the fleet, was stationed a line of frigates, sufficiently close to it and to each other to communicate by signal; and thus Lord Nelson, who cruized off Cape St. Mary's with the rest of the fleet, became instantly acquainted with the least stir made by the enemy, while, by this judicious and masterly distribution of his force, the numbers and manœuvres of the British fleet were totally concealed from the adversary.

At length, about the middle of October, Lord Nelson having received certain information that he would be joined in a day or two by a reinforcement of seven sail of the line, from England, hesitated not, as a means to induce the combined fleet to put to sea, to detach Admiral Louis and six ships of the line, being a fourth of his then force, upon a particular service, and that in so open a manner, and so undisguisedly, that it became immediately known to the enemy, and decided his conduct.

Admiral Villeneuve, deceived by this bold manœuvre, and believing that the English fleet was now reduced to twenty-one sail of the line, whilst that of France and Spain, thoroughly equipped and refitted, consisted of thirty-three, resolved to take advantage of this great superiority of strength, and make one vast effort to humble the naval force of Great Britain. There were also, it is said, personal motives, which led the French admiral to this resolution. Since his return from the West Indies, the French official paper, the Moniteur, had severely glanced at his conduct in that transaction! Bonaparte had also spoken sarcastically of him. He was upbraided by the Spaniards for his not having supported them better in the action off Cape Finisterre, where the brunt of the fight was borne by them; and, finally, it was generally understood that his command was about to be taken from him, and conferred on Admiral Rosily, then actually on his road from Paris for that purpose. Stung and mortified by all these circumstances united, he determined, contrary, it is said, to the wish of the Spaniards, to give battle to Lord Nelson. A victory over the greatest naval character of the age would redeem his character, and cover him with glory, while a defeat could add but little additional disgrace to his present state of humiliation.

Accordingly, on the 19th day of October, the French and Spanish combined fleet, to the number of thirty-three sail of the line, eighteen of which were French and fifteen Spanish, sailed from Cadiz, with light winds, westerly; which being communicated to Lord Nelson, his lordship with the British fleet, having received the expected reinforcement, and therefore consisted of twenty-seven ships of the line, three of which were of sixty-four guns, conceiving the Mediterranean to be the course of the enemy, immediately made all sail for the Straits, where he was informed, by the frigate stationed there, that the enemy had not yet passed them.

On Monday, at day-break, the 21st of October, 1805, a day which will be for ever memorable in the British annals, the combined fleet was descried about six or seven miles to the eastward, Cape Trafalgar bearing E. by S. about seven leagues, there being very little wind, and that westerly. The commander-in-chief immediately made the signal for the fleet to bear up in two columns, as they formed in the order of sailing, to avoid the inconvenience and delay in forming a line of battle in the usual manner, a mode of attack his lordship had previously communicated to his officers, as alone calculated "to make the business decisive."

Lord Nelson, in the Victory, led the weather column, and the Royal Sovereign, Admiral Collingwood, the lea.

It had originally been the intention of Admiral Villeneuve, in the belief that the English fleet consisted only of twenty-one sail of the line, to have attacked them in the usual line of battle, with an equal number of vessels, whilst twelve of his select ships, forming a body of reserve to windward, were to bear down and double on the British line after the action had commenced, and thus place a great portion of it between two fires:—every other precaution had been taken by him to ensure success: nearly 5,000 land-troops were distributed throughout his fleet; and his ships were furnished with every species of combustibles and fire-balls, in order to set the adversary on fire, or facilitate their boarding when opportunity should offer. On perceiving, however, the real strength of the English, the French admiral abandoned his first plan, and formed his ships into one line, with great closeness and correctness: but as the mode of attack was unusual, so the structure of his line was new, forming a crescent, convexing to leeward.—Admiral Villeneuve was in the Bucentaure, of eighty guns, in the centre; and the Prince of Asturias, of 112 guns, bore the flag of the Spanish Admiral Gravina, in the rear; but the French and Spanish ships were intermingled without any regard to order of national squadron. The combined fleet, thus situated, waited the attack with equal firmness and intrepidity.

Previously to the commencement of the battle, Lord Nelson went over the different decks of the Victory, saw and spoke to the different classes of seamen, encouraged them with his usual affability, and was much pleased at the manner in which the seamen had barricaded the hawse-holes of the ship. All was perfect death-like silence, till just before the action began. Three cheers were given his lordship as he ascended the quarter-deck ladder, when he thus emphatically addressed the seamen—"England expects every man will do his duty." He had been particular in recommending cool, steady firing, in preference to a hurrying fire, without aim or precision, and the event justified his lordship's advice, as the masts of his opponents came tumbling down on their decks, and over their sides.

Lord Nelson was advised not to appear so conspicuously, in full uniform, to the mark of the topmen of the enemy. His lordship, however, said, "Whatever may be the consequence, the insignia of the honors I now wear I gained by the exertions of British seamen, under my command, in various parts of the world; and in the hour of danger, I am proud to show them and the enemies of old England, I will never part with them; if it please God I am to fall, I will expire with these trophies entwined round my heart."

About noon the dreadful contest began, by the leading ships of the columns breaking through the enemy's line; which was first effected by Admiral Collingwood, in the Royal Sovereign, in so gallant a manner as to excite the admiration of both fleets, about the twelfth ship from the rear of the enemy, leaving his van unoccupied; the succeeding ships breaking through in all parts astern of their leaders, and engaging the enemy at the muzzles of their guns. At twenty minutes past twelve the action became general.—It had been the intention of Lord Nelson to have penetrated the adversary's line, between the tenth and eleventh of his ships in the van; but finding it so close, that there was not room to pass, he ordered the Victory, which bore his flag, to be run on board the ship opposed to him, and the Téméraire, his second, also ran on board of the next ship in the enemy's line, so that these four ships formed one mass, and were so close, that every gun fired from the Victory set the Redoubtable, to which she was opposed, on fire; whilst the British sailors were employed, at intervals, in the midst of the hottest action, in pouring buckets of water on the flames in the enemy's vessels, lest their spreading should involve both ships in destruction! An instance of cool and deliberate bravery not to be paralleled in ancient or modern history.

The action was equally severe around the Royal Sovereign, and in several other quarters; the enemy's ships being fought with the greatest gallantry; but the attack upon them was irresistible, and a great and glorious victory was its reward. About three in the afternoon, Admiral Gravina, with ten sail of the line, joining the enemy's frigates to leeward, bore away to Cadiz; five more of their headmost ships in the van, under Admiral Dumanoir, about ten minutes after, tacked and stood to the southward, to windward of the British line; they were engaged, and the sternmost taken; the four others got off, leaving a noble prey to the British fleet of NINETEEN SHIPS OF THE LINE, of which two were first-rates, and none under seventy-four guns, with three flag-officers, namely, Admiral Villeneuve, the commander-in-chief, and the Spanish Admirals d'Aliva and Cisneros. General Contamin, who commanded the land-forces, was also taken on board the Bucentaure.

About a quarter before two a fatal bullet struck

Lord Nelson above the star on the left side. By the first accounts his lordship's fall was understood to have been occasioned by a shot from the main-round-top of the Santissima Trinidad. The shot was afterwards said to have proceeded from the Bucentaure; but it was afterwards believed, that it was fired from the mizen-top of the French ship Redoubtable.

A few minutes before Lord Nelson was wounded, Mr. Bourke, the purser of the Victory, was near him; he looked steadfastly at him, and said, "Bourke, I expect every man to be upon his station." Mr. Bourke took the hint, and went to his proper situation in the cockpit. At this time his lordship's secretary, Mr. Scott, who was communicating some orders to an officer at a distant part of the quarter-deck, was cut almost in two by a cannon-shot: he expired on the instant, and was thrown over-board. Lord Nelson observed the act of throwing his secretary over-board, and said, as if doubtful, to a midshipman who was near him, "was that Scott?" The midshipman replied, he believed it was. He exclaimed, "poor fellow!"

He was now walking the quarter-deck, and about three yards from the stern, the space he generally walked before he turned back. His lordship was in the act of turning on the quarter-deck, with his face towards the enemy, when he was mortally wounded by a musket-ball. He instantly fell; but was not, as at first reported, picked up by Captain Hardy. In the hurry of the battle, which was then raging in its greatest violence, even the fall of their beloved commander did not interrupt the business of the quarter-deck. Two sailors, however, who were near his lordship, raised him in their arms, and carried him to the cock-pit. He was immediately laid upon a bed, and the following was the substance of the conversation between his lordship, Captain Hardy, Mr. Bourke, and Mr. Beatty, the surgeon:—Upon seeing him brought down, Mr. Bourke immediately ran to him; "I fear," he said, "your lordship is wounded."—"Mortally, mortally."—"I hope not, my dear lord; let Mr. Beatty examine your wounds."—"It is of no use," exclaimed the dying Nelson; "he had better attend to others."

Mr. Beatty now approached to examine the wound. His lordship was raised up; and Beatty, whose attention was anxiously fixed upon the eyes of his patient, as an indication the most certain when a wound is mortal, after a few moments glanced his eye on Bourke, and expressed his opinion in his countenance. Lord Nelson now turned to Bourke, and said, "tell Hardy to come to me." Bourke left the cock-pit. Beatty now said, "suffer me, my lord, to probe the wound with my finger; I will give you no pain." Lord Nelson permitted him, and, passing his left hand round his waist, he probed it with the fore-finger of his right.

When Bourke returned into the cock-pit with Captain Hardy, Lord Nelson told the latter to come near him. "Kiss me, Hardy," he exclaimed. Captain Hardy kissed his cheek. "I hope your lordship," he said, "will still live to enjoy your triumph."—"Never, Hardy," he exclaimed, "I am dying—I am a dead man all over—Beatty will tell you so—bring the fleet to anchor—you have all done your duty—God bless you." Captain Hardy now said, "I suppose Collingwood, my dear lord, is to command the fleet?"—"Never," exclaimed he, "whilst I live;" meaning, doubtless, that, so long as his gallant spirit survived, he would never desert his duty.

What passed after this was merely casual: his lordship's last words were to Mr. Beatty, whilst he was expiring in his arms, "I could have wished to have lived to enjoy this; but God's will be done."—"My lord," exclaimed Hardy, "you die in the midst of triumph."—"Do I, Hardy?"—He smiled faintly—"God be praised!" These were his last words before he expired.

The ball struck the fore part of his lordship's epaulette, and entered the left shoulder immediately before the processus acromium scapulae, which it slightly fractured; it then descended obliquely into the thorax, fracturing the second and third ribs; and after penetrating the left lobe of the lungs, and dividing in its passage a large branch of the pulmonary artery, it entered the left side of the spine between the sixth and seventh dorsal vertebra, fractured the left transverse process of the sixth vertebra, wounded the medulla spinalis, and fracturing the right transverse process of the seventh vertebra, it made its way from the right side of the spine, directing its course through the muscles of the back, and lodged therein, about two inches below the inferior angle of the right scapula.

The enemy had evinced uncommon resolution and firmness throughout the action: indeed, the shattered condition of the captured ships, and their dreadful loss in killed and wounded, sufficiently manifest this fact. The obstinate resistance of the Spanish vessels, the Argonauta and Bahama, as well as that of the San Juan Nepomuceno, raised the character of that nation very high: they were not surrendered till the last extremity, the former two having lost 400 men each, in killed and wounded, the latter 350 nearly!

Such a victory could not be gained without a serious loss in men and officers, yet not, upon the whole, so great as might have been expected in so severe an action. Captains Cook, of the Bellevue, and Duff, of the Mars, were among the killed.

It is remarkable that the city of Ulm was entered by the French in triumph on the 20th of October, the day on which the English fleet was seeking that of France and Spain, and but the one before the battle of Trafalgar. In the dismay and consternation produced by the misfortunes of Austria, in the mind of the British public, it may easily be conceived how timely the intelligence of the glorious victory obtained over the enemy by Lord Nelson's fleet must have been, and its value can only be appreciated by its being put in opposition with the former calamitous event. It at once made the scale of war even, and put England on a level in point of successes with her boastful antagonist, brilliant as his conquests had been.

The action of Trafalgar had scarcely terminated before a tremendous gale of wind arose, which not only placed the captured ships but also the captors in a most dangerous situation. Both had suffered severely, and were in no condition to combat the extremity of weather, to which they were now to be exposed. In fact, the wind increased to such a degree, that the whole fleet were most perilously circumstanced: many dismasted, all shattered, and in thirteen fathoms water, off the shoals of Cape Trafalgar. In this dangerous state, the skill and experience of Admiral Collingwood, now commanding, and whose conduct during the action was supereminently conspicuous, were put to the utmost test, but to which, under very difficult circumstances, he was found fully equal. On the 22d the weather was still unfavorable, but not such as prevented the possibility of securing the prizes, which were towed off to the westward, and rendezvoused round the Royal Sovereign, herself in tow by the Neptune: but on the following day the gale increased, and the sea run so high, that many of the captured ships broke from the tow-ropes and drifted in shore. Towards the afternoon the remnant of the combined fleet, ten sail of the line, who had not been much engaged, pushed out from Cadiz, in the hope of attacking with advantage the damaged and scattered English ships. In this attempt, however, he was completely frustrated by the determined countenance of Admiral Collingwood, who, collecting a force of the least injured of his fleet, not only protected his own disabled vessels, but was enabled to take possession of one of the enemy's, the El Rayo. Admiral Gravina's own ship, the Prince of Asturias, being dismasted by the violence of the gale, he returned to port ineffectually.

On the 24th and 25th the gale still continued at so tremendous a rate, that Admiral Collingwood, despairing of being able to carry them into a British port, issued his orders that the captured French and Spanish ships should be destroyed. This difficult and dangerous service was executed with the same zeal and perseverance as had been shewn in the day of battle, although it must have been a severe mortification to the gallant captors, to see thus wrested from them the trophies of their victory. Accordingly, five of the enemy's ships were sunk and burnt by the victors, amongst which was the Santissima Trinidad, of 140 guns, the largest and finest ship of war ever built: nine were entirely wrecked, on different parts of the adjacent coast, by the violence of the gale, many with their whole crews on board. L'Achille, a French seventy-four, blew up during the action; and four (three Spanish and one French seventy-four-gun ships) were, by the almost incredible efforts of activity and skill of the British officers and seamen, carried safe into Gibraltar. The Santa Anna, and nine more of the enemy's vessels, got into Cadiz, some of which had struck, but were abandoned from the violence of the weather, but in the most wretched state, three only being considered serviceable, the other seven mere wrecks!

It will be recollected that Admiral Dumanoir, with four sail of the line, escaped towards the southward, towards the close of the action; their respite from sharing the fate of their companions was, however, but of short duration. On the night of the 2d of November, cruising off Ferrol with four ships of the line and three frigates, Rear-admiral Sir Richard Strachan fell in with what he thought the Rochefort squadron, but which in fact were the fugitives, to whom he immediately gave chase, and which he pursued that night, and the whole of the next day. At day-light, on the morning of the 4th, the Santa Margarita and Phoenix frigates, who had outsailed the ships of the line, most gallantly begun the action, by firing upon the enemy's rear, and considerably retarded their flight. A little before noon, the English line-of-battle ships being well up, and the French admiral finding an action unavoidable, it soon after became close and general, and continued nearly three hours and a half, the enemy fighting with the greatest resolution and obstinacy, when their four ships struck, but not until they were quite unmanageable. They proved to be the formidable, of eighty guns, Admiral Dumanoir, and the Duguai Trouin, Mont Blanc, and Scipion, of seventy-four guns each, on board of all of which the slaughter had been very great, their admiral wounded, and one of their captains killed: the loss on board the English ships was comparatively trifling.

Although the result of this last action was such as might be expected from the force under the English admiral, and his well-known skill and gallantry; he having, besides an exact parity of strength in line-of-battle ships with the enemy, four frigates in company, still it was a very grateful, as well as an advantageous capture, to the British public; for those four fine ships of the line were carried safe into port, and, with the other four, carried into Gibraltar, after the action off Trafalgar, to which may be added the two taken by Sir Robert Calder; which, in the aggregate, made an important addition of ten sail of line-of-battle ships, none under seventy-four guns, to the navy of Great Britain; besides the falling of those vessels (which had fled, having sustained but slight injury in the battle of Trafalgar) into the hands of the English, accounted, most satisfactorily, for the whole of that vast armament, of which three alone remained to the enemy, that could be considered serviceable, and the destruction of which was achieved without the loss of a single ship on the part of the British navy, a success unparalleled, and which must always be ascribed to the special intervention of Providence.

The remains of Lord Nelson were publicly interred in the cathedral church of St. Paul. The covering of his lordship's exterior coffin, which was considered as the most elegant and superb ever seen in Europe, was of fine black velvet, with treble rows of double gilt nails, the whole finely enriched with gold matt, enclosed and chased. The head-piece represented a monument supported by eagles, the emblem of victory, with the portrait of the deceased hero, in bass relief, surmounted by an urn, containing his ashes, over which reclined the figure of Grief. At the base were seen the British lion, with one of his paws laid on the Gallic cock, sphinxes, and other trophies, intended to commemorate the glorious victory which the gallant admiral obtained on the shores of Egypt, and to indicate that he might fairly claim the sovereignty of the ocean. Next was a viscount's coronet, the reward of his lordship's services to his king and country. The breast-plate of gold, thirteen inches by nine, with the following inscription:—

The Most Noble Lord HORATIO NELSON, Viscount and Baron NELSON of the Nile, and of

Burnham Thorpe, in the county of Norfolk.
Baron NELSON of the Nile, and of Hilborough, in the said County.

Knight of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath;

Vice-Admiral of the White Squadron of the Fleet;
and

Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's Ships and Vessels in the Mediterranean.

Also,

Duke of BRONTE, in Sicily;

Knight Grand Cross of the Sicilian Order of St.
Ferdinand, and of Merit;

Member of the Ottoman Order of the Crescent;
and

Knight Grand Commander of the Order of St.
Joachim. Born September 29, 1758.

After a series of transcendent and heroic services, this gallant Admiral fell gloriously, in the moment of a brilliant and decisive Victory over the combined Fleets of France and Spain, off Cape Trafalgar, on the 21st of October, 1805.

Lower down was the first crest which his majesty granted him after the battle of Cape St. Vincent, where Lord Nelson boarded and took the San Josef, the motto "Faith and Works." The last ornament on the lid was an Egyptian weeping figure (a cast from the antique) wrapped up in drapery, with the face hidden, emblematical of grief. On the left side of the coffin, next to the head, was the British lion with the union flag, the supporter of England, as also that of Lord Nelson's arms. Lower down, about the shoulder, on the same side, was a display of the insignia of the most honorable military Order of the Bath, with the motto "Tria juncta in uno." Directly in the centre, on the same side, was a beautiful composition of Britannia and Neptune riding triumphant on the ocean, drawn by sea-horses, and led by Fame; while Neptune was pointing to a shield, which bore this motto, "Viro immortal." Next was the Order of St. Ferdinand, which Lord Nelson received of the King of Naples, with the motto, "Fide a merito." The last ornament, towards the feet, on this side, was a crocodile, allusive to the battle of the Nile.

The first device, on the right side of the coffin, at the head, was the sphynx, the emblem of Egypt. Corresponding with the Order of the Bath, on the opposite side, was the Order of the Great Crescent, which was transmitted to the noble admiral by the Grand Seignior, after the glorious battle of the Nile. In the centre, on the right hand, were again Britannia and Neptune riding triumphant on the ocean, drawn by sea-horses, &c., as on the opposite side. Lower down, corresponding with the Order of St. Ferdinand, on the opposite side, was the Order of St. Joachim, transmitted to Lord Nelson by the Emperor Paul, as Grand Master of the Knights of Malta, with the motto, "Junxit Amicos Amor." The last ornament on the right-hand side, towards the foot, was a dolphin, the noblest fish of the sea, and formerly claimed by the heir of France. The device, at the head end of the coffin, was composed of naval and military trophies, with Lord Nelson's arms on a shield. That at the foot end was also a composition of naval and military trophies.

CHAPTER I.

State of Europe at this Period.—Animosity of Bonaparte against England.—Death and Biography of Mr. Pitt.—New Administration.

AT the commencement of the year 1806, the situation of Europe was unexampled in history. Two rival nations had acquired, not merely a decided preponderance, but an absolute and uncontrolled dominion, the one over the seas, the other over the land. If the battle of Austerlitz had confirmed the military superiority of France over other nations, and left her without a rival on the continent, the victory of Trafalgar had no less decisively established the naval superiority of England, and crowned all her former victories on the ocean. The accumulated fruits of four years persevering labour and painful industry, on the part of France and her dependencies, to form and collect a navy fit to cope with the maritime forces of England, had been swept away and annihilated in a single action. The importance of such a victory, at such a crisis, to England, cannot be easily exaggerated, or over-rated. For, it was not merely that the high-formed expectations of France from her newly-repaired marine, in which she had so weakly indulged and prematurely exulted, at the beginning of the campaign, were thus abruptly and thoroughly frustrated; or that her projects of invading the British islands, under the protection of a powerful fleet, were again defeated: nor was it even that the most splendid victory had, on this occasion, been won by England, that was ever gained at sea; or, that the greatest number of vessels, of first-rate magnitude, had, in this action, been taken and destroyed, that ever rewarded a conqueror in any naval combat. But, the great and incalculable advantage to England, was the universal conviction arising from this victory, that, in the skill, bravery, and discipline of her naval forces, she was so incomparably superior to her enemies, that all their future efforts to contend with her for the empire of the seas, must be as unavailing as their past endeavours had been fruitless. It was clear, that if the contest for pre-eminence between the rival nations were to be decided solely on the ocean, England had nothing to fear from the conflict. It was manifest, that if England could not be invaded without her enemies obtaining a temporary superiority, at least, at sea, the period of her invasion was still distant. If the trident of Neptune be really the sceptre of the world, England was now its undoubted mistress. The maritime trade of all nations was at her mercy, and subject, in many respects, to her controul.

That Bonaparte, after the renewal of hostilities, was animated by the most implacable hatred against England, and that he thenceforward considered her government as the eternal enemy of his peace and repose, cannot well be doubted; but why he chose to begin the war with such ostentatious threats of invasion, such insolent denunciations of vengeance, is a point not easy to decide. It might have been merely to give vent to his own spleen, or to spirit up his people to a new war, that he used such impolitic, such unbecoming language towards his enemy. He might have acted from a deeper, though mistaken calculation, and supposed, that if he could terrify the English nation with the sound of his preparations, their government would yield to his terms; and, indeed, the publicity which he affected to give, at this time, to all his plans and operations, seemed to countenance such a conjecture. He might, possibly, have under-rated the difficulties of invasion, and seriously intended, at first, to carry his menaces into effect. But, if his object in these measures was to obtain peace by intimidation, never was his sagacity more in fault. The English were exasperated, not intimidated by his threats, and the little confidence which they reposed, at that time, in the vigour of their own government, served only to call forth, in brighter colours, their zeal and ardour in defence of their country.

At this critical period there was no efficient government in England. It has been mentioned, in the last chapter of the preceding book, that

Mr. Pitt was in a declining state of health. He had left Bath, January 10, and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of London, he took up his residence at his own house on Putney-heath; he sunk rapidly under the violence of a fever, and early on the 23d he died, in the 47th year of his age.

Mr. Pitt was the second son of the truly illustrious statesman and celebrated minister William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, by Lady Hester Grenville. He was born at Hayes, in Kent, May 28, 1759; the year in which his father's triumphant and successful administration was at its zenith. From six years old he was wholly under the tuition of Mr. Wilson, and was entered at Pembroke college, Cambridge, when not quite fourteen, at which early period he was well acquainted with mathematics and the branches of natural philosophy, besides being a superior classic. When at the university, Mr. Pitt of course came under the then tutors of his college, Dr. Turner, (Dean of Norwich,) and Dr. Prettyman, (Bishop of Lincoln.)

From the earliest expansion of his hopeful talents, he stood forth as ordained by destiny as well as birth-right, to fill the station and emulate the talents of Chatham. If he was not born an orator, he was earlier trained to oratory than any statesman of the age. In watching over the bright progress of his studies, and anticipating his future fame, his father was not deceived by parental partiality. Even when a boy, his talents for declamation were so prompt and ambitious, that when Lord Chatham one day heard of his tutor's intention to take him along with his elder brother to hear the debates in the house of lords, he forbade him, saying to the tutor, "You may take the eldest, but I will not allow William to go; for I am sure that he would rise up and speak if he heard any thing that did not agree with his opinion."

After the usual course of study in the University of Cambridge, he was entered a student of Lincoln's-inn, and made so rapid a progress in his legal studies, as to be soon called to the bar with every prospect of success. It is said, that he once or twice went upon the western circuit, and appeared as junior counsel in several causes. He was, however, destined to fill a more important station in the government of his country, than is usually obtained through the channel of the law. At the general election, 1780, he was nominated by some of the most respectable persons in Cambridge, as a candidate to represent that university; but, notwithstanding the high character he had obtained there, he found very few to second his pretensions. In the following year, however, he was returned for the borough of Appleby, by the interest of Sir J. Lowther. On taking his seat in the house of commons, he enlisted himself on the side of the party which had constantly opposed the minister, Lord North, and the American war, and which regarded him with a degree of veneration; recognizing in his person the genius of his illustrious father revived, and acting, as it were, in him. His first speech was in favor of Mr. Burke's bill; and one of the first acts in which he took the lead in that house was extremely well calculated to increase his popularity. This was his motion for a committee, to consult upon the most effectual means to accomplish a more equal representation of the people in parliament. His propositions were, indeed, rejected; but he continued to repeat and renew them from time to time; and thus kept up the public attention to this great object, which was consequently more generally canvassed than it ever had been before.

On the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, the old whig party fell into a state of disunion, nearly bordering upon dissolution. Lord Shelburne became the first lord of the treasury, assisted by Mr. Pitt, who astonished the country, and indeed all Europe, by the phenomenon of a chancellor of the exchequer at the age of twenty-three. He began his career with a prematurity of talent which has no example, and, in a time of difficulty which required the most determined resolution, the utmost vigour of exertion, and a mind of the most potent grasp and unbounded comprehension; he not only possessed them all, but applied them, with incomparable energy and effect, to the advantage of his country.

His popularity, at this period, effectually screened him from every charge which his youth and inexperience might justly have warranted, and which were strongly urged against him by the adverse party. The situation of the country was extremely critical. The American war had become generally odious; and all hearts panted for a cessation of hostilities. This object was, therefore, the first consideration with the new ministry.

The combined powers had recently experienced great humiliations, and consequently the opportunity was not to be lost. A general peace accordingly took place; but the terms of it were reprobated by a considerable part of the nation. On this occasion Mr. Pitt delivered a most masterly defence of himself and his colleagues, which produced a corresponding, though not successful effect. The administration, of which he was one of the most distinguished members, was, therefore, short-lived. On its dissolution, the young statesman withdrew into retirement, and afterwards went abroad for some time, visiting Italy and several of the German courts.

On the coalition-ministry coming into place, Mr. Mansfield's seat for the university became vacant, by accepting the office of solicitor-general, and Mr. Pitt determined to oppose him: with this view he went down to Cambridge; but he was not supported by the heads and senior members; one almost threw the door in his face, and wondered at the impudence of the young man, thus to come down and disturb the peace of the university; though the assurance of support from several independent masters of arts kept alive the scanty hopes of future success. A few months, however, changed the scene; the coalition-ministry was thrown out; he repaired, in triumph, to the university, was received with open arms, carried his election by means of a considerable majority, and was able also, by his influence, to make Lord Euston his colleague.

An occasion suddenly offered for bringing Mr. Pitt forward once more on the great theatre of politics, as a candidate for fame and power. The British dominions in India had long been in an alarming situation, and it was generally admitted that an immediate remedy was indispensably necessary to preserve them. With this view, Mr. Fox, then secretary of state, formed, digested, and brought forward his famous India bill, which he carried through its several stages with a high hand.

The coalition-ministry, composed of such an heterogeneous mixture, notwithstanding their majority in the house of commons, were generally obnoxious to the nation; and this measure was particularly offensive to the great body whom it immediately affected. Lord North and his new allies were accordingly dismissed; and Mr. Pitt, the new premier, was assisted by the advice of Lord Thurlow, as keeper of the great seal, arrangements which, at that time, were however only considered as temporary.

He now astonished the commercial and political world, by his own India Bill! He had the mortification to find the majority of the house of commons against him; and he was placed in the peculiar situation of a minister acting with a minority, and that too in opposition to the strongest confux of talents ever combined against any administration. He, however, remained firm in his seat amidst a general confusion; and though the house had petitioned his majesty to dismiss him and his coadjutors, the young premier ventured to inform the representatives of the nation, that their petition could not be complied with!

This struggle between the commons and the crown was of the greatest importance; but the people at large were of opinion, that the former encroached upon the regal prerogative; on the question being, in a manner, thrown into their hands, by a dissolution of parliament, a new one was returned, which changed the majority and preserved the premier in his office.

The commercial treaty with France was a bold scheme, and evinced deep political and mercantile knowledge.

The union also of the two sister kingdoms, Great Britain and Ireland, formed one of the most important epochs in Mr. Pitt's administration. They who consider this union as beneficial to the empire, venerate the author of so grand a scheme; and even they who disapprove of the measure, must admire the talents and perseverance displayed in its execution. The Irish union is still farther memorable, as connected with Mr. Pitt's resignation.

One of the most critical circumstances in the annals of Mr. Pitt's administration, was the period when the regal powers were, in a manner, unhappily suspended, and all the wisdom of the legislature was required to form a regency. It was a crisis not only novel, but of extreme magnitude, as likely to become the precedent for future times; no such incident having, till then, occurred in the annals of English history. Some statesmen would have worshipped the rising sun; Mr. Pitt, however, pursued a different course, and, without seeking popularity, deservedly acquired it.

When the revolution took place in France, the situation of the prime minister of this kingdom became once more extremely critical. A new mode of action, a new scheme of politics, was to be devised, and adapted to the circumstances of the day. If any merit be due to boldness of invention, to vigour of execution, to wide extension of plans, and to firmness and perseverance of conduct, certainly the administration of that day had an undoubted claim to public gratitude, however unsuccessful their councils and plans proved.

Mr. Pitt's eloquence, if it possessed not all the vehemence of Mr. Fox's, nor all the splendour of Mr. Burke's, was more perfect in its kind than the eloquence of either of those orators. Upon great occasions it was lofty, powerful, and commanding; it was equally calculated to animate the heart and delight the ear. Many of his speeches upon the revolution are models of reasoning, as well as of eloquence. It was at times astonishing, instantaneous, and electric—the hearer seemed transported—the applause was often tumultuous. A more perfect command of language, a more judicious selection of phrases and epithets, no man ever possessed. It appeared sometimes as if his language had too much of elegance—yet it was always unstudied—there was not to be perceived, as in other orators, any painful effort or artifice; his language was perfectly natural to him, and whether in opening a subject or in reply, his diction was equally elegant. The arrangement of his matter was another admirable quality he possessed; nothing was involved; nothing confused; nothing crowded in the structure; all was clear and perspicuous, harmony and proportion pervaded the whole. His manner was dignified and commanding.

It has been often, but erroneously supposed, that Mr. Pitt was harsh, haughty, and repulsive, in private life. The contrary is the fact; no man was ever more fondly beloved by his relatives; and the deep grief of all who were connected with him by ties of blood or friendship, is the best proof of the manner in which he attached every one to him who was honored with his intimacy. In private life his manners were remarkably mild; the early associates of his infancy and youth were always remembered by him with the greatest affection. He delighted in patronizing and protecting them; he studied their interests and promoted their fortunes.

Mr. Pitt had, however, his errors: he seemed to have adopted as his main principle of action, that inconstancy was more fatal than error; and that more was to be gained by persevering even in a wrong road, removing obstacles as they appeared, and moving steadily, though obliquely, to his end, than by changing his course as he discovered his errors. This was doubtless erroneous, but it was the error of a manly mind and lofty character. Mr. Pitt may indeed be said to have found it an inheritance from his father. It was this foible in his character which at times gave his adversaries advantage over him. As to himself, he wholly disregarded a partial failure; it was part of his system to expect such failures, and, deeming them indifferent, he had no anxiety to defend them.—Many measures of his administration might here be instanced, which he never attempted to defend, or, if he entered on his defence, it was with a kind of conscious pride, which still farther irritated his opponents.

Another characteristic foible of Mr. Pitt was an insurmountable jealousy of place and honor; which led him, in his avarice for exclusive reputation, to prefer instruments to associates, and thus commit the execution of his plans to those who were unequal to them. It is but justice, however, to add, that he shewed in every thing a peculiar magnanimity, and a characteristic grandeur, which never deserted him—his schemes, considered in the general, and as separated from their execution, were always great, and, as far as depended upon himself, the means and the execution bore the stamp of the same master. Mr. Pitt never was married.

On Monday, January 27, Mr. H. Lascelles moved in the house of commons, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that his majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions that the remains of the Right Honorable William Pitt be entered at the public expense, and that a monument be erected in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of that excellent statesman, with an inscription expressive of the public sense of so great and irreparable a loss; and to assure his majesty, that this house will make good the expenses attending the same."

This motion was seconded by the Marquis of Titchfield, and supported by Lord Lovaine, Mr. I. H. Browne, Mr. H. Addington, Sir R. Buxton, General Tarleton, Lord Temple, Mr. R. Ryder, Mr. Rose, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Wilberforce. It was opposed by Lord Folkestone, Mr. William Smith, Mr. Pytches, the Marquis of Douglas, Mr. Windham, Mr. G. Ponsoby, and Mr. Fox. The numbers, on a division, were, for Mr. Lascelles' motion 258, against it 89. Majority 169.

The chief arguments for the motion, were the great merits, splendid talents, and important public services of the eminent character to whom it related, and these points were illustrated at considerable length by some of the members who supported the motion.

It was objected, on the other side, that it was not customary to confer public honors, unless where merit had been conjoined with success; and, it was urged, that no example, but one, could be found, where such honors had been conferred on a statesman, and in that instance (that of Lord Chatham) the success as well as the merit was indisputable.

"If I were to divide (said Mr. Windham) the whole of the political life of the distinguished person here spoken of, into two distinct periods, one the period before the breaking out of the French revolution, and the other the period subsequent to that event, and that I were called to declare, that either separately, or both conjointly, were of a sort to call for the honors now proposed, or to justify the character ascribed in the resolution, of 'An excellent Statesman,' I must say 'No.' I have no wish to bring forward my opinion in that respect at the present moment, but when compelled to declare myself, I must say what I think: I cannot consent to pronounce an opinion different from what I think the true one, and thus to contribute to mislead both the present time and posterity, on a period of our history which it is most important for them to judge rightly of. With the fullest acknowledgment, both of the talents and the virtues of the eminent man in question, I do not think, from whatever cause it has proceeded, that his life has been beneficial to his country. For the earlier part of it, including the commencement of his power, I must contradict every principle that I ever maintained, if I said that it was so. For the succeeding period, the greatest in which a statesman was ever called to act, I cannot say that he acted his part greatly. I do not judge merely from the event; though the event, for the present purpose, might be all that need be considered. The French revolution was, indeed, a storm in which vessels the best formed, and constructed with the greatest skill, might easily founder: but, what I mean to say, is, that in my opinion the vessel was not conducted with the greatest skill, and that it is, in all human probability, to the fault of the pilot that we are to ascribe our present fearful situation."

"Public honors," said Mr. Fox, "are matters of the highest importance, because they must more or less influence posterity. They ought not, therefore, to be conferred lightly, but only where merit is clearly seen and acknowledged. Certainly, when I look at Lord Chatham's monument, when I find the inscription bearing upon the face of it the grounds upon which this monument was voted, when I find it there stated, that he had reduced the power of France to a very low ebb, and raised the prosperity of his country to a very high pitch, I must say that this case can never be compared with that of Lord Chatham. I must say, that the country at present is reduced to the most dangerous and alarming situation—a situation which might call for any thing rather than honors to be conferred upon him, who had the direction of the measures that brought it to this state. In deciding upon the present question, I should be unwilling to take any one particular act of the administration of the late minister, I have always thought, and do still think, that an unfortunate system of government has pervaded the whole of the present reign; and I firmly believe that system to have been the cause of all the disasters and disappointments which the country has experienced, almost uniformly, throughout the whole course of it. Being of this opinion, how can I conscientiously say, that he who followed this system was an 'excellent statesman.' Thinking as I do of the disastrous effects of that system, I cannot but accuse the late minister of having, I will not say criminally, (for the expression might sound in some ears too harsh), but, most unfortunately, lent his brilliant talents and his commanding eloquence to the support of it. In having done so, and with the knowledge he must have had of it, I esteem him the more culpable, as without that splendour of mental endowment, which enabled him to throw a veil over the hideous deformity of the system alluded to, I am firmly persuaded, that it could not have resisted the attacks made upon it; and consequently could not have existed, and spread its baneful influence half so long. No man can be more desirous than I am to bury in oblivion the remembrance of those contests in which we were so long engaged. This I shewed plainly enough while he was alive. But I cannot consent to confer public honors, on the ground of his being 'an excellent statesman,' on the man, who, in my opinion, was the sole, certainly the chief supporter of a system, which I had been early taught to consider as a bad one."

Lord Castlereagh said, in reply to Mr. Fox, "that upon the arguments of that honorable gentleman, in opposition to this motion, it was not his intention to reason. This, in fact, was not a question to be determined by argument, it was quite a question of feeling. The acquiescence of that house and the country, in such a proposition, was more to be looked for from intuitive feeling than from cold reason; and if that feeling did not exist, it was vain to think of arguing men into it. But, although the support of the honorable gentlemen on the other side was not to be calculated upon, he had no doubt that the motion would be adopted. Indeed, he felt confident that it would. The house would act inconsistently with its own opinion, repeatedly expressed, and if it hesitated to recognize the merit—if it declined to distinguish the memory of Mr. Pitt."

Mr. Wilberforce rose "to bear testimony to the great public virtues and splendid talents of Mr. Pitt, in whom he declared the love of country was to be found as sincere and ardent as ever yet existed in any human bosom. With regard to the assertion, that success was a proper criterion by which to appreciate the merit of a great man, the honorable gentleman reprobated the idea, as inconsistent with wisdom and justice. But, if the character of Mr. Pitt were to be tried by that rule, where were we to look among the great men of ancient or modern times, for any who had stronger claims to the gratitude and respect of their country, than those which could be advanced in favor of that illustrious personage. When the revolutionary spirit had convulsed France, and alarmed the whole civilized world, that distinguished statesman completely succeeded, by the vigour and sagacity of his measures, in preventing that dreadful plague from reaching us. This was the main source of his distinction—this was the great pedestal of his fame."

On the 3d of February, Mr. Cartwright moved, that a sum, not exceeding 40,000*l.* should be voted for the payment of Mr. Pitt's debts, which motion was carried without opposition.

At a meeting of the common-council of London, on the 6th of February, it was moved, that a monument be erected in Guildhall, to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Pitt; and, after some debate, the question was carried by a majority—Ayes 77, Noes 71—Majority 6.

Mr. Pitt's funeral took place February 23; it was very grand and most respectfully attended, but was too soon after Lord Nelson's (which took place January 8,) to cause that general attention which otherwise would have been paid it.

Mr. Pitt's death opened the way for Mr. Fox's return to office. Lord Grenville was ordered by the king to form a new administration, which, after much difficulty, being at length effected, the cabinet was composed of the following members: Lord Erskine, lord high chancellor of England; Earl Fitzwilliam, lord president of the council; Viscount Sidmouth, lord privy seal; Lord Grenville, first lord of the treasury; Lord Howick, first lord of the admiralty; Earl of Moira, master general of the ordnance; Earl Spencer, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Windham, secretaries of state for the home, foreign, and war departments; Lord Henry Petty, chancellor of the exchequer; and Lord Ellenborough, lord-chief-justice of England.

The Duke of Bedford went as lord-lieutenant to Ireland, and Mr. Elliot accompanied him as chief-secretary. Mr. George Ponsonby was appointed chancellor and keeper of the seals in Ireland, and Sir John Newport chancellor of the Irish exchequer.

In short, no thorough and complete change in all the departments had not been seen since the year 1784.

Much was expected from this new administration; but though some good-will existed towards them, there was no enthusiasm in their favor.

Little popular feeling, indeed, of any sort was left in the country. The violence engendered by the French revolution had long since spent its fury, and had given place to universal apathy and indifference on all political subjects that did not effect directly the public purse, or concern the safety or naval glory of the kingdom. Hatred of speculation, and aversion to France, were the only springs that moved or even touched the public mind. But, while the new ministers could reckon little on the zealous or ardent support of the country, they had to contend at once with the secret disinclination of the court, and with the active and indefatigable opposition of the persons whom they had recently displaced from office. The friends and adherents of the late ministers, though disunited in every other respect, were agreed in the most cordial hatred of their successors; and though the ex-ministers themselves had little name or popularity to boast of, their followers were numerous and active, and from their past habits and occupations they were particularly fitted to give annoyance to any administration against which they had an interest to combine.

Affairs of Naples.—Bonaparte's Proclamation against the Neapolitan Dynasty.—Evacuation of Naples by the Russians and English.—Flight of their Sicilian Majesties.—Progress of the French Army under Joseph Bonaparte.—Actions and Defeat of the Neapolitans.—Joseph Bonaparte declared King of Naples.—Sir Sidney Smith's Expedition.—Sir John Stuart's ditto.—Battle of Maida.—French expelled from the two Calabrias.—Surrender of Gaeta.—Siege of Ragusa.—Battle of Castelnovo.

AFTER the retreat of the Russians, and conclusion of treaties with Austria and Prussia, the French emperor had no remaining enemy within his reach, except the King of Naples, whose recent conduct had been such as to provoke the utmost fury of his indignation. A treaty of neutrality between France and Naples had been concluded at Paris on the 21st of September, by Talleyrand and the Marquis di Gallo; and ratified at Portici by the King of Naples on the 8th of October. By this treaty, the French agreed to withdraw their troops from the Neapolitan territory, where they had been stationed, without any justifiable pretence, since the commencement of the war with England; and the King of Naples engaged, in return, to remain neutral in the war between France and the allies, and to repel, by force, every encroachment on his neutrality. He more particularly became bound not to permit the troops of any belligerent power to enter his territories; not to confide the command of his armies or defence of his strong places to any Russian or Austrian officer, or French emigrant, or subject of any belligerent; and not to admit any belligerent squadron into his ports. But hardly had six weeks elapsed after the ratification of this treaty, when every one of its stipulations was violated by the court of Naples. On the 20th of November a squadron of English and Russian ships of war appeared in the bay of Naples, and landed a body of forces in that city and its vicinity. It was doubtful whether this expedition was undertaken by the allies in concert with the Neapolitan government; but, whether previously consulted or not, by not opposing the landing of the troops, nor even remonstrating against it, the latter made itself a party to the transaction, and forfeited the neutrality secured to it by the treaty recently concluded. Such, at least, was the interpretation of its conduct by the French ambassador at Naples, who instantly took down the arms of France from over the gate of his hotel, and demanded passports, to enable him to leave the kingdom. Had the court of Naples been able to justify itself from a participation in the counsels that led to these proceedings, or been still desirous of maintaining its neutrality in the war between France and the allies, this was the moment for explanation. But, instead of keeping open the door for accommodation, it suffered the French ambassador to depart, without even attempting a vindication of its conduct; and contented itself with issuing a decree, in which, after slightly alluding to the late transactions, but without even condescending to say, that the neutrality of its territory had been violated against its will, it promised to foreign merchants, subjects of the allies of France, and resident in the Neapolitan dominions, who might otherwise be alarmed at the departure of the French ambassador, protection for their property, and permission to pursue their commerce. The appearance of such a decree, at such a juncture, was regarded by France as an unequivocal declaration, that the late proceedings of the allies at Naples, if not undertaken at the request of the Neapolitan government, were agreeable to its wishes; and if any doubts had remained of its intention to disregard the treaty of Portici, and connect itself with the allies, its subsequent conduct would have soon removed them.

The Russians, who were in number about 14,000 men, under General Lassey, landed at Naples, and were quartered in that city and its neighbourhood. The English, amounting to about 10,000, disembarked at Castel-a-mare, and were cantoned at that place, at Torre del Greco and in the vicinity. Sir James Craig was commander-in-chief of the English forces, and Sir John Stuart second in command. No sooner were the troops on shore, than preparations for active hostilities were begun by the government of Naples. Levies of Neapolitans were ordered. Horses and waggons, necessary for the advance of the army, were provided. Magazines were collected, and every demonstration was given by the court of Naples, that, if not consulted before the expedition was undertaken, the plan of operations, whatever it was, had now its hearty approbation and support.

It was not long before the court of Naples was made sensible of the full extent of its imprudence. On the morning after the signature of the peace of Presburgh, Bonaparte issued a proclamation, from his head-quarters at Vienna, declaring "the Neapolitan dynasty had ceased to reign," and denouncing vengeance against the reigning family, in terms that left no hope of pardon or accommodation. Hardly had this threatening proclamation reached Naples, when the allies, who had brought the Neapolitan government into these difficulties, set the first example of flight, and abandoned to their fate the royal personages whom they had so inexcusably involved in ruin. A courier arrived at Naples, with orders from the Emperor Alexander, for the Russian troops to re-embark and return to Corfu. The retreat of the Russians led necessarily to that of the English. Had the Russians remained, who formed the greater part of the allied army, there is a strong position on the road from Rome to Naples, having the mountains of Abruzzo on the right, and the Ganigliano on the left, which might have been maintained against the French.—But, after the departure of the Russians, the English were too few in number for so extensive a line of defence, and, therefore, Sir James Craig determined on retiring with his troops to Sicily, without waiting for the arrival of the enemy.—This resolution, which seemed, indeed, the only reasonable plan left him to adopt, he carried into execution without delay, and thus secured Sicily from the French, which, had he attempted without success the defence of Naples, must have fallen into their hands without resistance. This hasty retreat of Sir James Craig excited murmurs among his soldiers, who, with the spirit natural to British troops, were indignant at the appearance of flying before an enemy, distant from them many hundred miles. It was still less acceptable to the court of Naples, which was unwilling to abandon its capital, and too weak, without assistance, to attempt its defence.—But, the British general, disregarding the murmurs of the one and remonstrances of the other, persisted in his resolution; and being convinced that Naples could not be defended with the forces under his command, he wisely determined not to expose his troops to the consequences of their ardour and inexperience, nor to sacrifice them to the wild and extravagant projects of the court of Naples.

In the mean time a French army, under the command of Joseph Bonaparte, assisted by Massena, Regnier, and other generals of reputation, was advancing towards Naples; and on the 9th of February its head-quarters were at Ferentino, on the frontiers of that kingdom. From this place a proclamation was issued by Joseph Bonaparte, threatening the court of Naples with the severest vengeance for its breach of faith, and violation of the treaty of Portici, but promising to the people, that if they submitted to the French arms, their religion, laws, and property should be respected. Having passed the frontiers of the kingdom, the French advanced in three divisions. The right commanded by Regnier, marched to Gaeta without opposition, and summoned the Prince of Hesse-Philipsthardt, the governor of that place, to surrender, offering him honorable terms of capitulation, and warning him of the inefficacy of resistance. The answer of the Prince of Hesse was a determinate refusal to capitulate; on which the French attacked and carried the redoubt of St. André, defended by ten pieces of cannon, but lost, in the attack, General Gigny, an excellent officer, much lamented by their army. The centre division, under the command of Massena, met with no resistance in its march to Naples. Capua surrendered on the 12th of February; and, on the 15th, Joseph Bonaparte entered Naples, the garrison left in that city and in the neighbouring forts having previously capitulated. Next day, he went publicly to mass, which was celebrated by Cardinal Ruffo, Archbishop of Naples; and to display his devotion in a manner more gratifying to the populace, he presented a diamond necklace, as an offering to Saint Januarius, the tutelary saint of Naples.

The unfortunate King of Naples had left his capital on the 23d of January, to seek refuge, a second time, at Palermo; and the queen had followed his example. Part of the Neapolitan army accompanied the king and queen in their flight, and a number of persons, connected with the court or obnoxious to the French, made their escape along with them. Though the king had been always a favorite with the populace, no effort was made to detain him, nor disposition shewn, as on a former occasion, to arm in his defence. The queen was detested by all ranks of people, and no sentiment, but exultation, attended her flight.

The Duke of Calabria, heir-apparent of Naples, to whom the king, his father, before his departure had delegated the regency of the kingdom, during his own absence, remained at Naples till the 7th of February. But, having tried, in vain, to open a negociation with the French, he abandoned the city on their approach, and retired, with a body of troops, to Calabria, where General Damas, a French emigrant in the Neapolitan service, was at the head of a considerable force, endeavouring to organize a levy en masse, for the defence of that part of the kingdom. The activity of the French, however, left the Neapolitan generals but a short time to complete their preparations. General Regnier was called from before Gaeta, and sent after the fugitives with part of the army which had entered Naples. No stand was made by the Neapolitan generals till they reached the frontiers of Calabria; when having taken a strong position at Lago Negro, they determined to wait there the approach of the enemy. An action ensued, in which the Neapolitans, after attempting, in vain, to defend the passage of a small rivulet, were driven with great loss from their position. This action, which seemed to have been obstinately disputed on the part of the Neapolitans, was fought on the 6th of March. On the two following days Regnier continued to advance, driving small parties of the Neapolitans before him, and on the 9th he attacked their army in its entrenched position at Campo Tenese. According to the French accounts, the Neapolitans behaved most shamefully on this occasion. They were said to have fled at the first onset, abandoning their cannon and baggage, and about 2,000 prisoners to the enemy; and to have dispersed after the battle so completely, that General Damas was unable, in his flight, to collect together more than 900 infantry and 50 horse.

The truth is, that the disorder of the Neapolitan army, in Calabria, was owing more to the want of skill and courage in their leaders, than to any misconduct in their troops.—The battle of Campo Tenese, (if it deserves the name,) put an end at this time to the war in Calabria. Regnier advanced to Neggis at the extremity of the peninsula, and placed a French garrison in the fort of Scylla. Another division of the French army marched, without opposition, to Tarento, and took possession of that important city, the most conveniently situated of any in the kingdom, for menacing, at once, both Sicily and Greece.

The whole kingdom of Naples had now submitted to the French arms, except Gaeta and Civitella del Tranto, in the farther Abruzzo.—Gaeta, which is situated on the point of a rocky promontory, washed on three sides by the sea, and on the fourth joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus, strongly fortified, was still held by the Prince of Hesse-Philipsthardt; and such was the strength of the place and resolution of the governor, that the French had no chance of becoming masters of it without a regular siege; which, for want of battering cannon, they were unable for some time to commence. But, though no enemy appeared against them in the field, the country they had subdued was far from being tranquil. Assassinations, robberies, and other disorders inseparable from a dissolution of government, broke out at Naples and in other parts of the kingdom, and required, for their suppression, the most rigorous and vigilant police. These disorders, which filled the better sort of Neapolitans with the most dismal apprehensions, were fomented by the partizans and emissaries of the old government, who thought to distress the French by exciting disturbances in the country. But, such wretched policy had no other effect than to alienate still farther from, the exiled family all persons of rank, property, or consideration at Naples, and to attach them more firmly to the French interest, from the predominance of which only they could expect security and protection.

The knowledge that such were the sentiments of the principal Neapolitans, determined Bonaparte to make known, without further delay, his ultimate intentions with respect to Naples. He had already declared, that the exiled family should never return to occupy the throne which they had abandoned. He now issued a decree, conferring the crown of Naples on his brother Joseph and his legitimate heirs-male; without prejudice to their eventual claim to the throne of France; but with a proviso, that the crown of France and that of Naples should never be united on the same head.

In pursuance of this decree, which was communicated to the French senate on the 30th of March, Joseph Bonaparte caused himself to be proclaimed King of Naples, and made all the constituted authorities of the kingdom take an oath of fidelity to him. The city of Naples was illuminated on this occasion, with every demonstration of joy and satisfaction on the part of the nobles, who were eager to shew their attachment to their new king, and accept of offices and distinctions in his service, in order to mark, not so much their devotion to him as their aversion to the exiled family.

The assumption of the regal dignity in Naples, by Joseph Bonaparte, and the defection of so many persons of distinction, excited the liveliest indignation at the court of Palermo. Instead of profiting by their past misfortunes, the Queen and Duke of Calabria listened to no counsels but such as flattered their anger with plans of vengeance, or soothed their impatience with idle projects for regaining their lost dominions. Though driven from Naples by their inability to resist the French arms, they were now eager to attempt the recovery of that kingdom, and confident of expelling from it an enemy whose invasion they had not ventured to oppose, or even dared to await.—No event had happened since their flight, to encourage them in so wild and unpromising an enterprise.—They had no foreign succour to reckon upon, nor prospect of any diversion of importance in their favor. To the efforts of their Neapolitan subjects alone could they look for assistance; but, to expect a prosperous issue to their attempts, without farther aid than their late subjects could afford, was to suppose, that Neapolitans fighting to subvert their government, were more formidable than Neapolitans fighting in its defence. Plans founded on such expectations terminated as might have been foreseen. In some of the provinces of Naples, emissaries from the court of Palermo were successful in exciting insurrections against the French, and in all they produced a spirit of restlessness and insubordination, which gave to the new government great inquietude. But no permanent good resulted from these disturbances, to compensate the present evils to which they led. Abruzzo and Calabria were delivered for a short time from the French yoke. But, though the insurgents fought with unparalleled courage and intrepidity, and were successful in many encounters, the numbers and discipline of the French prevailed in the end; so that after a fruitless waste of blood, and perpetration of atrocities, on all sides, disgraceful to humanity, these provinces were again compelled to acknowledge Joseph Bonaparte for their sovereign.

The provinces of Abruzzo, though naturally poor, are inhabited by a more respectable and less indigent peasantry than the other parts of the kingdom of Naples.—The late government, which stood in awe of the Abruzzese, had been careful not to violate their privileges, nor in any sort to oppress them; and had, on the contrary, relieved them from some local taxes unfavorable to their industry. So easy is it for princes to gain the affections of their subjects, that these slight favors had kindled a lively spirit of loyalty and attachment to the exiled family in the breasts of the Abruzzese. When, therefore, a successful sally from Gaeta had enabled part of the garrison of that fortress to cut its way through the besieging army, and reach the mountains of Abruzzo, the flames of insurrection spread rapidly over the province.

After a long resistance, Civitella del Tranto, in the further Abruzzo, was obliged to surrender to the French: the Abruzzese, who had taken up arms, had defended themselves for many months, and submitted at length on honorable terms of capitulation.

About the middle of April, Sir Sidney Smith had arrived at Palermo, in the Pompée, of 84 guns, and taken the command of the English squadron destined for the defence of Sicily, consisting of five ships of the line, besides frigates, transports, and gun-boats. With this force under his command, Sir Sidney sailed to the coast of Italy, and began his operations by introducing into Gaeta supplies of stores and ammunition, of which its garrison had been greatly in want. Having performed this important service, and left at Gaeta a flotilla of gun-boats, under the protection of a frigate, to assist in the defence of the place, he proceeded to the bay of Naples, spreading such alarm along the coast, that the French conveyed in haste to Naples part of their battering train from the trenches before Gaeta, in order to protect the capital from insult, and secure it from attack. It happened, that at the moment when Sir Sidney came in sight of Naples, that city was illuminated on account of Joseph Bonaparte being proclaimed

King of the Two Sicilies. It was in the power of the English admiral to have disturbed their festivity; but, as the sufferers from his interference must have been the inhabitants of Naples, and not the French troops, or the new king, he wisely and humanely forbore, and made for the isle of Capri; of which he took possession, after a slight resistance, and placed in it an English garrison.—He then proceeded southward along the coast, giving the greatest annoyance every where to the enemy, obstructing by land, and intercepting entirely by sea their communication along the shore, so as to retard their operations against Gaeta, which was the chief purpose for undertaking this expedition.

On the return of Sir Sidney to Palermo, after the conclusion of this service, he was led, from the active turn and sanguine temper of his mind, to enter with eagerness into the projects of the court, and to second its views on Calabria to the utmost of his power. Finding him favorably inclined to their schemes, and anxious to distinguish himself by some great exploit, their Sicilian majesties invested the British admiral with the most ample authority in Calabria, and even constituted him their viceroy in that province. But, though active and indefatigable in the duties of his new department, and successful in distributing money, arms, and ammunition among the Calabrians, he soon found, that, unless an English army made its appearance in the country, there was no chance of his producing an insurrection against the French. It became, therefore, necessary for the court of Palermo, either to abandon the fruit of all its intrigues and machinations, or to prevail on the commander of the English forces in Sicily to invade Calabria with part of his army.

After the evacuation of Naples, Sir James Craig had retired with the English army to Sicily, and established his head-quarters at Messina, as the station best adapted for protecting the island from invasion.—There he remained till April, when bad health compelled him to resign his command to Sir John Stuart, who was soon after entrusted by his Sicilian majesty with the defence of the east coast of Sicily from Melazzo to Cape Passaro, and with the command of the Sicilian troops in that district. The army continued in its position at Messina till the end of June, without attempting offensive operations against the enemy.

It was of the utmost importance to England, that Sicily should not fall under the dominion of France; and therefore Sir John Stuart, when solicited by the court of Palermo to assist in its schemes on Calabria, hesitated long, and deliberated maturely before he complied. He considered, that an expedition to Calabria, however it might gratify their Sicilian majesties, could not, on the most favorable supposition, lead to their re-establishment at Naples, nor even secure to them the possession of any part of their continental dominions; whereas, if it failed, it must weaken the defence and endanger the safety of Sicily. He was, therefore, averse to such an expedition, and refused to engage in it when first proposed to him. But, overcome by the urgent and repeated instances of the Sicilian government, encouraged by flattering accounts of the disposition of the Calabrians, and foreseeing that, if success attended the first operations, he should be able at any rate to destroy the stores and ammunition collected in Calabria for the invasion of Sicily, he consented at length to land with part of his army on the continent, and make trial of the loyalty and affection of the people to their former masters. The enterprize which Sir John Stuart thus reluctantly undertook, he conducted with singular judgment and ability, and brought to a fortunate conclusion, with infinite glory to the British arms, but without any of those advantages to the court of Palermo which it had fondly anticipated from the experiment.

The troops destined to this expedition by Sir John Stuart, amounted to about 4,800 effective men.—With this small force he landed on the morning of the 1st of July, in a bay in the gulph of St. Eufemia, near the northern frontier of Lower Calabria. Little opposition was made to his landing by the enemy, who had not yet collected their forces. A proclamation was immediately issued by the English general, inviting the Calabrians to join the standard of their lawful sovereign, and offering them arms and ammunition for their defence. Few or none, however, obeyed the summons. Disappointed in his expectations from the inhabitants, Sir John Stuart was hesitating whether to re-embark his troops, when intelligence was brought to him that General Regnier was encamped at Maida, about ten miles off, with an army nearly equal to his own. Understanding at the same time that the French general was in daily expectation of reinforcements, he determined to advance next morning, (July 4) and attack him before they arrived.

The two armies were separated by a plain from four to six miles in breadth, extending from sea to sea, and bounded on the north and south by chains of mountains. The French occupied a strong position on the sloping side of a woody hill, below the village of Maida, having the river Lamato in front, and their flanks strengthened by a thick impervious underwood. In numbers they were greatly superior to the English, having received the expected reinforcement before the battle. Their force was about 7,000 men, while that of the English did not amount to 4,800. Had Regnier remained upon the heights, the English must have attacked him with great disadvantage, and though the event of the engagement would have been probably the same, the loss on their part must have been more considerable. But, fortunately, blinded by an excess of confidence in his own troops, and an undue and unbounded contempt of the enemy, he quitted his strong position, and drew up his army on the plain.

The English, surprised at the number of his troops, which was greater than they expected, but in no wise dismayed by their appearance, advanced with undiminished alacrity to the attack. The action began on the right of the English army. After some firing, both sides prepared to charge with the bayonet, and advanced with apparently equal resolution; but the French, who had probably imbibed from their general his contemptuous opinion of the enemy, were so astonished at the firmness with which the English advanced to the charge, that, struck with a sudden panic, they gave way after the bayonets of the two armies had begun to cross, and endeavoured to save themselves by flight. It was too late, however, to escape. They were overtaken with immense slaughter, and in a short time the whole of the left wing of their army was totally routed and dispersed. The enemy being thus completely discomfited on their left, made an effort, with their right, to retrieve the honor of the day; but they were resisted with great steadiness by the English left, and their cavalry being thrown into disorder, in an attempt to turn the English flank, by an unexpected fire from the twentieth regiment, which landed during the action, and came up at this critical juncture, they abandoned the field of battle with precipitation, and left an undisputed victory to their opponents. About 700 French were buried on the ground, and 1,000 prisoners taken, among whom were General Compere and several other officers of rank; but their total loss from this conflict was estimated by Sir John Stuart at not less than 4,000 men. The English had only 45 men killed and 282 wounded in the action.

This glorious victory, which was gained on the 6th of July, was the signal of a general insurrection in both the Calabrias. The peasants, already prepared to take up arms, rose in every direction against the French, cut off their stragglers, pursued their flying parties, and attacked their posts. The French, provoked by their defeat, and exasperated by the cruelty of the insurgents, who gave no quarter to such as fell into their hands, retaliated with a savageness and ferocity more disgraceful to their character than the panic terrors which had seized them at Maida. The villages which declared against them were plundered and burned to the ground, and the inhabitants massacred without distinction of age or sex. This usage still farther inflamed the Calabrians, whose attacks on their posts were incessant and furious, till, with the assistance of the English, they drove them entirely out of their country. Unable to contend with their numerous and exasperated assailants, the French were compelled at length to evacuate both Calabrias, and to abandon all the cannon, stores, and ammunition which they had collected in these provinces for the invasion of Sicily. Not a single place along the coast was left in their possession, from Coohne to Sicosà. Of 9,000 men, which was the amount of their force in Lower Calabria, before the battle of Maida, not above 3,000 made good their retreat: in Upper Calabria their loss from the insurgents, for the English did not penetrate into that province, was, by their own confession, very considerable.

But glorious and successful as this expedition had been, it soon appeared how far it was from having opened to the King of Sicily any prospect of regaining his kingdom of Naples. So sensible was Sir John Stuart of his inability to maintain the ground he had won in Calabria, that from the plain of Maida he announced his intention of returning without loss of time to Sicily. On the 18th of July his head-quarters were at Bagnara, near Reggio; and on the 23d the fort of Scylla, opposite to Messina, a place of great importance for the secure navigation of the straits, surrendered to one of his officers. The whole of the British army was now withdrawn from Calabria, except the garrison of Scylla, and a detachment of the 78th regiment, under Colonel M'Leod; which had been sent in the Amphion frigate to the coast near Catanzaro, in order to countenance and assist the insurgents in that quarter. This service was effectually performed by Colonel M'Leod and Captain Hoste of the Amphion. The French under Regnier were severely harassed in their retreat along the shore from Catanzaro to Cotrone, and the latter place, with all its magazines and stores, fell into the hands of the English.

General Acland was also dispatched to the bay of Naples, with the 58th and 81st regiments, to make demonstrations in that direction, which might alarm the enemy, and deter him from sending reinforcements to Calabria. General Acland was not absolutely prohibited from landing his troops, but he was directed not to expose his soldiers to that danger, unless he had a prospect of effecting some object of real and permanent utility. Sir Sidney Smith was in the mean time actively, if not judiciously, employed along the coast, assisting the insurgents with arms and ammunition, supplying them with provisions, and conveying them from one place to another, in the vessels under his command. By these exertions he contributed materially to extend the insurrection along the coast, and to expel the enemy from the watch-towers and castles which they occupied upon the shore. These operations were, in some instances, of use, by securing a safer and better anchorage for his ships; but, in others, the blood and treasure which they cost exceeded the value of his acquisitions. In one of these adventures, two officers and five seamen were killed and thirty-four seamen wounded, in the attack of an insignificant fort at Point Licosa, which he destroyed when it fell into his hands. No British troops were stationed any where to maintain his conquests, except in the isle of Capri, which was kept as a place of refreshment for the navy: but a number of posts were occupied and garrisoned by the insurgents, such as Amantea, Scalea, and the isle of Dino on the coast of Upper Calabria, and Maratea, Sapei, Camerota, Palinuro, and other places in the bay of Policastro. The chief, or rather sole use of these posts consisted in the protection which they afforded to the anchorage upon the coast, and facilities thereby given to the British and Neapolitan small craft, of intercepting the coasting communications of the enemy, so as to prevent the supply of his army in Calabria with cannon, which, from the badness of the roads, it was impossible for him to convey by land.

The loss of Gaeta, which surrendered to the French soon after the battle of Maida, more than counterbalanced these trifling successes in other parts of the coast. While the Prince of Hesse continued to have the command of Gaeta, that place was gallantly defended; and sallies were repeatedly made with the greatest success, by which the operations of the enemy were impeded, their cannon spiked, and their batteries taken and destroyed. But the Prince of Hesse having been wounded by a splinter, and removed for his recovery to Palermo, and the French having at length brought their artillery to act upon the place, the lieutenant-governor, Colonel Hotz, saw himself forced to capitulate. The surrender of Gaeta cut off the communication with the northern parts of the kingdom of Naples, where the spirit of disaffection was as strong as in the south; and set at liberty a force of 16,000 men, previously employed in that siege, to act against the Calabrians.

A decree was issued at Naples, on the 31st of July, declaring the two Calabrias in a state of war, and subjecting them to all the rigours of military law. Massena, invested with despotic authority, was placed at the head of a powerful army, and sent to reduce them to obedience. The insurgents were not in sufficient force to meet him in the field, and were too much divided among themselves to attempt any enterprise of importance, even against his out-posts. The difficulty of transporting artillery over the mountains retarded his operations; but his progress, though slow, was uninterrupted, and his successes, though often dearly bought, were not checked by any reverse.

On the 16th of August, the advanced guard of the French army entered Cosenza, the capital of Upper Calabria, and before the beginning of September they had recovered possession of the whole of that province, excepting Amantea, Scalea, and some other places upon the coast. But it was some time before they penetrated in force into the Lower Calabria. Their head-quarters, in December, were still at Cosenza and Fiume Freddo, in Upper Calabria, though their advanced posts had long before been at Monteleone and Mileto, about 30 miles distant from Scylla. Cotrone did not fall into their hands till the end of the year, nor Amantea, the last place held by the insurgents upon the coast, till the beginning of the ensuing spring.

The Calabrian insurgents or massé were composed of the lowest, worst, and most miserable of the country people and villagers. Attracted by pay or the hope of plunder to the standard under which they fought, no confidence could be reposed in their fidelity; and though individually brave, when assembled in bodies no dependence could be placed on their steadiness. While the French were still at a distance, a report was brought to the massé in Lower Calabria, that the enemy was advancing to attack them, on which the capi, or chiefs of the massé, fled in the most shameful manner, and the massé, abandoned by their leaders, after recovering from their first panic, broke out in such acts of murder, cruelty, and rapine, that it became necessary for Sir John Stuart to cross over to Scylla, and send detachments of British troops into the interior of the country, to put a stop to their excesses. This happened in the latter part of August.

On a subsequent occasion, intelligence having been sent to the Neapolitan generals that the French, who were lying at Nicastro, to the number of 4,000 men, were afraid to cross the river Lamato, lest the English should land and attack them in the rear, it was resolved to attempt to surprise them in that situation, by advancing from Monteleone and Filadelfia, with 1,600 of the massé and 2,000 Neapolitan troops; but when this corps had arrived within four miles of the enemy, a suspicion suddenly seized the massé that the Neapolitans meant to desert them in the heat of the engagement, upon which they immediately secured the person of Cancelliere, the general set over them by his Sicilian majesty, and refused to deliver him up, when demanded, to the other generals.

Many of the capi, or chiefs of the insurgents, were men of infamous character, who had justly forfeited their lives to the laws of their country. Pane di Grano, one of the most celebrated of their leaders, was a priest, whose crimes had been so enormous, that, though a clergyman, he had been condemned to the galleys. Fra Diavolo, who distinguished himself in the neighbourhood of Naples, had been guilty of robbery and murder. Galley-slaves, polluted with every crime and prepared for every atrocity, were collected by order of the court of Palermo, and landed among its former subjects, in order to keep alive the insurrection, and render desperate the hope of accommodation with the enemy. The consequences of employing such agents to conduct the war may be easily imagined. Murder and rapine spread universally over the country. The lawless and vicious combined against the orderly and well-disposed. Those who had property were oppressed and plundered by those who had none, and many victims were sacrificed to private resentment, under the mask and pretence of public duty.

The French, irritated by cruelties, which the humanity of Sir John Stuart interposed ineffectually to prevent, retaliated on the insurgents with a barbarity equal to their own. Prisoners taken with arms in their hands were shot instantly, on the false and monstrous pretext, that they were rebels against Joseph Bonaparte. Villages, which refused to admit French troops within their walls, or to pay the contributions demanded from them, were pillaged and burned; and in some atrocious cases, the wretched inhabitants were included, without mercy or distinction, in the conflagration, and, with their wives and children, prevented by French soldiers from making their escape from the flames that consumed their habitations.

When Sir John Stuart returned to Messina from his glorious expedition in Calabria, he found Lieutenant-general Fox arrived there from Gibraltar, with a commission of commander-in-chief of the British forces in Italy. General Fox took upon him the command of the army on the 29th of July, and immediately appointed Sir John Stuart to conduct the war, which he had begun with so much success, in the two Calabrias. This office Sir John Stuart most readily undertook, and in the prosecution of it made a second expedition to Calabria, for the purpose of restoring some degree of order in that country, and repressing the excesses of the massé; but when Sir John Moore, his senior officer, joined the army with reinforcements from England, and became, of course, second in command, he preferred returning home to England to continuing third in command in Italy.

Soon after the arrival of Sir John Moore, that gallant and experienced officer was dispatched along the coast to the bay of Naples, to collect information of the state of the country, and to confer with Sir Sidney Smith about operations, in which the assistance of the navy might be wanted. The result of Sir John Moore's inquiries was unfavorable to any new expedition to the continent. He found the populace of Naples discontented, and ready to attempt an insurrection, if encouraged by the presence of a considerable British army; but, without some prospect of co-operation from the upper part of Italy, he saw no advantage to be gained by encouraging these dispositions; and with respect to the war in Calabria, he was satisfied that, by supplying the people with arms and ammunition, and exciting them to insurrection, it would be merely organizing and keeping alive a predatory civil war, ruinous and destructive to individuals, while it was unattended with any real or permanent benefit to the English or to their ally. The information collected by General Fox at Messina, and the conduct of the massé in Lower Calabria, coincided with the report of Sir John Moore, and determined General Fox to make no expedition to the continent, unless some more favorable opportunity presented itself, and in the mean time to withhold from the massé supplies of arms and ammunition, which they were obviously employing in other uses than such as a British general could approve of.

This determination was far from being acceptable at Palermo, where the court listened greedily to every plan proposed to it for the recovery of Naples, and thought always the last project laid before it the surest to succeed. The Marquis di Circello, who had been appointed minister of foreign affairs on the resignation of Sir John Acton, was a person of very middling abilities, but high in favor with the queen, and implicitly devoted to her service. It was natural for such a minister, desirous of pleasing his sovereign, and indifferent or blind to all other consequences, to propose to the commander of the British forces to engage, in conjunction with the troops of his Sicilian majesty, in a combined attack upon Naples. A temporary possession of that city, he argued, though it were for twenty-four hours only, if it did no other good, would, at least, enable their majesties to take vengeance on their rebellious subjects. Such a consideration was not calculated to dispose a British officer in favor of their plan; but there were other reasons, besides the disgust arising from the disclosure of such views, which determined General Fox to express, in the most peremptory manner, his decided disapprobation of the project, and to signify, that it was totally impossible for the British army to co-operate in such an expedition.

Thwarted in its plan of operations by the refusal of the English general to co-operate in a project, every part of which he disapproved of, the court of Palermo was ultimately compelled to abandon its designs upon Naples; though it affected, for some time, an intention of pursuing the enterprize with its own forces, the greater part of which it assembled on the north coast of Sicily, under the Prince of Hesse, on pretence of inspecting, arming, and clothing the troops. But, when the resolution of General Fox not to concur in the expedition was found to be unalterably fixed, the project was entirely given up, though with much reluctance and ill-humour against the English.

While their Sicilian majesties were thus intent on the recovery of Naples, the importance of Sicily, the resources which it might be made to afford, and the means necessary to be taken for conciliating the affections of its inhabitants, and rousing them against the enemy, seemed never to have entered into their contemplation. When the royal family were driven a second time to Sicily for shelter and protection, the Sicilians had vainly imagined, that in return for their assistance and fidelity they would be relieved from jealous and injurious restrictions on their commerce and navigation, and raised to greater weight and consideration in the councils of their sovereign, than they had hitherto attained. Their ancient constitution, the venerable forms of which were still existing, they were desirous to re-establish, and no less attached to the English by ancient traditions than by hatred of the French, they fondly expected from the former assistance and countenance in this great undertaking.

As the transactions in Naples had little connection with the scenes passing in the rest of Europe, we shall proceed next to give an account of the affairs in Cattaro and Ragusa between the French and Russians; and afterwards revert to the more important but fatal events in the north of Germany.

Cattaro, a small barren province, situated to the south of Ragusa, derives its value from the excellence of its harbour, which is the largest and safest in the Adriatic; and from the skill of its seamen, who form the chief part of its population. This province was one of those transferred to France by the peace of Presburg, by the articles of which it was stipulated, that France should take possession of Cattaro within six weeks after the exchange of the ratification of the treaty. At the expiration of that period, the French officers appointed to receive the province from the Austrians had not arrived at Cattaro. An agent of the court of Russia at Cattaro took advantage of this delay, and succeeded in persuading the inhabitants, who are chiefly Greeks, that France having failed to take possession of the place at the time appointed, Austria was released from the obligation of maintaining it, and justified in withdrawing her troops and leaving it to the first occupant. This reasoning, though satisfactory to the inhabitants of Cattaro, made no impression on the Austrian commandant, who occupied the forts with a garrison of 1,500 men, till supported by the irruption of a band of Montenegrins from the mountains, and by the arrival of a Russian line-of-battle-ship from Corfu.

The Marquis de Ghisilieri, commissary-general of the Austrian army, appointed to deliver up Dalmatia and Cattaro to the French, happened, at that moment, to arrive at Cattaro, whither he had preceded the French generals, on hearing of the mutinous spirit of the inhabitants; but, instead of resisting the Russians and their allies, as with the garrison in the forts he might easily have done till the arrival of the French, he consented, after a short negociation, to evacuate the place, which was immediately occupied by the natives, and by them transferred to the Russians. This strange transaction took place on the 4th of March, when the French were within a few days march of the place. The Austrian officers in garrison at Cattaro were scandalized at this proceeding, and so indignant with Ghisilieri, that they made a formal protest against the evacuation of the forts; and when the conduct of that officer came afterwards to be enquired into at Vienna, the reasons he assigned for giving up the place appeared so unsatisfactory to the tribunal before which he was tried, that he was dismissed from the imperial service, and sentenced to be imprisoned for life in a fortress of Transylvania.

The French, disappointed of Cattaro, with that profligate contempt of the rights of independent states which so strongly characterized the transactions of these times, took possession of Ragusa, to which they had no claim, on pretence of securing it against the incursions of the Montenegrins, who had not even threatened to violate its territory. The Montenegrins are a barbarous tribe of freebooters, inhabiting the chain of mountains adjoining to Cattaro, from one of which, called Monte-negro, they derive their name. They were, at this time, in close alliance with the Russians, and, therefore, the occupation of Ragusa by the French, instead of protecting that republic from their violence, afforded them a pretext for invading and laying it waste. Several skirmishes ensued, in which both sides claimed the victory. The French, however, were, in the end, compelled by the Russians and Montenegrins to shut themselves up in Ragusa, where they stood a siege of several weeks, while the Montenegrins ravaged the country and committed horrible excesses on the inhabitants. General Lauriston, who commanded in Ragusa, was at length relieved, July 6, from this embarrassing situation, by the arrival of General Molitor from Dalmatia, with a French army collected in that province. It was now the turn of the Russians and Montenegrins to retreat, which, after the loss of their artillery and plunder, the former effected to their ships, the latter to their mountains, and in a few days the territory of Ragusa was cleared of these barbarians. No event of importance followed till the month of September, when the Russians and Montenegrins, having assembled in great force near Castel-Nuovo, General Marmont marched against them from Ragusa, and having enticed them, by a military stratagem, to quit their entrenchments, attacked and defeated them with great loss on the 29th. But, notwithstanding this defeat, the Russians continued in possession of Cattaro and Castel-Nuovo at the end of the year.

Occupation of Hanover by the Prussians.—France refuses to confirm the Alterations made by Prussia in the Treaty of Vienna.—Bonaparte's Violence and Inconsistency.—Treaty of Paris.—Surrender of Anspach, Neufchatel, and Cleves.—Exclusion of the English Flags from the German Ports.—Embargo upon Prussian Vessels.—His Britannic Majesty's Message to Parliament.—War between Prussia and Sweden.—Murder of Palm, a Bookseller.—Confederation of the Rhine.—Dissolution of the German Empire.—Conduct of Prussia.—Blockade of the Prussian Ports discontinued.

AFTER the battle of Austerlitz, the court of Berlin had again recourse to negotiation. Major-general Von Pfuhl was dispatched to the French head-quarters, with instructions to signify, that Prussia was now ready to accept the propositions which she had formerly rejected, and with orders to add, "that his Prussian majesty would consider the occupation of Hanover by French troops as an act of hostility." But, previously to the arrival of Von Pfuhl at the place of his destination, Haugwitz had signed a definitive treaty at Vienna, by which Prussia, from being the friend and ally of the coalesced powers, and almost the open and declared enemy of France, became the ally of the latter, the guarantee of her conquests in Germany, and her associate in the spoils of the vanquished and baffled coalition.

The treaty of Vienna was sent back to France with alterations; and under the pretence of securing the electorate of Hanover from the calamities of another ruinous war, the troops of the allies were withdrawn from it, and replaced by Prussians. To the English minister at Berlin it was said, that arrangements concluded with France for ensuring the tranquillity of Hanover, "stipulated expressly the committing of that country to the exclusive guard of the Prussian troops, and to the administration of the king, until the conclusion of a peace between England and France;" and the assertion, that "till the conclusion of a general peace, Hanover would be wholly occupied and governed by Prussia," was repeated in the proclamation of his Prussian majesty on taking possession of the electorate;

but not a word was said of his ulterior design of annexing it to the Prussian monarchy, in exchange for territory ceded to France.

This reserve in taking possession of Hanover was far from being acceptable to the court of St. Cloud. The alterations which Prussia had proposed in the treaty of Vienna, were rejected with disdain; and the treaty itself, because it had not received a simple and unconditional ratification, was declared to be annulled. Haugwitz hurried to Paris, flattering himself that the personal consideration in which he was held by Bonaparte would remove every difficulty. But, after having been made to wait some days for an audience, he was undeceived at his first interview. Nor did he quit Paris till he had signed a new treaty, by which Prussia became bound, not only to perpetrate an undisguised act of injustice, by annexing Hanover to her dominions; but, to commit an act of decided hostility against England, by excluding the British flag from the ports of that electorate. Such was the violence and inconsistency of Bonaparte's conduct, that in the very act of compelling Prussia to accept of the sovereignty of Hanover, he interfered with the exercise of her sovereignty in that country, in so important a point as the right of making peace or war. His will, however, was no longer disputed.

The treaty of Paris was signed on the 15th of February; on the 24th, Bernadotte took possession of Anspach and Bayreuth for the King of Bavaria, to whom these provinces were transferred by France; on the 18th of March the Prussians evacuated Wesel; and on the 21st the French troops were withdrawn from Hamlen, the only place in the electorate of Hanover which they had continued to occupy. On the 28th of March, a proclamation was issued by Count Shulenburg, in the name of the King of Prussia, ordering "the ports of the German ocean, and the rivers which empty themselves in it, to be shut against British shipping and trade, in the same manner as when Hanover was occupied by French troops;" and on the 1st of April, a patent appeared under the authority of the same monarch, annexing formally the electorate of Hanover to his other dominions, on pretence, that belonging to the Emperor Napoleon "by right of conquest," it had been transferred to Prussia "in consideration of the cession of three of her provinces to France," viz. Anspach, Neufchatel, and Cleves.

The conduct of the Prussians, when they took possession of Hanover, in assuming to themselves the civil as well as military administration of the country, had excited a suspicion in the Hanoverian regency of their secret intentions, and occasioned a protest from Count Munster against this proceeding, as "contrary to the rights of his sovereign, and as a measure of which his majesty, so far from giving his consent to it, highly disapproved." No regard being had to this protest, nor to the remonstrance accompanying it, that "if the occupation of Hanover by a Prussian force was inevitable, it should take place under such stipulations as were least injurious to the rights of his majesty, and least severe upon the unhappy inhabitants," Mr. Fox took occasion to express, in an official note, March 17, to Baron Jacobi, the Prussian minister in London, "the great anxiety felt by his majesty, at the manner in which possession had been taken of the electorate of Hanover;" and to desire him explicitly to inform the court, "that no convenience of political arrangement, much less any offer of equivalent or indemnity would ever induce his majesty so far to forget what was due to his own legitimate rights, as well as to the exemplary fidelity and attachment of his Hanoverian subjects, as to consent to the alienations of the electorate." But this note, which at an earlier period might have deterred the court of Berlin from the violent and outrageous course on which it had entered, arrived too late to produce any change in its determinations. The three provinces were already given up to France, and engagements had been formed to execute the other articles of the treaty of Paris, from which the Prussian government durst not recede.

While the violent and unjustifiable proceedings of Prussia were directed solely against the electorate of Hanover, his Britannic majesty was advised by his ministers "to forbear all recourse to his British subjects" in support of his rights; and to content himself with "remonstrating; by amicable negociation, against the injury he had sustained, and resting his claim for reparation on the moderation of his conduct, on the justice of his representation, and on the common interest which Prussia, herself, must ultimately feel, to resist a system destructive of all legitimate possession. But when, instead of receiving assurances conformable to this just expectation, his majesty was informed, that the determination had been taken of excluding, by force, the vessels and commodities of Great Britain from ports and countries under the lawful dominion, or forcible controul of Prussia; it was impossible for his majesty longer to delay to act, without neglecting the first duty which he owed to his people. The dignity of his crown, and the interests of his subjects, equally forbad his acquiescing in this open and unprovoked aggression." No sooner, therefore, had intelligence reached London of the actual exclusion of British shipping from the Elbe, and of the determination of Prussia to shut all the ports of the German ocean against the British flag, than measures of retaliation were adopted.

Notice was given, on the 8th of April, to the ministers of neutral powers, that the necessary means had been taken for the blockade of the rivers Ems, Weser, Elbe, and Trave. A general embargo had been laid on all Prussian vessels in the harbours of Great Britain and Ireland, April 5; and this order was afterwards extended to all vessels belonging to the rivers Elbe, Weser, and Ems, vessels under the Danish flag only excepted, on the 16th. The English mission at Berlin was recalled; and a message from his majesty was presented to both houses of parliament, April 21, stating "the necessity in which his majesty found himself of withdrawing his minister from the court of Berlin, and of adopting provisional measures of just retaliation against the commerce and navigation of Prussia," on account of acts "of direct hostility deliberately pursued against him, which left him no alternative." After stating, concisely, the particulars of the conduct of Prussia, which called for these proceedings, the message concluded by saying, that his majesty "had no doubt of the full support of his parliament in vindicating the honor of the British flag and the freedom of the British navigation; and that he would look with anxious expectation to that moment when a more dignified and enlightened policy, on the part of Prussia, should remove every impediment to the renewal of peace and friendship, with a power with whom his majesty had no other cause of difference than that now created by these hostile acts."

This message having been taken into consideration by the two houses of parliament on the 23d of April, addresses of thanks were voted unanimously in return. Mr. Fox, in his speech, gave an historical account of the transactions which had led to the rupture with Prussia, and made some severe comments on the conduct of that power, which he described "as the union of every thing that was contemptible in servility, with every thing that was odious in rapacity." Other nations had been obliged to make cessions to France; but none of them had, like Prussia, been reduced to that lowest state of degradation, to consent to become the ministers of the injustice and rapacity of a master." In answer to the plea set up by Prussia, that "the Emperor Napoleon having obtained Hanover by right of conquest, the rightful possession of it had passed to Prussia," he observed, that "no example could be found in all the histories of war, and no mention had ever been made by the writers on the law of nations, of any power having a right to receive, as a present, a country occupied during a war by one of the belligerent powers, but not ceded by the other." After exposing the futility of this pretended right, Mr. Fox proceeded next to reprobate "the principle which had been lately adopted in Europe, of transferring the subjects of one prince to another, in the way of equivalents, and under the pretext of convenience and mutual accommodation. The wildest schemes," he remarked, "that were ever before broached, would not go so far to shake the foundations of all established government as this new practice. There must be, in every nation, a certain attachment of the people to its form of government, without which no nation can subsist. This principle, then, of transferring the subjects of one prince to another, strikes at the foundation of every government, and the existence of every nation." Mr. Fox concluded with stating, that "there could be no doubt but that the shutting the ports of Prussia to British vessels was alone most clearly and unquestionably an act of hostility against this country."

A declaration was also issued, April 20, by his majesty, in his capacity of Elector of Hanover, recapitulating instances of the perfidy, insincerity, and rapacity of the court of Berlin, and solemnly protesting, for himself and his heirs, against every encroachment on his rights to the electorate of Brunswick, Lunenburg, and its dependencies.

Prussia had so little expected prompt measures of retaliation on the part of England, that we find, after the ratification of the treaty of Paris, Count Hardenberg had given assurances to the merchants of Berlin that the navigation and property of Prussian subjects had nothing to apprehend from Great Britain. It had been said, that, though the Prussian government was compelled to issue an order for shutting its ports against the British flag, nothing was farther from the intentions of those who were friendly to the connection of Prussia with France, than to enforce this order, or carry it strictly into effect; but, that the execution of this part of the treaty of Paris belonging officially to ministers, who disapproved of the whole transaction, these persons determined to enforce it with the greatest rigour, for the purpose of bringing into discredit the political system of their opponents, by the losses and inconveniences to which, they foresaw, the exclusion of British shipping from their ports would necessarily lead; saying, in their own justification, that they were not made for half measures.—Whatever truth may be in these reports, it is certain, that soon after the hostile acts and declarations of England were known at Berlin, the Prussian government shewed a disposition to relax its system of excluding English trade and navigation from the north of Germany, by giving orders, May 14, at Stettin, Colberg, and its other ports in the Baltic, not to oppose the entrance of British ships, but, on the contrary, to receive them in the most friendly manner. On the same day an order of council was issued by Great Britain, for seizing and bringing to judgment, before the admiralty-courts, all vessels found navigating under Prussian colours; in consequence of which, that flag, lately so common upon the ocean, quickly disappeared, and gave place to Danish, Pappenberg, Kniphausen, and other neutral ensigns.

In addition to her war with England, the subserviency of Prussia to France involved her in hostilities with Sweden. The Swedish troops, who occupied Lunenburg for the King of England, having opposed the entrance of the Prussians into that duchy, were compelled, after a light resistance, to retreat into Mecklenburg, April 23; upon which the King of Sweden laid an embargo on all Prussian vessels in his harbours, April 27; and issued an order for the blockade of all the Prussian ports of the Baltic, May 6. It was supposed, that Prussia would take her revenge by expelling the Swedes from Pomerania; but, if she ever entertained such a design, she was prevented from carrying it into effect by a new revolution in her politics, which gave a totally different direction to her arms.

Bonaparte, it is thought, never thoroughly forgave the court of Berlin, for the danger to which he was exposed, by the vacillation and momentary change of its political system after the affair of Anspach; but while he stood in awe of its power, and had reason to fear the consequences of its hostility, he continued to be lavish of assurances of friendship, and flattered and amused its ministers with protestations of regard and professions of moderation. The journey which Haugwitz took to Paris, opened the eyes even of that minister to the sincerity and value of these declarations; but the first public act of the cabinet of St. Cloud which gave serious offence and alarm to the court of Berlin, was the investiture of Murat with the dutchies of Berg and Cleves, March 15. Berg had belonged to the King of Bavaria, as Count Palatine of the Rhine, and been ceded to France in exchange for the Prussian provinces of Anspach and Bayreuth in Franconia. Cleves, which had been already dismembered by the extension of the French empire to the banks of the Rhine, was one of the three provinces given up by Prussia for Hanover. Various speculations had been formed with regard to the destination of these provinces, when they fell into the hands of France, but the general sentiment in Germany was that of surprize and indignation, when they were given to Murat, a foreigner, a soldier of fortune, and the brother-in-law of Bonaparte. There seemed to be no end to the encroachments of France, nor reliance on her most solemn and reiterated declarations, that the Rhine should be the boundary of her empire. To Prussia, in particular, the establishment of Murat in the midst of her Westphalian provinces was far from being acceptable; and very soon she began to experience the inconvenience of such a neighbour. Possession was taken in his name of the abbeys of Werden, Essen, and Elten, on pretence that they belonged to the dutchy of Cleves, without respecting the prior occupation or claims of Prussia; and Wesel, though on the German side of the Rhine, was annexed to a French department, and strongly fortified.

But a deeper and more sensible injury awaited the Prussian government. While Laforest, the French resident at Berlin, was urging its ministers to persist in the measures they had adopted for retaining Hanover, Lucchesini discovered at Paris, that the French government had offered to the King of Great Britain the complete restitution of his electoral dominions. Thus, after the sacrifice of her honor and reputation, Prussia saw herself, on the eve of a general peace, about to be deprived of the reward for which she had consented to act a part so mean, treacherous, and unworthy, without an opportunity of retrieving her character or of bettering her condition by resistance. Fortunately, as she then thought, the negotiation for peace between France and Russia, after preliminaries had been signed at Paris, was broken off by the refusal of the court of St. Petersburg to ratify the treaty concluded by its negotiator. But this event, while it opened to Prussia the prospect of assistance, in case she should be driven to a war with France, disclosed to her farther proofs of the secret enmity of the cabinet of St. Cloud, and of its readiness to abandon her interests. She was informed by Russia, that during the negotiation at Paris, distinct hints had been given to the Russian negotiator, that if his court was desirous of annexing any part of Polish Prussia to its dominions, no opposition would be made to such a project on the part of France.

Two other causes contributed materially to the determination of Prussia to commence hostilities against France; the one, by its effect on the public mind; the other, on account of the injury done to herself.

The occupation of Cattaro by the Russians had served as a pretext to the French emperor, not only for retaining possession of Braunau, in the hereditary states of Austria, after the term stipulated for its surrender by the peace of Presburgh, but for keeping on foot an immense army in Germany, which he maintained at the expense of the free towns and states of Suabia and Franconia. The presence of so large an army on its frontiers excited the jealousy and awakened the fears of the Prussian government. To overawe Prussia, rather than to recover Cattaro, seemed to be the object of assembling so great a force in that quarter, and when troops were collected in Westphalia, that suspicion was converted into certainty. Complaints were addressed from every quarter to Berlin, of the severity of the French contributions, and of the insufferable burthen of supporting their armies. The barbarous murder of Palm, a bookseller, of Nuremberg, who was arrested in that imperial city by order of the French government, hurried to Braunau, and there tried and executed, August 26, under authority of a court-marshal, for an alleged libel on the French emperor, excited universal indignation, and roused every pen in Germany to call down vengeance on such atrocious, unwarrantable acts.

All eyes were turned to Prussia, imploring assistance and relief, while the bitterest reproaches were uttered against that selfish, temporizing policy, which had subjected Germany to such calamities and disgrace. The popular feeling at Berlin, in the court, in the army, among the burghers, was loudly and unequivocally expressed against the base, unprincipled policy of the government, since it had been directed by Haugwitz, Lombard, and other partizans of France. The surprize and indignation which the scandalous traffic of the Prussian provinces for Hanover had excited at first, subsequent events had not allayed. Every day had brought the news of some fresh encroachment on the part of France, of some new insult or mortification to Prussia. The young officers, inflamed with military ardour, were eager to distinguish themselves against the conquerors of Austria. The old generals, who recollected the glorious days of Frederic II. forgot their age and infirmities, as well as the immense changes since that time, both in France and Prussia, and joined in the cry for war. Prince Lewis of Prussia, who had, a few years before, been called the Prussian Duke of Orleans, took the lead in inspiring these sentiments, and diffusing them among the young men of his rank. The queen, young, beautiful, and amiable, listening with indignation to the atrocities, usurpations, and insults of France, and jealous of her husband's honor and reputation, joined in the same cause. The ministers, weak and unprincipled; hated and despised, were unable to resist the torrent which hurried the Prussian monarchy to destruction.

These ministers, as destitute of wisdom as of probity, as incapable of profiting by experience as of acting a fair or honorable part, had, in the mean time, been engaged in another criminal negotiation with Bonaparte, and had been again outwitted by his superior craft and artifice. The peace of Presburgh had left the forms of the Germanic constitution entire, and from some of the articles of that treaty it appears doubtful, whether the French emperor entertained thoughts at that time of the speedy subversion to which it was afterwards condemned. The residence of his troops in Germany, occasioned by the unlucky affair of Cattaro, probably suggested, and the prospect of peace with Russia certainly matured, a design suitable to his restless mind, of destroying what remained of that ancient structure, and of erecting in its room a new confederation of princes, at the head of which he should himself be placed. This project seems to have been already conceived in the beginning of June, and early in July the details of the plan were settled; but it was resolved not to publish them, in case peace could be obtained. On the 10th of that month the Russian plenipotentiary, D'Oubril, had his first conference with General Clarke, who was appointed to negotiate with him on the part of France. The true character of the Russian minister was soon discovered. No obstacle, it was foreseen, would be opposed by him to the new arrangements proposed in Germany. The plan of confederation was, therefore, definitively settled without delay, and signed on the 17th of July, by princes and ministers, who were scarce allowed time to read the deed to which they affixed their signatures.

The members of this confederation were the Emperor of the French, the Kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg, the Archbishop of Ratisbon, the Elector of Baden, the Duke of Berg, the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the Princes of Nassau-Weilburg, and Nassau-Usingen, of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, and Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, Salm-Salm, and Salm-Kyrburg, Isenburgh, Birchstein and Lichtenstein, the Duke of Aremburg, and the Count of Leyen. The Archduke Ferdinand, Grand Duke of Wurtzburg, (formerly Archduke of Tuscany, and afterwards Elector of Saltsburg,) acceded to the confederation of the Rhine on the 30th of September.

By their articles of confederacy, these princes separated themselves from the Germanic empire, and renounced all connection with it; appointed a diet to meet at Frankfort, to manage their public concerns, and settle their differences; chose the Emperor of the French for their protector; established among themselves a federal alliance, by which, if one of them engaged in a continental war, all the others were bound to take part in it; and fixed the contingent which each should in that case furnish, as follows: France, 200,000; Bavaria, 30,000; Wirtemberg, 12,000; Baden, 3,000; Berg, 5,000; Darmstadt, 4,000; Nassau, Hohenzollern, and others, 4,000; total, 258,000 men. It was settled, that none of the members of this confederacy should be dependent on any foreign power, nor enter into any service but that of the states of the confederation and their allies. No prince belonging to the confederacy could alienate the whole or any part of his dominions, but in favor of the confederates. Other German princes and states might be admitted into the confederacy, whenever it was found consistent with the general interest. In the mean time a vast number of petty princes and counts were deprived of the rights of sovereignty, which they held under the Germanic constitution, and these, without equivalent or indemnity, were transferred to members of the confederation. The imperial city of Nuremberg was given to the King of Bavaria, and that of Frankfort on the Maine to the Archbishop of Ratisbon, formerly elector and arch-chancellor of the empire, now prince primate of "the confederated states of the empire," or confederation of the Rhine.

By these great and important innovations, the Germanic empire was virtually dissolved, and many of its states were annexed, under the name of allies, to the rising empire of the French. Bonaparte was not content, however, while the name of the Germanic empire subsisted. No sooner were the preliminaries of peace signed between France and Russia, (July 20th,) than a message was conveyed from him to the Emperor of Germany, to signify to the latter, that he must prepare to lay aside the title of Emperor of Germany, and yield the precedence to France; and farther, that he must be ready to give his assent to the new arrangements to be proposed in a few days at Ratisbon. To this mandate the Emperor of Germany, since he could not resist the order, wisely submitted without remonstrance, and by a formal deed, August the 6th, resigned his office and title of Emperor of Germany, and annexed his German provinces and states to the empire of Austria. On the 1st of August the confederates announced to the diet at Ratisbon, their separation from the empire; and on the same day a note was presented to the diet, in the name of the French emperor, declaring that he no longer acknowledged the existence of the Germanic constitution.

When these arrangements were communicated to Prussia, her acquiescence was purchased by the delusive hope held out to her by France, of being permitted to form a confederation of states in the north of Germany under the protection of Prussia, as the confederation of the Rhine was under the protection of France. But no sooner had Austria submitted to the loss of her ancient imperial dignity; and deposited the sceptre of the Othos at the foot of the modern Charlemagne; than Prussia, whose meanness was despised, and assistance no longer wanted by Bonaparte, found herself condemned to another disappointment, aggravated by the reflection, that she was indebted for this mortification to the want of wisdom and probity in her councils. She was told, that from deference to England, Bonaparte could not permit her to include the Hanseatic towns in her confederacy, and that he was determined to take them under his own protection. He was not averse to her plan of a northern confederation; but his regard to justice and respect for the law of nations, would not allow him to see any compulsion used to make independent princes belong to it against their will. The wise prince, she was told, who governed Saxony, seemed not inclined to contract the new obligations which Prussia wished to impose upon him; and France could not see him enslaved, or forced to act against the interests of his people. The Elector of Hesse, another member of the proposed northern confederation, was reminded by the French minister at Cassel, of the inability of Prussia to do any thing for her allies. He was then invited to join the confederacy of the Rhine, and as an inducement to comply, the remaining possessions of the Prince of Orange, brother-in-law of the King of Prussia, were offered to be transferred to him.—And, when he refused these tempting proposals, the Rhenish confederation passed a resolution, by which he was cut off from access to part of his own states.

In the midst of these injuries and mortifications, Prussia discovered, that France, which had been continually urging her to the invasion of Swedish Pomerania, had engaged to Russia, to prevent her from depriving the King of Sweden of his German territories; and that after guaranteeing to her the possession of Hanover, her faithless ally had negotiated with England on the basis of the restoration of that electorate.

The reluctance of Prussia to part with Hanover, her indignation at the treacherous conduct of France, and the growing influence of public opinion upon her counsels, were the chief causes that stimulated her to risk the chances of hostility with France. About the middle of August, her government began to make preparations, and put her army on the war establishment. It was thought that Knobelsdorff was sent to Paris, in the beginning of September, for the purpose of gaining time, and not with any view to an amicable adjustment of the differences between Prussia and France. Lucchesini, who had been long the Prussian minister at Paris, when he foresaw that war between France and Prussia was inevitable, had contrived, that one of his dispatches to his court, full of complaints against the French government, should fall into their hands.—Incensed at the tone of his dispatch, the French demanded his recall from Paris, and imputed to his misrepresentations, the misunderstanding that had arisen between France and Prussia. With this demand, the court of Berlin willingly complied, and congratulated itself on the success of a stratagem, which, it hoped, had given a false direction to the suspicions of its enemy. To prolong the deceit, it made choice of General Knobelsdorff to be its minister at Paris, a warm partizan of France, sincerely attached to peace, and quite unsuspecting of the artifice which he was sent to practise. The professions of peace, which he made by desire of his court, after it had determined on hostilities, were on his part sincere; and so little was he aware of the secret designs, either of his own government or of that to which he was sent, that when Bonaparte left Paris to take the command of his army against Prussia, Knobelsdorff inquired, with the greatest simplicity, whether he should not accompany his majesty the emperor to headquarters, little suspecting against whom his march was directed.

Such a negotiator might be duped by his employers, but could not long deceive the penetration of Bonaparte and Talleyrand. Knobelsdorff arrived at Paris on the 7th of September, with a letter from his Prussian majesty to Bonaparte, full of civil and friendly expressions, to which corresponding returns, probably equally sincere, were made. On the 11th, a note was addressed to him by Talleyrand, complaining of warlike preparations in Prussia, which were publicly stated at Berlin to be directed against France; and adding, amidst professions of regard for Prussia, and of regret that she should listen to counsels so much at variance with her true interests, that the emperor had ordered reinforcements to be sent to his army. Knobelsdorff in reply, September 22, assured the French minister, that his master had entered into no concert with the enemies of France, and that the warlike preparations of Prussia had arisen from a misunderstanding, which the emperor's late interesting conversations with himself and Lucchesini, he had no doubt, would remove. On receiving these assurances, Bonaparte authorized his minister to declare, on the 13th, that he should make no public declaration on the subject of his differences with Prussia, till the effect of Knobelsdorff's report at Berlin was known.

A second communication from Talleyrand, complaining that the intelligence from Berlin wore every day a more hostile aspect, and expatiating on the natural ties between France and Prussia, war between which, he said, appeared to the emperor a political monstrosity, maintained for some time longer the appearance of a negotiation with a view to peace. But, in the meanwhile, the French troops were continually advancing towards the future scene of action, and on the 24th of September Bonaparte left his capital to take the command of his army, having three days before summoned the confederates of the Rhine to furnish their contingents.

On the first of October the mask, which Prussia had so ineffectually worn, was at length laid aside. A note was presented by Knobelsdorff, demanding, as a preliminary to negotiation, that the whole of the French troops should instantly repossess the Rhine; that no obstacle should be raised by France to the formation of a northern confederacy, including all the states not named in the fundamental act of the confederation of the Rhine; and that the basis of the negotiation should be the separation of Wesel from the French empire, and the re-occupation of the three abbeys by the Prussian troops. To these demands the French emperor did not even deign to answer. But Talleyrand, in a report on the causes of the war, (October 6,) availed himself of them with great dexterity, to shew, with some degree of plausibility, if not with perfect truth, that had France been willing to gratify the unjust ambition of Prussia at the expence of her weaker neighbours, the flames of war would not have been re-kindled on the continent. Prussia had indeed been as perfidious, as unprincipled in her ambition as France; but she had conducted herself with less ability and with less success. Her morality had been the same; but, after selling her honor and reputation, she had been defrauded of the price.

It was a great error of his Prussian majesty, when he determined upon war with France, to continue the same persons in his government who had directed his counsels during the whole of the late disgraceful proceedings. These persons had given abundant proofs of incapacity, in all the negotiations they had conducted; and such was their reputation, that they had no means of inspiring other governments with confidence in the sincerity of their professions, but by embarking their master, alone and unassisted, in a contest with Bonaparte. It was from Russia only, that Prussia could expect, in the first instance, to receive effectual aid. But, though a letter from his Prussian majesty had informed the Emperor of Russia, in the month of August, of the relations in which he then stood towards France, no intimation was given to Russia of the approaching war; nor was any measure taken for obtaining from her assistance, till the 18th of September, when Count Krusemack left Berlin for Petersburg, charged with such a commission. Krusemack arrived at Petersburg on the 30th.

Orders for marching, though expedited immediately after his arrival, could not reach the Russian army in Poland till the 5th or 6th of October, nor could that army arrive at the scene of action in Germany before the middle of November; so that Prussia voluntarily exposed herself for a whole month, without assistance, to resist the best army and the best generals of Europe.

With such men as Haugwitz, Lombard, and Beyme at the head of affairs, it ceased to be a matter of surprize, that no overtures of friendship or alliance had been proposed to the court of Vienna, nor even an attempt made to sound the intentions of that government, or to open with it a confidential intercourse. Of the minor powers in the north of Germany, Saxony was the unwilling ally of Prussia. Hesse, in expectation of a subsidy from England, affected neutrality. Mecklenburg was really neutral. The Swedish army had re-occupied the Duchy of Lauenberg, abandoned by the Prussians.

Scandalous as had been the conduct of Prussia towards England, and unwilling as she was still to give up Hanover, which she foresaw must be the price of any assistance from Great Britain, the desire and hope of a subsidy got the better of every consideration, and induced her ministers, when they sent Count Krusemack to Petersburg, to communicate to Mr. Thornton, the British minister at Hamburg, the disposition of his Prussian majesty to accommodate his differences with the King of Great Britain. A desire was expressed, that some person should be authorized by the English government to open a negotiation for that purpose; but no communication was made by the Prussian ministers of the nature of their differences with France, nor assurance given of their readiness to adopt for the basis of negotiation, the restitution of Hanover to its lawful owners. The English ministry, though they had reason to believe that the quarrel between France and Prussia originated in the offer of the former to give back Hanover to the King of Great Britain, hesitated not a moment to comply with their request, but appointed Lord Morpeth to proceed without delay to the head-quarters of the Prussian army, there to enter on negotiations for peace. Lord Morpeth left London the 1st of October, and having passed off Heligoland a packet with Baron Jacobi on-board, the late Prussian minister at London, who was returning in that capacity to England, he arrived at Hamburg on the 6th, and reached the head-quarters of the Prussian army at Weimar on the 12th. This promptitude did not suit the views of the Prussian ministry. They were on the eve of a great battle, which might decide the fate of the campaign; and they were unwilling, while the event was uncertain, to pledge themselves to an act of justice, or entangle themselves in connections of no immediate utility. If victory remained to the Prussians, Hanover might still be theirs. If defeated, they were afraid, lest their having contracted engagements with England might be prejudicial to them, should they be compelled to solicit peace from France. Persisting to the last in his duplicity and irresolution, Haugwitz, who had been named to negotiate with the English minister, contrived, by breaking his word, and by other disengenuous shifts, to avoid seeing him at Weimar and Erfurt; and, subsequently, to the battle of Auerstadt, but while the result of it was unknown, Lord Morpeth having asked Lucchesini whether the court of Prussia was ready to enter on immediate negotiation, the Italian unguardedly replied, "that it would depend on the issue of the battle which had just been fought."

The English ministry, when they appointed Lord Morpeth to negotiate with Prussia, gave further proof of the sincerity of their disposition to reconciliation, by removing the blockade of her ports and rivers, (September 25,) which had hitherto continued, with great inconvenience, to the north of Germany.

Position of the Prussian and French Armies.—Death of Prince Lewis.—Prussian Magazines seized by the French.—Battle of Auerstadt.—Loss of the Prussians.—Surrender of Erfurt.—Defeat of Kalkreuth and of the Prussian Reserve under Prince Eugene.—Armistice between France and Saxony.—Escape of the King of Prussia.—Bonaparte enters Berlin.—Capture of Prince Hohenlohe's Army.—Retreat of General Blucher to Lubeck.—Lubeck taken by Storm.—Surrender of Spandau, Stettin, Custrin, Magdeburg, Hameln, and Nieuburg.—Invasion of Westphalia.—Occupation of Hesse Cassel and Expulsion of the Elector.—Occupation of Hanover, Brunswick, and Mecklenburg.—Peace between France and Saxony.—Occupation of Hamburg.—Berlin Decree.—Armistice between France and Prussia.—Refused to be ratified by the King of Prussia.—French cross the Oder.—Arrival of the Russians at Warsaw.—Actions on the Narew and Wkra.—Defeat of the Russians.

EARLY in October the Prussian head-quarters were at Naumburg, where also their principal magazines were collected, and their army extended itself in the country bordering on the Saale in Upper Saxony. On the 4th of that month, their head-quarters were moved forward to Erfurt, and on the 10th to Weimar. The position of their army was nearly as follows: Their left, commanded by Prince Hohenlohe, under whom were General Tauenzin and Prince Lewis of Prussia, occupied Saalfeld, Schleitz, and Hof, and its advanced posts extended to Munchberg and Culmbach. Their centre, commanded by the Duke of Brunswick, Marshal Mollendorf, and the king in person, was distributed in the neighbourhood of Erfurt, Weimar, Gotha, and Eisenach, and its vanguard, under the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, was stationed at Meinungen on the Werra. Their right, commanded by General Ruchel, extended to Mulhausen. From this disposition of the Prussian army, it is probable, that had not the Duke of Brunswick been anticipated by the French, it was his intention to have begun hostilities by bearing down with his right on Frankfort, with his centre on Wurtzburg, and with his left on Bamberg. A separate corps under General Blucher, which had been stationed at Gottingen, for the protection of Westphalia, joined the main army before the battle. Hesse was neutral, but the Saxons acted as auxiliaries to the Prussians, and served in the left under Prince Hohenlohe. The reserve of the Prussian army, under Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg, did not arrive from Custrin till after the battle of Auerstadt. The whole force, Prussians and Saxons, under the command of the Duke of Brunswick, did not amount to less than 150,000 men.

While this immense army remained inactive on the banks of the Saale, the French were collecting their scattered troops, and concentrating their forces in the neighbourhood of Bamberg. On the 6th of October Bonaparte arrived in that city, and on the 8th, the French army was in motion to attack the Prussians.

The position of the Prussian army in front was strong, and perhaps impregnable. But a wise general, attentive to every danger to which his troops are exposed, should have reflected on the possibility of the enemy turning their flank: getting possession of their magazines: shutting them up in a country without resources; and forcing them to fight at a disadvantage, and, if worsted, without a possibility of escape. The magazines at Hof, Zwickau, Weissenfels, and Naumburg, were left without protection, exposed to the attacks of the enemy, and when cut off from these, the Prussians had no alternative but to fight or starve. There were no resources in the barren country of Weimar for maintaining so large an army and numerous cavalry as the Prussian. There was no bread, no beer, no brandy for their men, and no fodder for their horses. When their cavalry took the field on the morning of the battle of Auerstadt, the horses had been without corn, and the men without food for two nights and a day. Another fatal error in the disposition of the army was its encampment on the left bank of the Saale, by which the electorate of Saxony, the chief fortresses of the Prussian states, and the capital itself, were laid open to the enemy; and the Prussians, in case of a disaster, were cut off from Magdeburg, the only rallying point where they could assemble, or place of refuge where they could be in safety.

The French army advanced on the 8th, in three divisions. The right, composed of the corps of Marshals Soult and Ney, and of a division of Bavarians, set out from Amberg and Nuremberg, joined at Bayreuth; and from thence marched against Hof. The centre, commanded by the Grand Duke of Berg, the Prince of Ponte Corvo (Bernadotte), and Marshal Davoust, marched from Bamberg to Cronach, and from thence to Saalburg and Schleitz. The left, composed of the corps of Marshals Lasnes and Augereau, advanced from Schweinefurth upon Coburg, Graffenthal, and Saalfeld. By these movements the left wing of the Prussians, which stretched to a great distance from their centre, was exposed to the attack of the whole French army. Aware of their danger, the Prussians at Hof, who were at the extremity of the line, and in the greatest danger of being cut off, fell back upon Schleitz before the arrival of Marshal Soult. Some prisoners, however, were taken, and all the magazines at Hof fell into the hands of the enemy. Soult, followed by Ney, at the distance of half a day's march, pressed forward to Plauen, in Upper Saxony, where he arrived on the 10th. The French centre passed the Saale at Saalburg, after a slight resistance on the part of the Prussians, and advanced on the 9th to Schleitz, where a body of 10,000 Prussians was posted under the command of General Tauenzien. An action ensued, in which the Prussians were worsted with considerable loss, and next day the French advanced to Auma, and on the 11th to Gera, within half a day's march of Naumburg, where lay the great magazines of the Prussian army. The French left had equal success with the other divisions of their army. Lasnes entered Coburg on the 8th, and advanced to Graffenthal on the 9th. On the 10th he attacked at Saalfeld the advanced guard of Prince Hohenlohe, commanded by Prince Lewis of Prussia, and gained over it a signal victory. Prince Louis, to whose rashness and disobedience of orders in quitting his position at the bridge at Saalfeld, and advancing to attack the enemy, this misfortune was entirely to be attributed, fell in the action. The Prussians were completely routed, and lost 30 pieces of cannon, besides 600 men killed, 1,000 taken prisoners, and a great number wounded.

By the success of these operations, the French, after turning the Prussian left, became masters of their magazines, and placed themselves between their grand army and the cities of Berlin and Dresden. On the 12th, part of the French centre, under Marshal Davoust, entered Naumburg, and took possession of the Prussian magazines, which they set on fire. Their army now extended along the right bank of the Saale from Naumburg to Neustadt. Their first line was composed of the corps of Davoust, at Naumburg; of that of Lasnes, at Jena; and of that of Augereau, at Kahla. In the second line was the grand Duke of Berg, between Zeitz and Leipzig; the Prince of Ponte Corvo, at Zeitz; the emperor and Soult, at Jena; and Marshal Ney, at Neustadt.

The disasters of Schleitz and Saalfeld, and the unfortunate death of Prince Louis, when known at the Prussian head-quarters, produced universal consternation, though the extent and consequences of these calamities were far from being fully understood or foreseen. Fears were entertained, that the French, after breaking through and defeating their left, would advance to Dresden and take possession of Saxony. But so remiss were they in the most ordinary precautions, and so absurdly confident in the strength of their positions, that one of their patrols, sent out from head-quarters towards Naumburg to reconnoitre, returned without going to Naumburg, because when half way they met a traveller, who told them there were no news of the French at Naumburg. From this state of blind security they were roused by the blaze of their magazines on the night of the 12th, which at once disclosed to them the real intentions of the enemy, and shewed how successful he had been in accomplishing his designs. Nothing now remained for them but to risk a general engagement without delay.

Next day was employed, on both sides, in making arrangements for the important battle decisive of the fate of Prussia. The French army extended from Naumburg to Kahla, along the Saale, a line of six hours march, its centre being at Jena. The Prussians, who had been collecting the whole of their forces into one point, were assembled between Auerstadt, Weimar, and Jena. The two armies were separated by the heights of the Saale, which seemed to afford an impregnable position to the Prussians, and to oppose an insuperable barrier to the French. But, by some incredible oversight, the Prussian generals, satisfied with guarding the high road between Jena and Weimar, left the most important passes of the Saale unoccupied. Of this omission the French failed not to avail themselves. During the whole of the night of the 13th, they were indefatigably employed in securing these passes, and transporting cannon to defend them; in which they were so successful, that, when day broke, the Prussians saw themselves attacked in their elevated position, which they had considered as an impregnable fortress; and so unsuspecting were they to the last moment of their danger, that at Rauthal, the French, who had penetrated by the neglected pass of Swetzen, arrived within 300 paces of one of their columns before its approach was suspected.

At break of day the whole of the French army was under arms. The light troops of the centre began the action by opening a brisk fire on the Prussians, which drove them from their advanced positions, and enabled the French line to extend itself on the plain, and draw up in order of battle. The Prussian left, amounting to about 50,000 men, were dispatched early in the morning towards Naumburg, to take possession of the impregnable defiles of Koesen; but these were already occupied by Davoust, whom they attacked eleven times successively, but in vain attempted to dislodge. Their centre, consisting of 80,000 men, was opposed to the French centre at Jena; and these were the only two divisions of their army engaged in the heat of the action. Their right, under General Ruchel, amounting to 12,000 men, did not come up till their centre was broken and thrown into disorder; and their rear-guard, (formerly their vanguard,) commanded by the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, was still at Meinungen, thirty miles distant from the field of battle.

A thick fog obscured the early part of the day, and when it cleared up, the two armies beheld each other at the distance of less than a cannon-shot. Some French battalions took possession of a small village, from which the Prussians attempted to dislodge them. Lasnes advanced to support his countrymen, and Soult to get possession of a wood upon his right occupied by the enemy. Another body of Prussians having made a movement upon the French left, Augereau put his troops in motion to repulse them. In less than an hour the action became general. Two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand men, with seven or eight hundred pieces of artillery, scattered death in every direction, and exhibited one of the most awful scenes ever beheld. The Prussian infantry behaved with courage and firmness; but their cavalry, worn out, fatigued, and disheartened, maintained not its ancient reputation. The French cavalry charged with the greatest spirit and boldness; and their artillery performed wonders. The most courageous soldiers could not approach, without trembling, the shower of balls that preceded the march of their columns. Both armies manœuvred with the same exactness as on a field-day, but the rapidity of the French evolutions astonished and disconcerted the Prussians.

Soult having got possession of the wood, after a combat of two hours, pressed forward; and, at the same instant, the French reserve, both cavalry and infantry, advanced to the front line, which, being thus strengthened, threw the Prussians into disorder, and forced them to retire. They rallied, however, and returned to the action, which they maintained for about an hour; but they were again thrown into confusion by the advance of the second French reserve, composed of the dragoons and cuirassiers under the command of the grand Duke of Berg. The charge of this body of horse, at the conclusion of the day, was irresistible. Neither cavalry nor infantry could withstand the shock. In vain did the Prussians form themselves into square battalions: their ranks were broken; artillery, cavalry, infantry, all were put to rout. The French reached Weimar as soon as their fugitive enemies.

While the Prussian centre and right were thus completely defeated, their left, repulsed by Davoust in its repeated attempts to drive him from the defiles of Koesen, was forced, after a combat of several hours, to fall back upon Weimar, at the moment when the broken corps, which had reached that city, were attempting to retreat in the direction of Naumburg. The confusion arising from these opposing currents may be easily imagined; in addition to which, the innumerable baggage-waggons that blocked up all the roads leading to Erfurt, impeded the retreat of the troops, and compelled them to consult their immediate safety by a precipitate flight. The king himself was forced to quit the high-road, and, at the head of a small body of cavalry, to escape from this scene of disorder across the fields.

According to the French accounts, more than 20,000 Prussians were killed or wounded in this disastrous action, and from 30,000 to 40,000 taken prisoners. The Duke of Brunswick was wounded in the face, by a grape-shot, in the beginning of the action, in consequence of which he was obliged to quit the field. He was transported in a litter to Brunswick, where he arrived on the 21st. But the approach of the French, whose enmity he in vain attempted to soften, having compelled him to seek a more distant asylum, he was carried to Altona, where he died of his wounds on the 10th of November, in the 72d year of his age. Lieutenant-general Schmettaw was mortally wounded. Above twenty generals and lieutenant-generals were made prisoners, and 300 pieces of cannon and 60 standards were taken.

The loss of the French was stated, in their official reports, at 1,100 killed, and 3,000 wounded. None of their officers above the rank of a brigadier-general was either killed or wounded.

Many were the errors of the Prussian generals in this engagement. The most fatal was their omitting, on the 13th, to possess themselves of the impregnable heights and defiles of Koesen; their neglecting to have any corps in reserve to support their battalions against the double reserve of the French; their leaving the Duke of Saxe-Weimar with 16,000 men at Meiningen, where he remained till next day, unacquainted with what had passed; the absence of all concert and co-operation between the two divisions of their army principally engaged; and the unprepared state in which they were found by the enemy when the action began. After the Duke of Brunswick was carried off the field, there was no commander-in-chief to issue general orders to the army. The corps fought singly, without plan or combination, or attention to the movements of the enemy. When the action was lost, the troops who escaped from the field of battle fled in different directions, and, ultimately, were all taken prisoners or dispersed, because no rallying point to retreat upon had been settled, in case such a disaster should befall them.

A considerable body of Prussians, under Marshal Mollendorf and the Prince of Orange Fulda, made good their retreat to Erfurt; but next morning they were invested in that place by the grand Duke of Berg; and on the following day they surrendered by capitulation. The prisoners taken at Erfurt amounted to 14,000 men, among whom, besides Mollendorf and the Prince of Orange, were many other officers of distinction. A park of 120 pieces of cannon, with all the requisite implements and ammunition, and magazines of great value, fell, at the same time, into the hands of the French. Mollendorf, when taken prisoner, was dangerously ill of his wounds. A marked degree of attention was shewn to him by the French, as one who had done all that lay in his power to prevent the breaking out of hostilities; while the Duke of Brunswick and others, whom they denominated of the war-faction, were treated with extreme rigour when they had the misfortune to fall into their hands, or were reduced to the necessity of soliciting their clemency and indulgence.

Another division of the Prussian army, under General Kalkreuth, attempted to escape in a body over the Hertz mountains, but was overtaken at the village of Greusen, and defeated with loss. Magdeburg was the quarter to which the fugitive columns of the Prussians chiefly directed their flight: and Prince Hohenlohe, though wounded, having reached that fortress, a considerable army was collected there under his standard. The garrison of Magdeburg amounted to 12,000 men; but the place was ill adapted for sustaining a siege or maintaining an army; its magazines having been emptied, with a fatal improvidence, to supply the grand army when it took the field. Marshals Ney and Soult, and the grand Duke of Berg, followed the Prussians in their flight to the walls of Magdeburg; and, in the total confusion and disorder into which they were thrown, made a number of prisoners, and got possession of a great part of their artillery, baggage, and ammunition.

On the other side of Weimar, Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg, who was advancing with the Prussian reserve from Custring, instead of falling back on the news of the battle, continued his march to Halle, where he was attacked by the Prince of Ponte-Corvo, October 17, and defeated with considerable loss. In this engagement, which destroyed the last entire corps of the Prussian army, the French took 5,000 prisoners and 34 pieces of cannon. The Prussians, in their retreat, burned the bridge at Dessau over the Elbe; but it was quickly re-established by the French. An attempt was also made to destroy the bridge at Wittenberg, which the French arrived in time to prevent.

Previously to the battle of Auerstadt, October the 11th, a proclamation had been issued by Bonaparte, addressed to the Saxons in the Prussian army, with the view of detaching them from, or at least of rendering them suspected to, their allies; and, immediately after the battle, 6,000 Saxon prisoners, who had been taken in the action, were set at liberty on giving their parole not to serve against the French; whose sole object, they were assured, in taking up arms, had been to preserve the independence of the Saxon nation, and to prevent it from being incorporated with the Prussian monarchy. These measures were accompanied by a friendly message to the elector at Dresden, in consequence of which that prince, who had been preparing to fly from his capital, remained there, withdrew from his connection with Prussia, and soon after concluded a treaty of peace and alliance with France. Heavy contributions were, nevertheless, imposed on the electorate for the support of the French army; and the city of Leipzig, which had been long a place of deposit for English merchandize, was occupied, without delay, by a French column under General Macon, October 18, whose rigorous search for English goods and property in that city was less remarkable than his anticipation of the famous Berlin decree, in his declaration to the merchants of Leipzig, that the island of Great Britain was in a state of blockade.

The unfortunate King of Prussia, who had behaved with great gallantry in the battle of Auerstadt, arrived at Charlottenberg, near Berlin, on the 17th, and from thence continued his route to Custrin on the Oder. From Custrin, he soon after repaired to Osterode in West Prussia, and from Osterode to Königsberg, where he remained at the end of the year, without having again joined the army. He was followed to Custrin by the garrison of Berlin, which was withdrawn from that city on the 21st, and a provisional administration appointed to maintain the public tranquillity till the arrival of the French. This last event was not long delayed. On the morning of the 25th the corps of Marshal Davoust entered Berlin, and was next day followed by that of Augereau.

Bonaparte had arrived on the 24th at Potsdam, where he stopped to examine the apartment and visit the tomb of the great Frederick. He ordered the sword of that great man, his scarf, the ribbon of his order, the black eagle, and all the colours he took in the seven years war, to be sent to the Hotel of the Invalids at Paris, as a present to the old soldiers who had served in the Hanoverian war, and as a memorial of one of the greatest generals recorded in history. He had already seized an opportunity of gratifying the long wounded vanity of his countrymen, by taking down the monument erected in commemoration of the battle of Rosbach, and ordering it to be conveyed to Paris, as a proof that the disgrace which that day had brought on the French arms was at length effaced. At Potsdam he was informed that Spandau had surrendered, though held by a strong garrison, and amply provided with stores and ammunition.

On the 27th, Bonaparte made his public entry into Berlin; and next day he gave audience to the foreign ministers of powers in amity with France, resident in that city; to the Lutheran and reformed consistories, whom he assured of his protection; to the members of the court of appeals, to whom he gave instructions how to administer justice, and to the civil authorities of the city, to whom he recommended strongly to maintain a vigilant police. "I will not suffer any windows to be broken," said he: "my brother the King of Prussia ceased to be a king from the day when Prince Lewis Ferdinand was bold enough to break the windows of his majesty's ministers: his majesty should have ordered him to be hanged." Some of the persons who presented themselves before him, on this and other occasions, were received with bitter taunts and studied mortifications, on account of the share which they or their relations were supposed to have had in lighting up the flames of war; but no one was forbid his presence, except Prince Hatzfeldt, head of the provisional government of Berlin. That nobleman, accused of acting as a spy for Prince Hohenlohe, and of sending him intelligence from Berlin of the military movements of the French, was, a few moments afterwards, arrested and delivered over to a military tribunal, by which he would have been inevitably condemned to death, and, in a few hours executed, but for the intercession of his wife, the daughter of the minister Schulenburg, whose grief and despair extorted his pardon from Bonaparte.

While these scenes were acted at Berlin, the wreck of the Prussian army, collected at Magdeburg under Prince Hohenlohe, was making an unsuccessful attempt to gain the banks of the Oder. With a force of near 40,000 men, but disheartened and dispirited, including the whole of the Prussian guards who had escaped from the battle of Auerstadt, that general set out from Magdeburgh for Stettin, after sending forward detachments of cavalry, to destroy the bridges over which the French must pass to intercept his march. He proceeded without interruption to Zehdenick, on the river Hevel. But, at that place, the advanced guard of his army, consisting of 6,000 cavalry, was attacked by the grand Duke of Berg, and Generals Lasalle and Grouchy, with a body of light cavalry and dragoons. A hot action ensued, in which the Prussians were worsted, with the loss of 300 killed and 700 wounded.

After this affair, the French generals, who had no infantry to support them, pushed forward to Templin, which lay in the line of the Prince of Hohenlohe's march, in order to stop his progress till their infantry under Marshal Lasnes should come up. But the Prussian general, by making a detour through Furstenberg, avoided Templin, and reached Boitzenberg, without having been again compelled to fight. Near Boitzenberg another action ensued, in which 500 of the Prussian gendarmes were made prisoners.

A second detour by Schoenermark became necessary, in order to reach Prenzlau, where the army hoped to find bread and forage, of which it stood much in need. But no sooner had the Prussians reached the heights of Prenzlau, than the French shewed themselves on their right. An engagement immediately ensued, in which the superior numbers and artillery of the latter compelled the former to retreat with precipitation into the town. All hope of reaching Stettin was now extinguished. That city was seven German miles from Prenzlau. The Prussians were without bread or forage, and almost without ammunition. The French were preparing to renew the attack, and reinforcements were every instant coming up to join them. In this deplorable situation, Prince Hohenlohe saw no resource, but to accept the terms of capitulation offered to him, and accordingly, surrendered with the whole forces under his command, amounting to about 17,000 men. This misfortune happened on the 28th, and next day a body of 6,000 men, belonging to his army, which had pushed forward by another route to Paserwalk, was forced also to surrender. There appears to have been no fault of Prince Hohenlohe in this unfortunate retreat, unless it be true, as the French insinuated, that he lost two days unnecessarily at Magdeburg.

The rear of Prince Hohenlohe's army, commanded by General Blücher, had reached Boitzenberg, and was preparing to set out for Prenzlau on the morning of the 29th, when intelligence arrived of the surrender of the main body of the army on the preceding evening. Blücher immediately resolved to change his route, and direct his course towards Strelitz, in the hope of meeting with the corps commanded by the Duke of Weimar, which had not been engaged in the battle of Auerstadt, and had since been attempting to cross the Elbe. His own corps was 10,500 strong, and consisted of the Prussian reserve, which after its defeat at Halle, had been taken from Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg, and placed under his command by Prince Hohenlohe. On the 30th, Blücher had the good fortune to join, in the neighbourhood of Strelitz, the Duke of Weimar's corps, of 10,000 men, which, after passing the Elbe at Havelberg, had reached Strelitz by the way of Rhinsberg, after falling in with a third corps, commanded by the Duke of Brunswick Oels; but, together with this fortunate occurrence, he received the unwelcome news that Soult had also crossed the Elbe, and was between him and that river with his army.

Having taken the command of these three corps, Blücher resolved on making an attempt to pass the Elbe at Lauenburg, in order to reinforce the Prussian garrisons in Lower Saxony, and with that view directed his march through Mecklenburgh to the Lake of Schwerin, where he arrived on the 3d of November. In this march he was hotly pursued by the French, and several sharp actions took place, particularly at Wahren, and in the village of Fahre, near the Lake of Schwerin. The French corps, commanded by the Prince of Ponte Corvo, pressed upon his rear; that of Soult on his left intercepted his communication with the Elbe, and frustrated his design of crossing that river at Lauenburg; while a third division, under the Grand Duke of Berg, advancing on his right, along the skirts of Swedish Pomerania, took prisoners some of his straggling columns, and prevented him from seeking refuge with his army under the walls of Stralsund. Hemmed in on all sides, he had no alternative but to throw himself into Lubeck, or with troops exhausted by hunger and fatigue, to risk an engagement with an enemy greatly his superior in numbers. In Lubeck he hoped to enjoy some repose, and refresh his men after the severe fatigues they had undergone. But his indefatigable enemy was at hand. One of the gates of Lubeck was forced, and a combat ensued in the streets and squares of that city, in which the Prussians were worsted, and many corps of their army cut literally in pieces, besides 4,000 made prisoners.

The unfortunate citizens of Lubeck, who had no concern in the quarrel of which they became the victims, suffered all the horrors incident to a place taken by a storm, and were abandoned for some hours to the lust, cruelty, and rapacity of the conquerors. Blücher made good his retreat from this scene of horror and devastation, and reached the frontiers of Danish Holstein with the small remains of his army; but less able than ever to hazard an engagement with the French, and not daring to violate the neutrality of the Danish territory, he was there forced to surrender. The dismal affair of Lubeck took place on the 6th of November, and on the following day Blücher surrendered at Swartau with his army, which was now reduced to less than 10,000 men. A body of 1,600 Swedes, on their way home from Lauenburg, who had been detained by contrary winds at the mouth of the Trave, were also compelled to lay down their arms.

The surrender of the army under General Blücher left no corps of Prussians in the field upon the German side of the Oder; and his obstinate and skilful resistance, as it was the most glorious, so it was the last of their exertions to avert the total ruin and downfall of their monarchy. Their fortified places seemed emulous which should first open its gates to the enemy, and those which were best supplied with the means of defence, were commonly the first to surrender. When Spandau capitulated, October 24, the French observed, that, well defended, it might have sustained a siege of two months after the trenches had been opened.

Stettin surrendered on capitulation to the first column of French troops which appeared before it, October 29, who found, to their surprise, that it contained a garrison of 6,000 fine looking troops, 160 pieces of cannon, and abundant magazines of all sorts.

Custrin, a place of considerable strength, and of great importance on account of its situation upon the Oder, surrendered to Marshal Davoust as soon as it was invested and summoned, November 1, though its garrison consisted of 4,000 men, amply provided with magazines.

Magdeburg, the bulwark of the Prussian monarchy on its western frontier, capitulated to Marshal Ney, November 8, after a few bombs

CHAP. IV.

In Magdeburg were found 22,000 troops, including 2,000 artillery men; and in Hameln there was a Prussian garrison of 9,000 men, with six months provisions, and stores and ammunition of every kind. The French general, to whom the place was given up, had no forces with him, except two Dutch regiments and a single regiment of French light infantry. Never were the effects of panic terror more visible or more fatal than in these occurrences. The battle of Auerstadt had deprived the Prussians of all courage and confidence, and seemed even to have bereft them of understanding.

While the grand French army was proceeding in this uninterrupted course of victory and success, an inferior army, assembled at Wesel under the command of Louis Bonaparte, the newly created King of Holland, overran the Prussian provinces of Westphalia, and penetrated into the electorate of Hanover; and a still smaller corps, under General Daendels, took possession of Emden and East Friesland. At Munster and other places, valuable magazines fell into the hands of the invaders; and no resistance was any where made to them. Hameln was given up to General Savory in the manner already related, and Nienberg, the last place of the electorate held by the Prussians, capitulated, November 25. The surrender of Plasenberga, a small fortress in the territory of Bayreuth, completed the conquest of the Prussian fortresses in Germany to the west of the Oder.

In the meantime Marshal Mortier, who had formerly commanded in Hanover, after taking possession of Fulda in the name of his sovereign, made a sudden irruption into Hesse, and expelled the elector from his capital and dominions. The pretences for this violence, were the ancient treaties of subsidy and alliance between Hesse and England, and certain acts of the present elector and of the hereditary prince before the battle of Auerstadt, inconsistent with the neutrality which they professed. The fortresses of Hanau and Marburg were ordered to be destroyed; the magazines and arsenals to be removed; the Hessian troops to be disarmed and disbanded; and the sovereign arms of Hesse Cassel to be every where taken down. Resistance to these orders, which must have been fruitless, was not attempted by the elector. The Hessian troops suffered themselves to be disarmed, and part of them engaged in the service of France. But, though possession was thus peaceably obtained of Hesse, such was the severity of the contributions and other vexations imposed on the inhabitants, and such their dread of the French conscription being introduced among them, that towards the close of 1806, the country people flew to arms against their oppressors, and joined by the disbanded Hessian soldiers, surprised and defeated some French detachments quartered in the villages. Similar insurrections broke out at Lingen, in Westphalia, and at Bayreuth and other places. But these disturbances, though harassing and alarming to the French, then engaged in carrying on war in the heart of Poland, were suppressed without difficulty, and the authors of them punished and disarmed.

While the Elector of Hesse was thus expelled from his dominions, the Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin was exposed to the same fate, November 27, because he was related to the Emperor of Russia, and because the Russians had taken possession of Moldavia and Wallachia. As in these instances the princes, thus despoiled of their territories, had observed the strictest neutrality in the late hostilities, it was natural that the houses of Brunswick, Lunenburg and Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, which had taken an active part in the war, should be deprived of their states by the same authority. Within ten days after the battle of Auerstadt the house of Brunswick was declared to have lost the sovereignty of its ancestors, October 25, and soon after the occupation of Hesse, Mortier marched into Hanover, and took formal possession of the electorate, November 14. Of all the princes of Germany, who had joined with Prussia in the war, none were treated with clemency or indulgence by the French emperor, except the Elector of Saxony and the princes of the house of Saxe. By a treaty signed at Posen, on the 11th of December, the elector was declared King of Saxony, and he and the other princes of the house of Saxe were admitted into the confederation of the Rhine, and received under that denomination among the new vassals of the French empire. The Dukes of Saxe Weimar and Saxe Gotha were in the number of princes who consented to hold their dominions upon these terms.

From Hesse and Hanover, Mortier proceeded to Hamburg, which he entered without opposition on the 19th of November, and next day he issued an order for the sequestration of all English produce and manufactures found in the city, whether belonging to English subjects or to other persons. Statements were demanded from the merchants and bankers, of the English manufactures or funds arising from the sale of English manufactures in their possession; domiciliary visits were threatened to enforce compliance; and those who gave false returns were menaced with summary punishment by martial-law. To strike greater terror, the English merchants at Hamburg were put under arrest, and though afterwards released on their parole, they were placed under a guard of soldiers, and threatened to be sent to Verdun. These acts of violence brought less profit to the French than they did harm to the Hamburgers. The trade of Hamburg was annihilated, while the amount of English property and manufactures confiscated was inconsiderable. Before the armed force sent to Cuxhaven to stop the English vessels at the mouth of the river, arrived at that place, the merchantmen, apprised of their danger, had made their escape. The seizure of Hamburg had been long foreseen, and though the French minister in that city persisted to the last in his declarations that its neutrality would be respected, little credit had been given to his assurances. The fate of Leipzig had been a warning to the merchants of Hamburg. No exertions had been spared by the factors and commercial agents of the English, in disposing of their goods, and winding up their concerns before the arrival of Mortier and his army; so that, after all, the most valuable prize from this expedition proved to be the corn found in the magazines of Hamburg, great quantities of which were sent to Berlin, where apprehensions of famine began to be entertained.

This new system of warfare, the French emperor, intoxicated with success, promulgated at Berlin on the 20th of November, in a decree interdicting all commerce and correspondence, direct or indirect, between the British dominions and the countries subject to his control. By this decree the British islands were declared to be in a state of blockade; all subjects of England found in countries occupied by French troops were declared prisoners of war, and all English property was declared lawful prize; all letters addressed to Englishmen, or written in the English language, were ordered to be stopped; all commerce in English produce and manufactures was prohibited; and all vessels touching at England, or any English colony, were excluded from every harbour under the control of France. The pretext for these infringements of the law and practice of civilized nations was founded, partly, on the extension given by England to the right of blockade, and partly on the difference in the laws of war by sea and by land. By land the property of an enemy is not considered lawful prize, unless it belongs to the hostile state. By sea the property of unarmed, peaceable merchants is liable to capture and confiscation. By land no one is considered a prisoner of war who is not taken with arms in his hands. By sea the crews of merchantmen are considered prisoners of war equally with the crews of armed vessels. For these reasons the French emperor declared, that the regulations of the decree, which he now promulgated, "should be regarded as a fundamental law of the French empire, till England recognized the law of war to be one and the same by sea and by land, and in no case applicable to private property or to individuals not bearing arms; and till she consented to restrict the right of blockade to fortified places actually invested by a sufficient force."

Those parts of the decree which prohibited all commerce in English produce or manufactures, filled the commercial cities of the continent with dismay, as a measure fatal to their prosperity. Deputations were sent to Bonaparte from Hamburg, and from Nantes, Bourdeaux, and other cities of France, to solicit, upon this head, some relaxation of a decree, not less injurious to his own subjects than to the English. But his answers were stern and uncomplying. When told by the merchants of Hamburg, that "these measures would involve them in universal bankruptcy, and banish commerce from the continent," his reply was "so much the better; the bankruptcies in England will be more numerous, and you will be less able to trade with her. England must be humbled, though the fourth century should be revived, commerce extinguished, and no interchange of commodities left but by barter." But notwithstanding these alarming appearances, this decree soon became perfectly harmless and inoperative. Some slight and temporary embarrassments in commerce were experienced from it at first; but, in a short time, though formally extended to Holland and other countries under the control of France, its existence was only known by the bribes given to generals of division and custom-house officers for omitting to enforce it, and by the occasional confiscation of some unfortunate vessel which had neglected that necessary precaution.

Immediately after the battle of Auerstadt, the King of Prussia had applied to Bonaparte for an armistice, and though his request of a cessation of hostilities was refused, he was encouraged to send a plenipotentiary to the French head-quarters to negotiate peace. Lucchesini was accordingly dispatched thither without delay, and arriving there on the 22d of October, Duroc was named on the part of the French emperor to negotiate with him. At first the Prussian minister was amused with hopes of concluding a peace on the terms which he was authorized to offer; but as the situation of his sovereign became every day more desperate, by the capture of his armies and surrender of his fortified places, the demands of the French rose in proportion; and, at length, the Emperor Napoleon explicitly declared, November 10, that he would never quit Berlin, nor evacuate Poland, till Moldavia and Wallachia were yielded by the Russians in complete sovereignty to the Porte, and till a general peace was concluded on the basis of the restitution of all the Spanish, French, and Dutch colonies and possessions taken by Great Britain during the war. With this declaration all hopes of peace vanished, instead of which an armistice was now proposed by the French, and after much fruitless negotiation concluded by Lucchesini, November 16, on terms so disadvantageous to his master, as well as impossible for him to execute, that reduced as his circumstances were, he refused, on the 22d, to ratify it. To justify him in this determination it is sufficient to mention, that he was made to purchase by this convention a suspension of military operations, without any hope of peace, and with a reservation to France of a right to renew hostilities after ten days notice, by surrendering Dantzic, Graudenz, Colberg, Breslau, or, in one word, almost all the fortified places in his possession, besides engaging, what he could not perform, to prevent the entrance of the Russian troops into his dominions. Desperate as was the chance of war, it was better than submission to such conditions.

While this negotiation was going on, the French were prosecuting the war with unremitted activity. Two corps of their army crossed the Oder early in November; the one under the command of Marshal Davoust entered Posen on the 10th; and the other, consisting of the troops of Wirtemberg and Bavaria, with Jerome Bonaparte at their head, undertook the conquest of Silesia, where victory seemed easy and sure, as there was no army to contend with, and the fortified places were destitute of the means of defence. But the panic, which had delivered up so many Prussian fortresses without resistance, had begun to subside. Great Glogaw, the capital of lower Silesia, though invested on the 8th, and defended by a garrison of only 2,500 men, held out till the 29th; and Breslau, though bombarded for more than three weeks, did not surrender till the 5th of January, 1807. Repeated sallies were made by the garrison, and the besiegers were repulsed with loss in an attempt to storm some of the works. Nothing could exceed the gallantry and firmness of the inhabitants during the bombardment, though the town was set on fire in different places, and many persons were killed, and many houses and churches destroyed. An attempt was made to raise the siege by the Prince of Anhalt Pless; but his army, drawn from the garrisons in Upper Silesia, after being repeatedly defeated, was at length dispersed. This disaster extinguishing all hopes of relief, Breslau surrendered by capitulation.

As the attempts of the French emperor to excite insurrection in Poland were attended with little effect, and failed ultimately of success, it will be unnecessary to enter at length into the measures taken by his emissaries for that purpose, or to make extracts of their speeches and proclamations. Dombrowski, a Polish exile in the French service, was the chief actor in this scene, and even the celebrated Kosciuszko was brought again upon the stage. Some little sensation was produced in South Prussia, where the French armies were in force, and where the nobles were discontented with the Prussian government, for interfering with their privileges, and abridging their ancient authority over their serfs. But even in this part of the country, none of the great nobles joined the French, or showed a disposition to profit by their flattering offers of raising Poland again to her former rank among nations, and avenging her of her now humbled oppressors. In Russian Poland all classes were reconciled to their chains, and the nobles in particular, delighted with the splendour and consideration they enjoyed at Petersburg, had lost all recollection of the republic of Poland and liberum veto of their ancestors, as completely as those who now summoned them to freedom had forgotten the rights of man and republic one and indivisible.

The Russian troops, advancing to assist the Prussians, reached Warsaw before the French, and having taken possession of that city with a view to maintain it against the enemy, they sent forward a detachment to Lowicz, to defend the passage of the river Bzura. But this corps was attacked on the 27th of November by the advanced guard of the Grand Duke of Berg's division, and driven back with loss to Blonie. General Benningsen, who commanded the Russian army, having, in the mean time, received more accurate information of the French force marching against him, determined to abandon Warsaw and repossess the Vistula with his troops, and not content with this retrograde movement, he continued his retreat beyond the Narew. The French entered Warsaw on the 28th and 29th, and applied themselves, immediately, with the greatest industry, to fortify the suburb of Prag on the opposite side of the river, and to re-establish the wooden bridge over the Vistula, which the Russians had burned in their retreat. The same military precautions were taken at Thorn, by Marshal Ney, and at Zakroczym by Marshal Augereau. At both places bridges were thrown over the Vistula, protected by formidable works, which at once facilitated the return of the army, and secured, if necessary, its retreat. In addition to these measures of precaution, the fortresses of Custrin, Stettin, Spandau, Wittenberg, Erfurt, and Magdeburg were placed in the best possible state of defence, and strongly garrisoned, forming a chain of posts between the French army in Poland and the heart of Germany. And, besides compelling the confederates of the Rhine to furnish their full contingents to the army, a message was sent from Berlin to the French senate, before the departure of the emperor to Poland, desiring that the conscripts of 1807, who by law could not be called out to serve till the following September, might be placed at his disposal on the 1st of January, 1807. This prudence and caution, worthy of an experienced general, and most suitable to the circumstances and wary character of Bonaparte, appeared to the Russians the result of fear and apprehension; and this conceit filled them with a barbarous exultation and stupid confidence in their arms. That such should have been the impression on the Russians, who know no tactics but marching straight forward to battle, and have no resource after battle but victory, does not in the least surprise us; but that the same opinion should ever have prevailed elsewhere, does indeed fill us with astonishment; we cannot, however, forget, that for a short period there were men of understanding who seriously believed, that the conqueror of Austria and Prussia was afraid of the half-civilized, half-disciplined savages of the north.

The Russian general, Benningsen, having formed a junction behind the Narew with the second division of the Russian army, under the command of Buxhoevden, and further reinforcements having arrived with Kamenskoy, who had been appointed by the court of St. Petersburg commander-in-chief of the army, the Russians began again to advance, and fixing their head-quarters at Pultusk, threatened to drive the French over the Vistula. But while they were anticipating triumphs, and celebrating, with fire-works, at Sierock, the junction of their three armies, a small French detachment passed, in the night, over the Narew, and before morning had entrenched itself so strongly, that the Russians could not afterwards dislodge it. A bridge, similar to those thrown over the Vistula, was immediately constructed and fortified with works; and when this was finished, the whole French army began at once to move forward, in order to bring the united Russian and Prussian armies to a general engagement.

The French emperor having left Berlin on the 25th of November, and remained at Posen till the 16th of the following month receiving addresses and congratulations from the Poles, arrived at Warsaw on the 18th; and, on the 23d, put himself at the head of his army, and crossed the Narew. The French army was distributed in the following manner. The right, consisting of the divisions of Lasnes, Davoust, and the Grand Duke of Berg, and commanded by Bonaparte in person, having crossed the Narew at the above-mentioned bridge, was opposed to the left flank of the Russians, who were so injudiciously drawn up by their generals as to be exposed to its attacks in this unfavorable position. To the left of this great division of the army was the corps of Augereau at Zakroczym on the Vistula, and at a still greater distance in the same direction was the corps of Soult, which had crossed the river at Polock. The French left, consisting of the divisions of Ney, Bessieres, and the Prince of Ponte Corvo, after having advanced from Thorn to Golub, and from thence to Sierpsk, was directed to attack the Prussians under General Lestocq, and, by a rapid movement, to cut off their communication with the Russians. These orders were executed by Ney and Bessieres with their accustomed promptitude and success. The chief actions were at Biezun and Soldau, in both of which the Prussians were defeated with considerable loss of men and artillery, and thereby prevented from forming a junction with the Russians. These actions took place on the 23d and 26th of December. The operations of the French right began on the night of the 23d, by an attack on the village of Czarnowo, on the Narew, where the Russians were in great force, and had erected batteries; but, after an obstinate resistance, their batteries were carried, and their troops dislodged by the French. Next day, the army under Kamenskoy was driven from its entrenchments at Nasielsk, and compelled to fall back several leagues; and the same day Augereau passed the Wkra at Kurscomb, and defeated a body of 15,000 men, who disputed with him the passage of that river. On the 25th, there was no action of consequence. The Russian columns, broken and dispersed, retired before the French in disorder, and nothing saved them from being entirely cut off, but the shortness of the days, which was favorable to their escape, and the badness of the roads, which prevented the advance of the French artillery. At this critical moment, Kamenskoy, the Russian commander-in-chief, left his army, and retired to Ostrolenka. The cause of his departure has been variously explained. His enemies gave out, that the late reverses of the army had disordered his mind, and rendered him incapable of the command. But there are some who pretend, that he was the only one of the Russian generals who was aware of their danger, and, that he left the army in disgust and despair, when he found his authority insufficient to curb the inconsiderate ardour of the younger generals, who were determined on risking another engagement. In consequence of the departure of Kamenskoy, the command of the Russian army was divided between Benningsen and Buxhoevden, the former at Pultusk, and the latter at Golomyn. Both were attacked by the French on the 26th, and both made an obstinate resistance. They were both, however, driven from their positions, and forced to retreat with precipitation, leaving behind them great part of their baggage and artillery. Soult had been sent forward by another road to cut off their retreat; but the horrible sloughs, the consequences of rain and thaw, have been 800 killed and 2,000 wounded; among the latter were six general officers, and one general of dragoons was killed. After the action of the 26th, the French army went into cantonments on the banks of the river Orzyk, and the Emperor Napoleon returned to Warsaw.

Affairs of the Ottoman Porte.—Rupture between Russia and Turkey.—Invasion of Moldavia and Wallachia by the Russians.—Austria displeased with Russia.—Important Reforms in the Austrian Army.—Conduct of the King of Sweden.—Declaration of his Danish Majesty.—Internal Affairs of Holland.—Louis Bonaparte made King of Holland.—Negociations for Peace between England and France.—Its Failure.

WHILE these events were passing in Poland, hostilities broke out unexpectedly between Russia and the Porte. This termination of the friendship and alliance which had subsisted between these two powers since the invasion of Egypt by Bonaparte, was brought about partly by the machinations of the French ambassador at Constantinople, and partly by the ambition and precipitate violence of the court of St. Petersburg.

It had been lately settled by a convention between Russia and Turkey, that the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia, when once appointed by the Porte, should remain in office for seven years, and should on no account be removed from their governments before the expiration of that term, without the concurrence of the Russian minister at Constantinople. That such a stipulation was derogatory from the sovereignty, claimed and exercised by the Ottoman Porte for ages in these provinces, cannot be denied. But the terms of the convention were clear and precise, and, when concluded and ratified, any contravention of its articles by one of the contracting parties, without the consent of the other, could not but be regarded as a breach of treaty, affording to the other party a just ground of complaint, and on refusal of redress, a justifiable cause of war. The convention might have been originally improvident on the part of the Turks, as being incompatible with the dignity, and inconsistent with the interests of their empire; but, when concluded, they were bound to abide by it, and had no right to abrogate or set it aside without the consent of Russia.

Affairs were in this posture, when the Ottoman government, alarmed at the progress of the French power, consented to send a special embassy to Paris, to congratulate Bonaparte on his assumption of the Imperial dignity; and contrary to its former determination, agreed to receive an ambassador from France. This concession was regarded as an important victory by the French cabinet; and to improve the advantage it had gained, General Sebastiani was selected to be its ambassador at the Porte, as a person eminently qualified to promote its views in that quarter, by persuading Turkey to break her alliance with Russia and England, and revert to her ancient connection with France. Fully instructed in the part he was to act, no sooner had Sebastiani arrived at Constantinople, than he laid before the divan the treaty between France and Russia, recently signed at Paris by D'Oubril; and contending that an article of that treaty, which guaranteed in general terms the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire, amounted to a virtual repeal of the convention concerning the hospodars, which he knew to be disagreeable to the Turks, he succeeded in persuading the Porte to recal the reigning hospodars, and appoint others in their place, without consulting the Russian ambassador, or regarding his formal protest against these measures. Having carried this point against the Russians, while it was still uncertain whether D'Oubril's treaty would or would not be ratified by the court of St. Petersburg, the French negociator proceeded next, as soon as he understood the ratification of that treaty had been withheld, to present a note to the Ottoman government, Sept. 6, in which he demanded that the passage of the Bosphorus should be shut against all Russian ships of war, as well as against every other vessel of that nation, bringing troops, ammunition, or provisions; though he knew, that by a treaty between Russia and the Porte, that passage was open to the vessels of the former, without exception or limitation. If these and other demands in his note, urged with equal insolence and contempt of good faith and of the obligations of treaties, were instantly complied with, he assured the Turks of the friendship and protection of his master, the great Napoleon; but if not immediately acceded to, he threatened them with instant war, and announced the presence of a formidable French army in Dalmatia, ready to punish or defend them, according to the party they espoused.

The Porte, instead of resenting these insolent proposals in the manner they deserved, whether governed by the intrigues, or terrified by the threats of Sebastiana, shewed a disposition to comply with his desires, and communicated the note received from him to the English and Russian ambassadors at Constantinople, in order to obtain their advice in this critical juncture of its affairs. Both these ministers, as was to be expected, remonstrated in the strongest terms against the wavering, undecided policy, which had lately directed its councils; but their representations made little impression on its government, till the Russian ambassador, Italinski, threatened to leave Constantinople, and began, September the 29th, to make preparations for his departure. Alarmed at the threats of the Russian minister, as they had been formerly dismayed by the menaces of Sebastiani, the Turks yielded a second time to their fears, reversed their late orders, restored the deposed hospodars, in the manner required by Italinski, and acceded in fact to all his demands, October the 15th.

All cause of war between Russia and Turkey seemed now removed, when suddenly a Russian army, under General Michelson, entered Moldavia, November the 23d, and took possession of Chotzim, Bender, and Jassi.

When the news of this invasion reached Constantinople, that city was filled with indignation and surprise. The cry for war was loud and universal, especially among the janizaries and ulemas, whose religious fanaticism and general hatred of Europeans were inflamed by the perfidy of the faithless Muscovites, the objects alike of their superstitious dread and deep-rooted aversion. But, so unwilling was the Turkish government to engage in hostilities with Russia, that notwithstanding this ardour on the part of the people, more than thirty days were suffered to elapse before war was determined upon and declared. A Russian brig, which attempted to pass through the streights of Constantinople, brought matters at last to a crisis. This vessel was stopped by the Turkish batteries, December the 25th, and the dispatches which it bore for the Russian minister, explanatory of Michelson's invasion, were thrown overboard and lost. This event determined Italinski to leave Constantinople without delay. He accordingly embarked in the Canopus, an English seventy-four, which had been for some time at anchor in sight of the Turkish capital, and contrary to the old but barbarous custom of the Ottomans, he was suffered to depart without molestation, December the 29th. Next day a rescript from the grand seignior to the grand vizier was published, containing a formal declaration of war against Russia. Great preparations were made by sea and land for carrying on hostilities with vigour. Paswan Oglou, Pacha of Widin, formerly pursued as a rebel, but now invested with legitimate authority in the revolted province, which he had successfully maintained against his sovereign, and Mustapha Bayracter, Ayan of Ruschuk, had been already commissioned to repel the infidels by force, and to oppose the further progress of their invasion. The Pachas of Romelia were ordered to advance towards the Danube to support them; and an army was assembled in Asia, at the head of which it was announced that the grand vizier would take the field in spring, bearing the sacred standard of the empire. The naval armaments of the Ottomans, as far as their means would allow, corresponded with their military preparations. Their fleet was got in readiness and manned with the best sailors that could be procured; and to prevent any hostile designs upon their capital, orders were given to put the castles of the Dardanelles in the best possible state of defence.

In the mean time the Russians, under Michelson, after having completed the conquest of Moldavia, entered Wallachia, and having defeated a body of troops, which the Ayan of Ruschuck had sent to oppose them, they took possession without resistance of Bucharest, December the 27th, the capital of that province, and from thence sent detachments in all directions. At the close of the year they were masters of the three provinces of Moldavia, Bessarabia, and Wallachia; and threatened to cross the Danube, and join the revolted Servians under Czerni George; who after gaining repeated victories over the Turks, and nearly driving them from Servia, were at this time employed in the siege of Belgrade.

The invasion of Moldavia by the Russians, besides other bad consequences to the allies, excited the jealousy and ill-humour of Austria, and produced in her cabinet a temporary alienation from their cause. The system of Austria during the present campaign had been that of a cautious and prudent neutrality. When war between France and Prussia became inevitable, she assembled a formidable army on the frontiers of Bohemia, but declared at the same time to the belligerent powers, that she had no other intention in taking this step, than to maintain inviolate the integrity of her territories. While the fortune of the war was uncertain, those assurances appeared to both parties satisfactory, and no one presumed to find fault with her conduct, or doubt the sincerity of her professions. But, when the Prussians were driven across the Oder, an imperious message was delivered at Vienna, in the name of the French Emperor, demanding the recall of the Austrian troops from the frontiers of Bohemia, and insisting on their return to their usual quarters. To this order the Austrian ministers had the prudence to submit without delay or hesitation. It was at the moment when this humiliation was fresh in their recollection, that the Russians chose to awaken their jealousy and alarm their fears by advancing to the Danube, and threatening to encompass them on the side of Turkey with the dominions or vassals of the court of St. Petersburg.

In consequence of the courts of inquiry appointed to sit on the conduct of the Austrian officers, many were degraded and dismissed from the service. The Prince Auersberg, who had neglected to burn the bridge at Vienna, though he had received positive orders to destroy it, was condemned to ten years imprisonment; and General Mack received sentence of death by the unanimous voice of his judges. But the emperor remitted the capital part of his punishment, and softened the severity of many of the other sentences. While these wholesome examples of rigour were given, some reforms of importance were made in the constitution of the Austrian army under the direction and authority of the Archduke Charles.

The King of Sweden, who had hitherto waged against France a harmless war of official notes and virulent proclamations, began, about the close of the present year, to exchange real blows with his adversary. A body of Swedish troops, who had been stationed in Lauenburg, were made prisoners at Travemunde, as they were endeavouring to make their escape to Sweden by sea; and towards the end of December, Marshal Mortier advanced with a small army to the frontiers of Pomerania, in order to form the siege of Stralsund, and drive the Swedes from the isle of Rugen. An attempt had been previously made by the French emperor to open a separate negotiation for peace with the King of Sweden, for whose character he expressed the highest esteem and consideration; but his proffers were rejected with disdain by that high-spirited monarch, and the Swedish envoy at Hamburg, who had listened to the overtures of his emissary, was severely reprimanded for giving ear to them.

Denmark persevered in the maintenance of that pacific system which was most suitable to the smallness of her means, and best adapted to secure the happiness of her people; and, in consequence of the interruption of trade in the north of Germany, occasioned by the progress of the war, and the decrees of the French, she thereby greatly improved her commerce and navigation, and transferred to herself a great part of that trade which used formerly to be carried on under Prussian colours and through Prussian ports.

On the dissolution of the Germanic constitution, the King of Denmark formally annexed Holstein to his other dominions, as an integral part of the Danish monarchy, and declared it to be for ever separated from the Germanic empire, and to owe no allegiance but to himself.

Holland was this year doomed to experience a revolution more singular than unexpected. With that restlessness of character which must ever be at work, and that proneness to regulation and love of uniformity, which the habits of a military life naturally inspire, Bonaparte had no sooner abolished the name of republic in France, than he sought to extinguish that appellation in the rest of Europe. The Cisalpine republic was transformed into the kingdom of Italy; the Ligurian was absorbed into the great empire; the free cities of Germany were made over to the vassal kings, who approached the foot, or decorated the steps of his throne; and such was his rage for harmony and regularity in the political edifice he was erecting, that even the people of the United Provinces, born and nurtured under republican institutions, were compelled to descend to the level of other nations, and to acknowledge a fellow mortal to be their sovereign. After such discussion and deliberation as military despots permit to their subjects, this important change was announced publicly at Paris, by a deputation of Dutchmen sent for that purpose from the Hague, June the 5th. Louis Bonaparte, a younger brother of Napoleon, was selected to be the King of Holland, and unwillingly dragged from the frivolities and delights of Paris, to superintend, in a foggy climate, the concerns of a laborious, parsimonious, and impoverished people, who had yet to teach their lips the accents of loyalty, and their necks the obeisance due to a king.

At this time circumstances occurred which led to the overtures of peace between England and France. About ten days after Mr. Fox came into office, February 14, he received a letter from a person calling himself Guillet de la Gerillière, stating, that he was arrived at Gravesend without a passport, and requesting Mr. Fox to send him one, as he had very lately left Paris, and had something to communicate, which would give Mr. Fox satisfaction. On receiving this letter, Mr. Fox gave orders, through Sir Francis Vincent, under secretary of state, to Mr. Brooke of the alien office, to send for the man from Gravesend, a private interview having been solicited, and to bring him on his arrival in London to Mr. Fox's house in Arlington-street, instead of taking him to the foreign-office. In consequence of these orders, the Frenchman was next morning carried to Mr. Fox's house, and there admitted by him alone into his closet; when, after some unimportant conversation, he proceeded to the object of his journey, which was to inform

Mr. Fox that a plan had been entered into for the assassination of Bonaparte, and a house hired at Passy, from which it could be carried into effect with certainty, and without risk. Surprised and confounded with the audacity of the villain, in making him the confident of so execrable a design, Mr. Fox, without inquiring further into the particulars of the plot, instantly dismissed the Frenchman from his presence, and desired Mr. Brooke to send him as soon as possible out of the kingdom. But on reflection he ordered him afterwards to be detained, till such information could be given to the French government as might prevent the perpetration of his crime, if really projected; and with that view he transmitted to M. Talleyrand, Feb. 20, a short and simple statement of the occurrence, and of what he had done thereupon. The answer to this communication, dated March the 5th, was a natural and well-turned compliment to the honor and generosity of Mr. Fox's character, and was accompanied by an extract from the Emperor's speech to the legislative body, in order, as M. Talleyrand observed, "that Mr. Fox might know, if the advantages of peace were duly appreciated, on what terms it might be discussed." The extract was a simple offer "to conclude peace, taking for its basis the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens."

Mr. Fox considered this communication as a distinct overture, and proceeded to answer it in that frank and direct style which was the characteristic of all his public dispatches. He objected in his letter, dated March 26, to the uncertainty of the basis of Amiens; the variety of modes in which it had been interpreted; and the delay which the explanations on the meaning of it would unavoidably occasion, even if no other objection existed. "The true basis of such a negotiation," he observed, "between two great powers, equally despising every idea of chicane, would be the reciprocal recognition of the following principle; viz. that the object of both parties should be a peace, honorable for both and for their respective allies; and, at the same time, of a nature to secure, as far as in their power, the future tranquillity of Europe." He then proceeded to state the impossibility of treating, much less of concluding any thing unless in concert with Russia, but suggested the practicability of some previous discussion of the principal points, and some provisional arrangements, while they were waiting for the actual intervention of that power; and he forestalled an objection, which might be made to his statement, founded on the few material points in issue between Russia and France, by insisting upon, and extolling the interest taken by that power in all that concerned the greater or less degree of independence enjoyed by the different princes and states of Europe. He ended this letter with an expression of his desire of peace, and a short but firm exposition of the ability of Great Britain to continue the contest.

A correspondence of some length ensued, in which, as M. Talleyrand observed, there was a character of openness and precision that had not hitherto been seen in the communications between the two courts. The great difficulty consisted in the admission of Russia into the negotiation. M. Talleyrand endeavoured with much ingenuity to represent that power as interposing its authority between two great nations fully competent to adjust their own differences, but Mr. Fox insisted on her being a party in the question, and an ally of Great Britain, whose interests were inseparably connected with her own. To bring the discussion to a point, Mr. Fox stated explicitly, April 20, that his majesty was willing to negotiate conjointly with Russia, but would not consent to negotiate separately. A month elapsed without any answer being given to this dispatch, and the first overture might have been said to have failed in consequence of the determination of England not to negotiate separately, and the unwillingness of France to admit the intervention of Russia. But, though no arrangement took place, "the spirit of conciliation manifested on both sides, was considered as a great advance to peace; and in the course of the month of May, the English cabinet were, no doubt, enabled to ascertain, with greater precision, the views and intentions of the court of St. Petersburg, and enabled to determine how far the substance and advantage of a joint negotiation might be preserved, without insisting on the forms to which France seemed to feel so much repugnance."

Whether M. Talleyrand calculated on the probability of such communications between the two courts, or was only anxious to prolong a correspondence, which might ultimately lead to a negotiation, he wrote a letter on the 2d of June, in the form of an answer to Mr. Fox's dispatch of the 20th of April, in which, after some vague observations on the nature of alliances, and some trivial objections to a joint negotiation, he proposed,—“first, to negotiate in the same preliminary forms which were adopted during the administration of the Marquis of Rockingham, in 1782; forms which were not renewed with so much advantage in the negotiations of Lisle, but which were perfectly successful in the negotiations which preceded the treaty of Amiens;—secondly, to establish as a basis two fundamental principles; the first, taken from Mr. Fox's letter of the 26th of March, namely, that the two states should have for their object that the peace be honorable for them and their respective allies, and at the same time, of a nature to secure, as far as it is in their power, the future tranquillity of Europe; the second principle to be an acknowledgment on the part of the two powers, of their mutual right

BOOK VII. of intervention and guarantee in continental and in maritime affairs.

CHAP. V.

The English government did not return any immediate answer to this letter. Indeed, though the form of the proposals contained in it, gave it an appearance of great precision and exactness, some time seemed to have been necessary to understand the meaning of the French government, in making a reference to the preliminary forms in the administration of Lord Rockingham, and those which preceded the treaty of Amiens; for they were not only dissimilar, but it appeared from Mr. Fox's answer, that by adopting the precedents of 1782, the French would have completely established the mode of negotiation, to which they objected, and admitted the principle against which M. Talleyrand, in the very letter containing that offer, peremptorily protested. Whether these considerations, or an expectation of further communications from the Russian cabinet, induced Mr. Fox to suspend the correspondence, no answer was made to this letter till the 14th of June, by which time a new channel of communication was opened, and a fresh overture was made from the French government, which led to all the subsequent negotiations between the two countries. As, however, Mr. Fox answered the letter of the 2d of June without any reference to this new negotiation, we shall close our account of the direct correspondence between M. Talleyrand and the English minister, by stating the substance of the last letter of that correspondence. It consisted of a civil but convincing reply to the objections urged by M. Talleyrand to a joint negotiation, a simple statement of the preliminary discussions in 1782, and a comparison of the situation of England then with relation to the allies of France, with that of France to the allies of Great Britain at the date of the letter, and an offer of the same forms of treating which France at that time thought proper to insist upon. "We then treated with France and her allies. Let France now treat with us and our allies." After acquiescing in the basis offered in the second proposition, upon condition that the two powers mutually agree to abstain from all encroachment on the greater or lesser states of Europe; and after expressing his hope, that no difficulties in form rather than in substance should retard the restoration of peace; he intimated that any mode of negotiation, to which Russia will assent, will be agreeable to Great Britain, and took that opportunity of observing, that an honorable peace was no less conformable to the wishes of Russia than to those of England and France.

Thus ended the direct correspondence between the two ministers for foreign affairs, in the course of which, and in consequence of the conciliatory manner in which it had been conducted, Mr. Fox had solicited, as a personal favor, the release of several of his private acquaintance, prisoners at Verdun, the peculiar circumstances of whose detention had rendered any arrangement for their exchange impracticable, as it would have been derogatory to the dignity of the country to have acknowledged the principle on which they had been detained. The applications of Mr. Fox were in many instances successful, and among the persons named by him was the Earl of Yarmouth, only son of the Marquis of Hertford, who, together with his wife and family, had been detained in France since the commencement of the war. On Lord Yarmouth's arrival in London, he communicated, June 13, the substance of a conversation with M. Talleyrand, which had passed at the desire of that minister, for the purpose of conveying, through a secret and confidential channel, the sentiments and views of France, and the outlines of the terms on which peace might be restored between the two countries. The terms sketched out in the conversation seemed so favorable, that the English cabinet lost no time in conveying to M. Talleyrand their disposition to commence a negotiation, on the basis contained in them. The bearer of the proposition was better able to judge of, and to enforce the adherence to the terms proposed, than any other person whatever; the residence of his family in France rendered Lord Yarmouth's return less liable to public observation; and it was understood that, excepting himself, no one would have been permitted to remain twelve hours in France, without producing full powers to negotiate a treaty of peace. These were probably the reasons which induced the English cabinet to direct Lord Yarmouth to return. Before his departure, Mr. Fox, with an observation that we were all mortal, requested him to commit to writing the heads of the proposals made by M. Talleyrand. His memorandum of a conversation with that minister, preserved in the secretary of state's office, and afterwards laid before parliament, was the only written evidence of the proposals which induced Mr. Fox to treat directly for peace with the French government. As the unwillingness of France to adhere to her original offers not only occasioned the first departure from that spirit of conciliation, in which the former correspondence had been conducted; but was the real cause of the ultimate failure of the negotiation, the substance of those overtures necessarily formed the most important part of the whole transaction. Unfortunately Lord Yarmouth could not foresee the necessity of the disclosure of so confidential a paper. It consequently was not drawn up in that methodical style which is generally desirable in a public document. The want, however, of official precision, and the omission of some inferior points, were amply supplied by his lordship's comments and explanations in the house of commons, when the subject came into discussion. From the paper, combined with those declarations, it was clear that three specific offers were held out as inducements to Great Britain to treat, viz. the restoration of Hanover, the possession of Sicily as a consequence of the principle of the uti possidetis, and a facility in the arrangement of the form of treating, which, without establishing a congress, or recognizing the claim of a joint negotiation, would not impair the advantages which Great Britain and Russia might derive from their close connection and alliance.

The restoration of Hanover was considered as a point unconnected with the basis of the treaty. It was a compliment to the crown of Great Britain in return for the recognition, virtual or stipulated, of the Emperor of France, and of the numerous sovereignties conferred on various branches of his family since the commencement of the war. Bonaparte had, in all probability, promised the electorate to the King of Prussia, if he had not actually guaranteed the possession of it to that monarch; but in order to retain the power of amusing the court of Berlin as long as he might find his interest to do so, he was naturally anxious to conceal this offer of sacrificing her supposed interests to the attainment of peace with Great Britain. Such indeed seemed to have been his motives in preferring a message through Lord Yarmouth to a continuance of the correspondence between the ministers of the two countries. The occupation of Hanover by Prussia was in itself a reasonable plea, even to Great Britain, for not committing the offer of its restoration to writing till further progress had been made towards the conclusion of peace.

On the other points of the negotiation his conduct was very different. If, on the return of Lord Yarmouth, the outward appearance of conciliation was preserved, the substance of the terms demanded was very unexpectedly altered, and the circumstances of the two countries openly maintained by M. Talleyrand to be materially changed in favor of France. The fact was, that the French had either ascertained that M. D'Oubril, the Russian minister, was secretly authorized to treat for a separate peace, or foresaw, with their usual sagacity, that the weakness of his character would enable them to intimidate him into that fatal and inconsiderate measure. M. Talleyrand, therefore, predicted that the advantages of a joint negotiation were defeated, and openly insisted on that circumstance as a legitimate motive for extending his demands. If this view of the subject was not to be reconciled to high and chivalrous notions of honor, it must be acknowledged to be within the usual line of policy which states prescribe to themselves; and, that to have disdained the advantage which France might have derived from this change of circumstances, would have been a rare instance of forbearance among the transactions between nation and nation. The French government, on the contrary, seemed to have been elated with the prospect of success likely to attend their negotiation with M. D'Oubril. They had not determined on the extent of the fresh demands to which this new state of things would, in their judgment, entitle them; and M. Talleyrand, in the first interview with Lord Yarmouth, after his return to Paris, not only departed entirely from his clear and explicit offer of Sicily, but indulged himself in vague allusions to further demands, and in peremptory representations of the necessity of negotiating with some person duly authorized and empowered to treat. This first deviation from the original overtures was received by the British ministry as the omen of the failure of negotiation. From that period Mr. Fox despaired entirely of its success.

The instructions afterwards to Lord Yarmouth were distinct and peremptory. He was directed to insist generally on the recurrence to the original overtures, and to make the re-admission of Sicily as the sine quâ non of the production of his full powers, which, "to avoid all pretence of cavil," were conveyed to him without delay. In the meanwhile the conduct and language of M. D'Oubril, who had arrived at Paris, and who on the 10th of July opened his negotiations in form with the French Commissioner-general Clarke, fully justified the expectations of M. Talleyrand. It was soon manifest that no scruple about Sicily would prevent that minister from accepting such terms as Bonaparte might choose to grant, and nothing but the immediate and unqualified concurrence of England deter him from signing a separate peace. With the view of postponing so fatal a step, and of securing M. D'Oubril's co-operation on the other points in discussion, the English cabinet seemed for one moment to have been willing "to ascertain whether any practicable shape could be given to the proposal of an exchange for Sicily." This guarded relaxation was evidently the result of an extreme compliance with the wishes of M. D'Oubril, not a variation of opinion on the importance of the object, much less an acknowledgment of the right of France to recede from the original basis, within the scope of which it was carefully stated to be brought, in Mr. Fox's dispatch of the 18th of July. But the fears and the impatience of M. D'Oubril did not allow him to wait till the sentiments of the British cabinet were known. Such was the success of the French negotiators, that they intimidated him into a belief that the delay of forty-eight hours, in the signature of a separate treaty, would expose Germany and Europe to dismemberment and destruction, and that an immediate acquiescence with the demands of Bonaparte was the only method of averting those evils. He accordingly signed a treaty on the 20th of July, and without communicating to Lord Yarmouth some of the most material articles to which he had consented, hastened, according to his own expression, to lay his work and his head at the feet of his imperial master. The French very naturally regarded the signature of this treaty in the light of an important victory, and, by the same arts as they had practised on M. D'Oubril, so far succeeded in terrifying Lord Yarmouth with the consequences of a rupture or of delay, that they prevailed upon him to produce his full powers, before the basis originally offered had been again recognized, before the extension of its application to Sicily had been in any shape renewed, and before the impression produced on the British cabinet by the precipitate conduct of M. D'Oubril had been ascertained.

CHAP. V.

General Clarke was immediately appointed to treat with Lord Yarmouth on the part of France, and thus—although “the discussions had, according to Mr. Fox’s dispatch of the 18th of July, been prolonged solely for the purpose of temporizing in compliance with the wishes of M. D'Oubril, Lord Yarmouth was actually exchanging notes, and holding conferences with a French commissioner after that gentleman had signed a separate peace and left Paris, and before his court was apprized of either of those events. The circumstances in which his lordship was placed were undoubtedly very embarrassing, and it is but just to observe, that it would have required great address and experience to have withheld his full powers, without bringing the discussions to an abrupt and unsuccessful termination. But as his instructions had been peremptory, it is not any matter of wonder that the English cabinet was not satisfied with the step which he had taken.

The necessity of some other negotiator, “fully instructed in the sentiments of his majesty’s government, on all the various points of discussion that might arise,” was immediately felt; and the important charge was entrusted to Lord Lauderdale, a nobleman whose discernment and talents eminently qualified him for the task, and whose uniform disposition to a pacific system of policy was a strong earnest of the sincerity of the British cabinet in their endeavours to obtain peace. Nor were these the only recommendations of Lord Lauderdale. The health of Mr. Fox began at this period to decline, and the nomination of his personal friend and tried political adherent, was a pledge that the cabinet

The first endeavour of Lord Lauderdale, on his arrival at Paris, was to bring back the French government to the basis of the uti possidetis, and to the application of that principle to the island of Sicily. Lord Yarmouth, after having for that purpose concurred with his colleagues in representing, formally and officially, the substance and tendency of Talleyrand’s original overtures, left the subsequent part of the negotiation exclusively in his hands. The French negotiators, (for M. Champagny, minister of the interior, was soon appointed joint-plenipotentiary with General Clarke,) never actually admitted the basis of the uti possidetis, after the arrival of Lord Lauderdale, and constantly evaded the acknowledgment of having in the first instance proposed it. They contrived, however, under various pretences, and in one instance by an actual delay of the passports for a messenger, to detain Lord Lauderdale at Paris, till it became the policy of Great Britain, as well as France, to await the decision of the court of Petersburg upon the treaty which M. D'Oubril had carried thither for ratification.

On the 3d of September a courier brought the intelligence to Paris, that the emperor had refused to ratify M. D'Oubril’s treaty, and this refusal was not the consequence of any representation from the court of London, for it was declared before any messenger arrived from London, or the English minister in Russia had received any instructions from his court. M. Talleyrand, with great apparent frankness, informed the British negotiator of this piece of intelligence the day after its arrival in Paris, and assured him that France was now disposed to make peace with England on more favorable terms than she otherwise would have been induced to admit. The probability of the ratification of M. D'Oubril’s treaty being refused, had been foreseen, and Lord Lauderdale was instructed “to consider the two courts as having reverted to their former situation with additional bonds of union, resulting from fresh proofs of their respective adherence to the spirit and principles of their alliance.” As it was soon obvious, that the abandonment of Russia was to be the price of the more favorable terms, so ostentatiously announced to Great Britain, the honorable determination of the English court not to listen to any such projects, prevented any precise detail of the concessions France was willing to make for the attainment of her object. It is however worthy of remark, that no offer of Sicily was, even in the supposition of a separate peace, ever made during the course of the negotiation.

Mr. Fox was now unable to discharge the duties of his office. The principles, however, which he had laid down, seemed to have regulated the conduct of the British cabinet throughout the discussions. An attention not only to the interests but to the wishes of Russia, a firm determination to listen to no measure that could give her umbrage or suspicion, and a strong desire to preserve Sicily, amounting nearly to a resolution, not to abandon it, were, on the part of Great Britain, the most prominent features of the latter, as they had been of the early part of the negotiation. Lord Lauderdale was not authorized "to sign any treaty except provisionally, such treaty not to have its full effect until peace should be concluded between Russia and France;" but he was at the same time instructed, "to impart to the French plenipotentiaries the conditions upon which Russia, (according to the full and perfect knowledge his Britannic majesty had of the intentions of that court), would be willing to negotiate with the French government; to reduce them into the form of a treaty in the event of their being agreed to on both sides; and to insert an article in the provisional treaty between Great Britain and France, by which his Britannic majesty should engage to employ his mediation for the purpose of obtaining the accession of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias to the said treaty."

It seemed that M. Talleyrand felt little or no objection to the above-described form of proceeding; but, notwithstanding the conciliating tone adopted by that minister, the official note in which the promised acquiescence of the emperor was signified, breathed a very different spirit. It contained much irrelevant and offensive matter; it was conceived in the language of remonstrance and reproach, and barely conveyed a reluctant consent to the proposal of Lord Lauderdale. It was manifest from this circumstance, as well as from other passages of the correspondence, that the impatience of Bonaparte would have brought the negotiation to an abrupt and violent conclusion, but for the frequent and wise interposition of his ministers, who, sometimes by address, and sometimes by representation, contrived to soften the tone and moderate the language of their official communications. The English negotiator, in his reply to the above-mentioned paper, though he took as much notice of the offensive topics introduced into it as was essential to the maintenance of his own dignity, very judiciously combined it with the personal assurances of M. Talleyrand, and considered it as amounting to a full admission of his proposal. But, on the renewal of the conferences, it did not appear that France was disposed to relax in any one of her pretensions. In the meanwhile Bonaparte had left Paris for the army on the Rhine, and one of the plenipotentiaries (General Clarke,) as well as M. Talleyrand accompanied him on his journey. M. Champagny, who remained to conduct the negotiation, was neither authorized to relinquish the claims of Joseph upon Sicily, nor to acquiesce in such an arrangement as would have satisfied the court of St. Petersburg. The negotiation was therefore at an end, and Lord Lauderdale peremptorily insisted on his passports. In the last conference M. Champagny, though he had previously doubted his powers of hearing Lord Lauderdale upon the subject of Russia (notwithstanding the assurances contained in the public note and conversations of M. Talleyrand) offered to cede the full sovereignty of Corfu to that power. This was rejected as insufficient, which led to the erroneous opinion that the negotiation was broken off solely because Great Britain insisted on the cession of Dalmatia to Russia.

The obvious policy of France, when she despaired of any separate peace with Great Britain, was to induce her to admit in the project of a treaty such terms as she foresaw would alienate the affections, and shake the confidence of her ally the Emperor of Russia. The honorable determination of the British cabinet, and the firm but temperate conduct of the negotiator, defeated this design, and his earnest and peremptory demand of passports was at length granted, though they were accompanied with a note evidently composed under the immediate direction of Bonaparte. This paper insinuated that the principles of Mr. Fox had been abandoned by his colleagues and successors; that a departure from the basis laid down by him had thrown the first obstacle in the way of pacification, and that to the loss of that great man alone was to be ascribed the further continuance of the calamities of war. To these charges Lord Lauderdale delivered a spirited, manly, and convincing reply.

DURING the present year the British navy maintained its accustomed superiority over the enemy. But, though successful in every action, it could neither achieve the same victories, nor sustain the same calamities as in the preceding campaign. It had neither a Nelson to lose, nor a hostile fleet like that of Trafalgar to vanquish. Its efforts were directed to the humbler but useful service of protecting from insult and depredation the colonies and commerce of the empire, left exposed at the commencement of the year, without adequate means of defence, to the numerous squadrons of the enemy, which during the winter months had eluded the vigilance of the English blockading fleets, and escaped to sea. So hotly was the enemy pursued, and so closely watched in every quarter, that after threatening to lay waste England's colonies and interrupt her commerce, he was compelled to renounce these projects, and consult his safety by a precipitate and ignominious flight. Few of his ships employed in these expeditions returned to France. The greater part of them were taken or destroyed by the English, while others perished from storms in search of some friendly harbour to shelter them from the pursuits of their enemy.

The only squadron of the enemy, that got back to France during the present year without any disaster, was the Rochefort squadron, which had sailed from that port about Midsummer 1805, with orders to repair to a certain latitude, and wait there for the arrival of the other squadrons of the combined fleet. After cruising in vain at the place of rendezvous, and taking and destroying a number of vessels, neutral as well as English, and falling in with and capturing the Calcutta of 56 guns, this squadron had at length the good fortune to return to Rochefort about the beginning of the year, bringing with it above 800 English prisoners on board.

The fleet that escaped from Brest harbour in December 1805, was not equally fortunate. This fleet consisted originally of fifteen ships of the line, six frigates, and four corvettes: but after having been ten days at sea, it separated into different squadrons, one of which, consisting of five ships of the line, two frigates, and a corvette, commanded by Admiral Leisseigues, made directly for Saint Domingo, and having arrived at that port without any accident, January 20, disembarked a body of troops and supply of ammunition, which it had on board, for the use of the colony. After having performed this service, the French admiral loitered away in the bay of Occa for more than a fortnight, taking in water and repairing the damages sustained by his ships in their voyage; at the end of which period he was fortunately descried by Sir John Thomas Duckworth, on the 6th of February, who was cruising in these seas with a squadron of seven ships of the line, and four frigates, and had received intelligence of the arrival of a French fleet at St. Domingo. The French admiral, who was greatly inferior in strength, endeavoured to make his escape on the appearance of the English squadron, but being speedily overtaken, an action commenced, which lasted with great fury for near two hours, at the conclusion of which three of the French line-of-battle ships remained prizes to the English, and two were driven on shore and burned. The two French frigates and corvette put to sea and made their escape. The loss of the English in this engagement was sixty-four killed and 294 wounded. No officer above the rank of a midshipman was killed, but several were severely wounded. The French had 760 killed and wounded on board of the three ships that were taken, and they no doubt lost a proportional number in the two others that were destroyed.

Another division of the Brest squadron, commanded by Admiral Villaumez, was originally destined for the Cape of Good Hope; but having touched at the isle of Noronha, the admiral was there informed of the capture of that settlement by the English; upon which he proceeded to San Salvador in Brazil, and after remaining there for some time to refresh his seamen, among whom symptoms of scurvy began to appear, he set sail for the West Indies, April 2, and arrived without accident at Martinique in the end of June. The squadron which Villaumez conducted to Martinique consisted of six ships of the line and one frigate, to oppose which Sir Alexander Cochrane, the English admiral upon the station, had at that moment only four ships of the line and three frigates; but with this inferior force he gallantly pursued the enemy, in order to watch his motions and check any enterprizes he might meditate. No sooner had the French admiral collected the whole of his squadron at Martinique, than he put again to sea, and steered to the north, followed at a distance by Cochrane, who, though he avoided an engagement, hovered in sight of the enemy's squadron, to prevent him making any attempt on the ports or shipping of the English islands. In passing St. Thomas's the French slackened sail for the English, as if desirous of coming to action, but Cochrane, considering the inferiority of his force, the French having been joined by another ship of the line and three frigates after they left Martinique, declined fighting, and satisfied with having traced the course of the enemy to Porto Rico, returned to Tortola, leaving two frigates to watch their motions. It was fortunate for the French admiral that he lost so little time at Martinique: for, on the 12th of July, Sir John Borlase Warren arrived at Barbadoes with six sail of the line, which had been dispatched from England with unexampled promptitude, on the first surmise of the French having re-passed the line and directed their course to the West Indies. Another squadron, under Sir Richard Strachan, had been previously sent out to cruise for them; and when news arrived of their escape from the West Indies, a third squadron, under Sir Thomas Louis, put to sea to intercept their return; besides which, blockading squadrons watched all the principal ports of the Continent, into which they could attempt to enter.

So many provident and well-combined precautions must have been followed by the capture of the French squadron, if it had ventured on returning to Europe, or had the ships of which it was composed, continued cruising together at sea. But the French admiral, seeing all his plans frustrated by the vigilance and activity of his enemies, determined on consulting the individual safety of his ships by dispersing them in different directions. The Veteran of 74 guns, commanded by Jerome Bonaparte, seemed to have been the first that separated from the rest of the squadron, and to have been the most fortunate in its voyage home. On the 16th of August, as this vessel was about three hundred leagues west of Brest, to the northward of the Azores, it fell in with the homeward-bound Quebec fleet, under the convoy of the Champion frigate, and took and destroyed six vessels laden with timber, and other valuable articles; and on the 26th of the same month, after having been chased by an English man of war, it reached in safety the coast of Brittany, and got into the small harbour of Concarneau, under the protection of batteries, where, though the vessel was stranded, the stores and guns were saved, and the captain and crew got on shore. BOOK VII.

After the separation of Jerome from the admiral, which took place in the gulph of Florida, the rest of the squadron encountered a tremendous gale of wind, August 18, in which they suffered most severely. The admiral's ship, the Foudroyant, of eighty-four guns, reached the Havannah under jury-masts, after an action with the Anson frigate of forty guns, which drove her for protection under the batteries of the Moro Castle, Sept. 15. The Impeteux, after having lost her masts, bowsprit, and rudder in the storm, and being otherwise damaged, was standing in for the Chesapeake under jury-masts, when she was desecrated by three of the vessels of Sir Richard Strachan's squadron, and having taken ground as she attempted to escape, was there burned by the boats of the Melampus, and her crew made prisoners, Sept. 14. Two other seventy-fours, which got into the Chesapeake, after having been greatly damaged in the storm, were eventually destroyed by the English on the American coast, while the Cassant, which was supposed to have foundered at sea, arrived at Brest in the middle of October.

The French admiral Linois, who had so long wandered about the Indian seas, unmolested and unattacked, and carried on with success a predatory and most destructive war against the British commerce in the east, was this year intercepted, in his return to France with his plunder, by Sir John Borlase Warren, March 13, and brought to England, with the Marengo of eighty guns, and the Belle Poule of forty guns, being the only two ships under his command.

Five large frigates and two corvettes, with troops on board for the West Indies, having escaped from Rochefort, were next day met at sea by a British squadron under Sir Samuel Hood, Sept. 25, and after a running fight of several hours, four of the five frigates were compelled to strike. The loss of the English in this action amounted to nine killed and thirty-two wounded; but their gallant commander received a severe wound in the right arm, which rendered the amputation of the limb necessary.

It would be in vain to recapitulate all the individual instances of courage, enterprise, and skill exerted by the British navy in the various actions in which it was engaged during the present year. The capture of the Pomona frigate on the coast of Cuba, August 23, though defended by a strong castle and a formidable line of gun-boats, all of which were destroyed by the two English frigates, the Arethusa and Anson, engaged in this enterprise; the action between the French frigate the Salamander of forty-four guns, supported by batteries and troops provided with musketry and field-pieces on shore, and the English

BOOK VII. ship the Constance, of twenty-four guns, assisted CHAP. VI. by a sloop of war and a gun-brig, in which both 1806. vessels were stranded and lost, though not till after the Frenchman had been compelled to strike his colours, and been taken possession of by the English; and the boldness and intrepidity displayed in numerous actions, in which vessels were cut out from under the protection of batteries, or in other circumstances unfavorable for attack, reflected honor on those who succeeded in such hazardous enterprises, and added, if possible, to the glory of the body, by the individuals of which they were achieved. The enemy, whose enfeebled squadrons were reduced to marauding expeditions, in which, when detected, they had recourse rarely to resistance, more frequently to flight, saw with rage and disappointment his ports blockaded by Britain's triumphant squadrons, and the ocean covered with her vessels, armed and unarmed.

Four ships of the line were taken from the enemy during the present year, and seven destroyed or rendered useless. Thirteen frigates were taken and one destroyed; and from thirty to forty schooners, corvettes and national brigs, besides a great number of privateers, were taken or destroyed. To counterbalance these successes, the only loss sustained by his majesty's navy was that of the Athenienne, of sixty-four guns, which, with its captain and 300 of the crew, perished un-happily in its way to Sicily, by striking on some hidden rocks in the Mediterranean; and that of the Constance, stranded on the coast of France, with its prize the Salamander. Two transports, with troops on board for Gibraltar, were taken early in the year by the French squadron under Admiral Villaumez; but the troops were afterwards retaken by Sir Home Popham, with the frigate into which they had been put. The most valuable prize taken by the enemy was the Warren Hastings East Indiaman, which, after a long and well-contested action, was compelled to strike, June 21, to the Piedmontese, a French frigate of forty-four guns, and was afterwards carried into Mauritius. Some damage was done early in the year, by a French squadron, on the coast of Africa, to the vessels engaged in the slave-trade; and several ships, employed in the Greenland and Newfoundland fisheries, were taken and destroyed by the Guerriere French frigate of fifty guns, which, however, was afterwards taken in its way home, July 19, by the Blanche, after a sharp action, near the Ferroe islands.

An expedition against the Cape of Good Hope had sailed from England in the autumn of the preceding year, which reached Table Bay, January 4. The force destined for this conquest consisted of about 5000 land-troops, under Sir David Baird, with a proportional naval force, commanded by Sir Home Popham. The town surrendered on the 10th. Sir Home Popham having persuaded Sir David Baird to grant him a small body of troops under General Beresford, steered for the Rio Plata, and arrived at the mouth of that river in the beginning of June. Having got to Buenos Ayres, by the help of rafts and boats, (for the bridge had been burnt by the enemy),

 General Beresford entered that city on the 27th, which had been previously abandoned by the viceroy, who fled to Cordova.

When intelligence reached government of Sir Home Popham's unauthorised departure from the Cape, and meditated invasion of South America, orders were instantly dispatched to recal him home, and put a stop to his expedition. These orders were too late to prevent his enterprise; and when the news of his success arrived, the strong objections to his plan were drowned in the universal joy at the fortunate result of his operations.

The settlement, however, was soon again in the hands of the enemy. The Spaniards had been taken by surprise, and beaten by a handful of men, because attacked where they were unprepared for resistance; but no sooner had they recovered from their panic, and discovered the smallness of the number of their opponents, than, ashamed of their defeat, they began to concert measures to expel their invaders. Emissaries from Buenos Ayres excited the country people to arms, and an insurrection was organized in the heart of the city, under the eye of the English commander-in-chief, which seems to have escaped his vigilance, till it had arrived at maturity, and was ripe for action. Liniers, a French colonel in the Spanish service, crossed the river in a fog, August 4, unobserved by the English cruisers, and landed at Conchas, above Buenos Ayres, bringing with him about 1000 men from Monte Video and Sacramento. Encouraged by this reinforcement, the armed levies from the country, which had been defeated by General Beresford in a sally, advanced again to the city and summoned the castle to surrender, August 10. The whole inhabitants of the town were now in arms, and the danger appeared so imminent, that the English had determined to evacuate the place and retire to their ships; but they were prevented by the state of the weather, and after a desperate action on the 12th in the streets and great square of the town, in which they were attacked with incredible fury, and severely annoyed by a destructive fire from the windows and balconies of the houses, they were, compelled to lay down their arms.

The loss of the British army in the action of the 12th, amounted to 165 killed, wounded, and missing, besides 1300 made prisoners.

On the 13th of September died the Right Hon.
 Charles James Fox, at Chiswick House, the seat of the Duke of Devonshire, where he had thrice within five weeks undergone the operation of tapping for the dropsy. This gentleman was born January 13, 1749, and was the second son of Henry, first Lord Holland, by Lady Georgina Carolina, eldest daughter of the Duke of Richmond. By the mother's side he was, therefore, descended from the royal house of Stuart; and, consequently, was not only related to most of the great families of the ancient nobility, but was actually allied to the present reigning family. From his paternal descent, however, as far as regards the dignity of birth, he derived no consequence. His father reared his honours on the foundation of his own merit, in his great application and talent in business. A master of figures, no calculation was too intricate for him, and his address in parliament excited the attention of George II. whose patronage soon followed; for, in the year 1754, he raised him to the important office of secretary of war, and on the following year, to the still higher one of secretary of state for the southern department. In 1763 he was created a peer, by the title of Baron Holland, of Foxley.

Charles was placed at Eton school under the direction of Dr. Barnard; but had, for his private-tutor, Dr. Newcombe, the learned Bishop of Waterford. His rapid progress in classical learning while at school, gained him a decided superiority in every class he entered; and as his powers of oratory were superior to that of any boy in the school, he, whenever eloquence was found to be necessary, was always chosen as their leader. The strength of his constitution kept pace with that of his mind, and both were fully exercised. Study and dissipation alternately engrossed his whole attention; nor did the apparent preference of one hinder the advancement or indulgence of the other. Never contented with mediocrity, he ever sought the extent of whatever excited his attention—cold in nothing, but ardent in every thing. He soon discovered his bias to humanity, by always espousing the weakest side in those contests which so frequently disturb the harmony of juvenile society. He sat as judge in their disputes, and when he saw a school-fellow rejected or oppressed by partiality or prejudice, he frequently exerted his maiden eloquence in favour of justice: thus did he live, the young Solon and Demosthenes of his little state.

Having accomplished his studies at Eton, he was sent to the university of Oxford. Here he read nine or ten hours a-day, during the whole term, without any inconvenience arising from a series of nocturnal rambles, to which he displayed equal devotion. Tired, however, at length, with the restraint of college discipline, and with a spirit ill adapted for the apathy of merely contemplative life, he panted for the more active scenes of enterprising men, and obtained leave of his father to make the usual tour.

Never was a mind better formed to reap the solid advantages of travelling. The etiquette of courts, the politics of nations, and the manners of men, attracted his penetrating mind; he enquired into their merits, and made himself master of their economy; he remembered that he was the son of a nobleman, forgot not his own dignity, and had an eye to the service of his country. Notwithstanding these, he frequently overstepped the bounds of propriety: the fascinating vivacity of French manners, and the seduction of Italian luxury, at times enslaved him: he drank large draughts of pleasure, and was often at the gaming-table, till his excesses exceeding even the indulgence of his father, whose ears they had reached, he was summoned home; and it was not without repeated commands that he obeyed.

On his return from those scenes of levity and dissipation, his father, in order to abstract him from the too great indulgence in pleasure, proposed his taking a seat in parliament, and thus to detach him from a course which threatened the destruction of his health and fortune. At the general election, therefore, in 1768, Lord Holland procured him the return for Midhurst, in Sussex. Notwithstanding his nonage, for he was not yet twenty, he was suffered to keep his seat; and whether this arose from accident or design in the committee of privileges, remains unknown. The exertions and display of youthful genius never fail to procure good-will and interest, and no youth ever excited so much anxiety and expectation.—His powers surpassed the hopes of his most sanguine friends, and he was the favourite subject of conversation in all classes of society. There was such originality in his thinking, and so much of nature in his manner, that he excited universal admiration. His first speech was upon Mr. Wilkes's petition from the King's Bench prison, to be permitted to take his seat, and thereby satisfy the desire of his constituents. Mr. Fox, on this question, did not take the popular side, and that on which the ablest and most constitutional lawyers declared the justice to lie.

Thus he commenced his parliamentary career, in supporting the measures of government; and so highly did the minister of that day value his support, that, in a short time, he was advanced to a seat at the admiralty-board. No sooner, however, did he become acquainted with the machinations of government, than he retired in disgust; his mind revolting at the measures which were preparing for the disastrous scene of the American war. These measures, however, were said to have been softened down, and he was persuaded to resume his seat. In December, 1772, he was raised to a seat at the treasury-board.

For this he received the taunts of opposition as a placeman, which he repelled in an open ingenuous manner, denying the acceptance of his place to be the price of his services; and declaring, that he should no longer support the measures of government than he found them to be calculated to promote the welfare of the state. He had now a most arduous task to perform; for the incapacity of the ministry was such, as required the greatest talents to cover or excuse them. It is a singular proof of the mutability of human affairs to observe, that Mr. Fox had Lord North for his first colleague, and for his first oratorical adversary, Mr. Burke. It may be well, however, to state, that amidst the keenest wit and powerful arguments which these two great men exercised towards each other, they uniformly avoided every thing personal or invidious, our hero, upon all occasions, treating the splendid abilities of his great opponent with the respect and distinction they so justly merited.

Mr. Fox at length became sincerely attached to Mr. Burke, who had been born in Dublin, January 1, 1730, and derived his descent from a respectable family; his father having been by profession an attorney, in considerable practice in that city. When Mr. Burke had received a liberal education, he repaired to London, early in life, and entered himself in the Temple, where he increased his slender finances, by writing for the newspapers, and other periodical publications. His first acknowledged literary production was "A Vindication of Natural Society," and his second, an "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful." This latter publication gave to his talents the stamp of genius, and during the Rockingham administration he was chosen member of parliament for Windover, in Buckinghamshire, and soon distinguished himself as a decided enemy to American taxation, unattended by representation. In pursuing his parliamentary career, he became an ardent supporter of religious toleration, both as it regarded the catholic and protestant dissenter, and when Sir Henry Houghton made his memorable motion in the house of commons for relieving the dissenters from subscription, and from the penal laws, Mr. Burke, in an energetic oration, exclaimed—"The dissenters enjoy liberty by connivance! and what is liberty by connivance, but a temporary relaxation of slavery?" On the dissolution of parliament, which speedily followed, he was chosen member for Malton, under the auspices of the Marquis of Rockingham, and at the same time was elected, along with Mr. Cruger, representative for the city of Bristol, for which latter place he took his seat. Having given offence to many of his constituents at Bristol, by his defence of the trade of Ireland, he declined to offer himself again to their suffrages on the dissolution of parliament, in 1780. On the admission of the Rockingham party into power, Mr. Burke came into office, and was appointed paymaster-general of the forces. This situation he held till the elevation of Lord Shelburne to the office of premier, when Mr. Burke withdrew from the administration along with his friend Mr. Fox; but on the appointment of the coalition administration, he was again reinstated in his office of paymaster-general. During the existence of this administration, he remained in office; but Mr. Fox's India bill soon removed that ministry of discordant materials from power, and placed Mr. Pitt at the head of the treasury. Soon after the breaking out of the French revolution, Mr. Burke published his celebrated "Reflections," the object of which was to shew that all the measures of the revolutionists tended to anarchy and bloodshed, and that the tremendous event which all Europe had viewed with astonishment, was pregnant with danger to the neighbouring states. On this point Mr. Burke was at issue with his former political connections, and in a debate in the house of commons, on the new constitution of Canada, he observed, that Mr. Fox and he had often differed, and that there had been no less friendship between them: "but," added he, "there is something in the cursed French constitution, which evenenoms every thing." Mr. Fox, in an under voice, said: "there is still no loss of friendship between us."—"Yes," exclaimed Mr. Burke, "there is, I know the price of my conduct; our friendship is at an end." Mr. Fox, who had sustained with composure all the attacks of his political adversaries, was greatly agitated by this renunciation of friendship; "This, this was the unkindest cut of all;" but soon recovering his self-possession, he replied, in terms full of conciliation, maintaining, however, at the same time, that Mr. Burke's former political principles were utterly at variance with his present views and declarations.

The parliamentary labours of Mr. Burke now drew towards a close; and on the termination of the trial of Warren Hastings, in which he had stood forth as one of the principal accusers, he resigned his seat in favor of his only son. This young man, the object of his venerable father's warmest solicitude, was appointed secretary to Lord Fitzwilliam, pending his vice-royalty to Ireland, but his death, on the 2d of August, 1794, put a period to his opening prospects, and inflicted upon his father a shock, from which he never recovered. On the death of his son, the king was pleased to settle upon Mr. Burke and his lady a pension for life.

Mr. Burke possessed abilities of the first order: he had a great compass of mind, a large share of learning, and a never-failing stream of eloquence. He adorned every subject that came under his observation, and enlivened every speech he delivered with the excursions of fancy and the charms of imagery. His quick sensibility, however, rendered his temper irritable; and his contentions in active politics called that infirmity forth, much more frequently than it would have been produced in calmer situations. His invectives, both in speaking and writing, were so bitter and severe, that they seemed to argue a malignity of disposition, though they proceeded only from a ardency of feeling. His political principles were more favorable to the claims of the privileged orders than to popular freedom, and he was a tory in principle when he was a whig in political connections. In the relations of private life, his conduct was highly meritorious.—An affectionate husband; a tender, judicious, and indulgent father; a sincere friend; at once fervid and active; a liberal master; and a zealous and bountiful patron.

The poignancy of Mr. Fox's disappointment, on finding that Mr. Burke had rent asunder a long friendship, may be more easily conceived than expressed; and when he heard that the friend whom for five and twenty years he had never seen without pleasure, nor heard without instruction, was no more!—he wept bitterly.

About the year 1794, Mr. Fox led Mrs. Armistead to the altar, although he did not avow it until eight years afterwards. During the peace of Amiens, Mr. and Mrs. Fox visited Paris, and were received at the court of the First Consul with marks of the highest respect. Immediately after his entering into office, the labor of its duties overpowered his constitution; and, whatever his spirit, his health had been gradually weakening: the first acknowledgment he made of it, however, was in a letter to a friend who had desired his concurrence in an affair of some importance. "My life has been active beyond my strength," said he, "I had almost said, my duty. If I have not acted much, you will allow I have spoken much; and I have felt more than I have either acted or spoken. My constitution has sunk under it. I find myself unequal to the business on which you have written; it must be left to younger men."

Once he employed this remarkable expression.—"Pitt has died in January—perhaps I may go off before June." A gentleman who was in company with him, having made some observation in reply—"Nay," said Mr. Fox, "I begin to think my complaint not unlike Pitt's; my stomach has been long discomposed; I feel my constitution dissolving."

This state of health continued through the month of March, when his friends were convinced he was breaking fast. Still he insisted that his disease was only a temporary habit, and as he happened in May to recover an interval of strength, that circumstance tended to confirm him in his error. The symptoms, however, soon returned with redoubled violence, and he was pronounced, at the latter end of June, to have decided symptoms of dropsy.

The day fixed for the funeral of his remains, was the 10th of October, the anniversary of Mr. Fox's first election for Westminster.

At the commencement of the year 1807, every eye was fixed on the coasts of the Baltic. It was here that the destinies of Europe were to be decided, as they had been in former periods, on those of the Mediterranean. The genius and the resources of the north were brought into conflict with those of the south. A mighty contest was to be decided by arms between Alexander Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia on the one part; and, on the other, Bonaparte Emperor of France, and King of Italy. The latter derived support from the nations whom he had subdued or intimidated. Italy, Spain, Holland, and a great part of Germany: the former depended on the aid of Sweden, and the cordial and vigorous co-operation of Great Britain. There was another ally more powerful than either of the two just mentioned, on which the Russians might, and no doubt did reckon, namely, a rigorous climate to which they themselves were inured, but which might prove fatal to soldiers from France, Spain, and Italy. The enemy, too, in proportion as he should advance into Poland, or beyond it, would be drawn into difficulties and dangers on the line of his operations, in territories with the nature or ground of which he could not be well acquainted, and farther and farther he removed from supplies and reinforcements. The Russians, on the contrary, could receive reinforcements and stores both by land and sea from Russia, Sweden, and England. The young and heroic King of Sweden, emulating his ancestor the great Gustavus Adolphus, with the aid both of a subsidy, and troops from England, might march an army through the Lower Saxony, from Dantzic and Colberg, as far as Hamburgh. This army, augmented in its progress by insurgents, in Hesse, Hanover, and the Prussian dominions, might pass the Elbe, and establish a war in the centre of Germany; where, if able to maintain himself for any length of time, he might reasonably expect to be joined by the Austrians.—Such were the considerations that encouraged and determined the court of St. Petersburg to undertake and persevere in the war with France.

Bonaparte, sensible of the disadvantages of being placed at so great a distance from France as the countries between the Vistula and the Niemen, was in the first place, and, above all things, attentive to the means of conveyance, or what in the French armies is called the Ambulance. On the great roads between the Rhine and the Vistula, hundreds and thousands of carriages were every where to be seen, going or returning from Thorn and Warsaw. Travellers unacquainted with the state of public affairs in Germany and Poland, might have supposed that the continued motion on the highways was occasioned by a flourishing internal commerce. From the countries that lay at his mercy, Bonaparte drew provisions and forage, and even additions to his military force, while, at the same time, one body of troops after another continued to march for his support from the frontier of France.

The French emperor was also, in a very particular manner, attentive to the commissary department. The different corps and divisions of his army were sure to find bread, at least, in abundance, and, as much as possible, every comfort required by a rigorous climate. Being intimately acquainted with the interests and views of the courts of Europe, and the individual characters of favorites and ministers, he endeavoured, if he could not at once induce them to acquiesce in his plans, at least to occupy, and distract their minds, and, by an appearance of negotiation, to sow the seeds of mutual discord between the powers confederated, or that might be inclined to confederate against him. At the same time that he was busily employed in forming the confederation of the Rhine, that is, in the extension of his own power, and preparing for the extension of his conquests, he amused Russia and England with a negotiation for peace which he professed to have had always uppermost in his mind and heart, but which he really contemplated not as an end, but a means: the means of renewing war with greater advantage. He labored, by all means, to detach the King of Sweden from the cause of his allies, by professions of good-will, respect, and admiration, and even by dismemberments in his favor of Prussia and Denmark. He roused the Turks to war against Russia, and entered into a negotiation for an alliance offensive and defensive with the Emperor of Persia. Ambassadors were seen in his camp from Ispahan and Constantinople.

Vaunting was on every occasion had recourse to by the French government. Eighty-four pieces of cannon, taken from the Russian generals Kamenskoy, Bennigsen, and Buxhoeveden; in the battles of Czarnowo, Nasielsk, Pultusk, and Golyinin, were ranged before the palace of the republic of Warsaw. And that the effect which the sight of so grand a triumph was fitted to produce might be the greater, it was observed, "That they were the very same that the Russians drew along the streets of that city with so much ostentation, when lately they marched through them to meet the French." In order to heighten the exultation, it was stated, "that 5,000 prisoners had been sent to France, that 2,000 had escaped in the first moments of confusion, and 1,500 entered among the Polish troops. Thus had the battles with the Russians cost them a great part of their artillery, all their baggage, and from 25,000 to 30,000 men, killed, wounded, or prisoners." It is well known that Gazettes were strongly inclined to magnify advantages gained on one side, and exaggerate losses sustained on the other.

Bonaparte, at the same time, inflamed the military ardour of his troops, and the whole French nation, with whose character he was thoroughly acquainted, through their characteristic vanity and love of distinction. Though naturally of a reserved, saturnine, and sullen humour, he would now and then, in meetings with his principal officers, and others, assume a familiar talkative humour, and make many sarcastic observations on the character and conduct of his enemies. He indulged in many gasconades, magnifying the prowess of Frenchmen, and the power and resources of France, beyond all measure or moderation. The same tone of exultation, braggadocio, and confidence, appeared in all his gazettes or manifestoes which were called bulletins: the object of all which was not only to keep up and exalt the courage of the French, but to strike awe and terror into other nations.

While the French Emperor advanced against the Russians and Prussians in front, with Sweden assailing, and Great Britain menacing his left wing, there was reason for the apprehension of hostility in various shapes on his right flank and in his rear. Above all, an attack, in case of any disaster, was to be apprehended from Austria. For this reason he still retained possession of the fortress of Brannau, and an army of 40,000 men in Dalmatia, which might be strengthened by reinforcements from Italy, turned the flank of the defence of Austria, and even menaced its capital.

After the battle of Pultusk, the French retired into winter-quarters on the Vistula. The Russians fell back by Ostrolenka, on the Niemen. The King and Queen of Prussia, with the ministry, the treasure, the most valuable property, and a guard of 1,500 troops, foot and horse, retreated to Memel. The other troops remaining to the King of Prussia were 5,000, under the command of General Lestocq, the greater part of which remained in Koningsberg. There was a garrison of 6,000 Prussians in Dantzic, of 2,000 at Colberg, and of 3,000 at Graudenz, and from 15 to 20,000 were dispersed in the different garrisons of Silesia. A military officer from England encouraged the king in this extremity, when he was literally cooped up in the most remote and smallest corner of his kingdom, with the promise of assistance in both money and troops, and the immediate advance of 80,000*l.* for maintaining the garrisons in Silesia. The Russian army was computed by some at 160,000; by others at not more than 100,000.

The strength of the French army was estimated by some at above 200,000; by none at less than 150,000. Reinforcements of troops advanced from time to time during the whole of the campaign, to both armies.

The grand Russian army, towards the end of January, was supported on one side by a corps of Russians and Prussians, under the Generals Lestocq, Pahlen, and Gallitzin, flanked on their right by the Frisch-haff, a bay or arm of the sea between Koningsberg and Elbing, and the Pregel, and covered on its left flank by a corps under General Van Essen, originally destined against Moldavia. The command of the army, after the battle of Pultusk, was given to General Bennigsen, who had formed a junction with General Buxhoeveden, after his defeat at Golymin. The plan of the Russian general was, to turn the left flank of the French army, to extend his force along the river, to Graudenz and Thorn, to reduce the enemy to a necessity of evacuating Poland, to straiten his quarters, and by all means drive him into positions of difficulty and disadvantage.

As the eye of the Russian general was fixed on the Vistula, so that of Bonaparte was directed to the Pregel and the Niemen. Perceiving that it was the design of the Russians to give him no rest in his winter-quarters, he determined, according to his usual system, to take the advantage of an assailant, and to anticipate an attack, by making one. In the distribution of the French in their winter-quarters, one of the corps into which the army was divided, under the command of Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo, took possession of Elbing, where there were immense magazines filled with all manner of stores and provisions, and occupied the country around, on the shores of the Baltic. This corps, which was to be supported by that of Marshal Ney, posted on the right banks of the Alla, was ordered to surprise Koningsberg, with its valuable magazines; which was attempted. But the French marshals were discomfited in the very outset of their enterprise, by the rapid advance of the Russians under the Counts Pahlen and Gallitzin, who, on the 24th of January, compelled Marshal Ney to abandon his posts on the Alla, and to retire by the way of Allenstein, behind the Dribentz, a river which runs into the Vistula, six miles south-east from Thorn; where he joined the corps under the Grand Duke of Berg, Murat. The Russian general having for some time made a show of following up his attack on the troops under Marshal Ney, bore with all his force on the detachment under the Prince of Ponte Corvo, whom he met at Mohringen, where he had established his headquarters, pushing his out-posts to the distance of a league, that is, about three English miles from the town on the road to Liebstadt.

The Russian general Markow, with a division of the corps under the command of the Counts Pahlen and Gallitzin, attacked the French at Mohringen, January 25. After a very sharp action, in which the eagle of the 9th regiment of the French infantry was taken, the Russians were repulsed. But being afterwards reinforced by a division of cavalry, under General Anrep, the battle was renewed. In these actions at Mohringen, the French, according to the Russian accounts, lost more than 1,000 men, in killed and wounded; the Russians, according to the French accounts, left 12,000 dead on the field of battle, and among these, General Anrep, whose death was greatly deplored by the whole Russian army.

During the action or actions near Mohringen, Prince Michael Dolgorowki, with his regiment of dragoons, went round to the rear of the enemy, made his way to head-quarters without being perceived, and carried off the French marshal's equipage, his plate, some ladies, and a large sum of money, part of the pillage of Elbing. A great number of prisoners also fell into the hands of the Russians, among whom were three generals, including General Victor, who was taken by a small party belonging to the Prussian garrison of Colberg, as he was on his way to take the command of the army besieging Dantzic.

The Russian and French details of the battle of Mohringen, though different, were not very inconsistent in any material point, except that both parties claimed the victory. But judging from the immediate result of the action, we must conclude that it was in favor of the Russians. The French did not pretend that the Russians fell back beyond Liebstadt, which was only six or seven miles from the field of action; whereas, Bernadotte, according to their own accounts, retreated to Strasburg, on the Dribentz, which is situated at the distance of sixty miles from Mohringen.

The defeat of the plan, intended to have been executed by a detachment of the army under Bernadotte, in concert with Ney, and the consequent advance of the Russians on the Vistula, roused Bonaparte from his temporary repose at Warsaw, and called into exertion all the energies of his character. The corps under General Van Essen, that covered the left flank of the Russian army, was posted at too great a distance from its main body to answer the purpose for which it was intended: and Bonaparte, with his usual decision and promptitude, took advantage of this circumstance. He broke up his cantonments on January the 29th and 30th. A corps under the command of General Savary was ordered to watch the movements of Van Essen, who was posted at Wisochi Massawick on the heights of the Bug; and another under Marshal Le Febvre at Thorn, to keep in check the Russians and Prussians at Culm, and Marienwerder: thus to secure for Bonaparte a safe retreat across the Vistula, in the case of a failure in his attempt on the main body of the Russian army.

Bonaparte having marched the flower of his army to one point, was determined to attack the centre of the Russian army. The corps thus concentrated, were those of the Marshals Davoust, Ney, Soult, and Augereau, computed to be about 80,000; the imperial guard under Marshal Bessieres, 15,000 strong, and the cavalry of reserve, under Murat, or, as the bulletins styled him, the Grand Duke of Berg; which, at the opening of the campaign, consisted of 240 squadrons, that is, 36,000, but which must have been greatly diminished, perhaps by one-third, during its progress. This force of about 120,000 horsemen and foot, exceeded the army to which it was opposed, by a much greater number than what might be supposed to be necessary to so consummate a leader of such gallant and well-disciplined troops. But Bonaparte was not more distinguished by any qualities than prudence and precaution. He was careful to provide rather a redundancy than a bare sufficiency of means for the accomplishment of his ends. He provided against reverses, and though he always boasted of the favor, he never, if he could help it, trusted to the caprice of fortune.

The Russian army was on its march to the Vistula, by the way of Wildenberg, a town sixty miles N. E. of Warsaw. At this place, the rendezvous of the French, Murat had assembled all his cavalry on the 29th; in the neighbourhood of which the other corps were also concentrated, and where Bonaparte, in person, arrived from Warsaw, on the 31st. It was his object to penetrate between the centre and the left of the Russians, and to take such positions between them and the Pregel, as should enable him to cut off their retreat.

The French army began its march on the 1st of February, taking its route from Wildenberg to Passenheim, a town which is the key to the great road that passes between the extensive lakes which form the sources of the river Alla, before-mentioned, which falls into the Pregel five leagues above Koningsberg. At Passenheim the French fell in with the Russians, who had hitherto persevered in the system of making, instead of receiving, the attack. But the Grand Duke of Berg attacked with several columns of the cavalry, and entered the town sword in hand. On February 3, in the morning, the Russians were on the Lower Vistula, which they had determined to pass, but where they now found that they had been turned on their left flank: their left wing supported itself in the village of Moudtken, and their centre was placed at Jowkowo on the great road to Liebstadt.

Bonaparte having repaired to the village of Getkendorff, formed a part of his forces in order of battle, placing the corps of Marshal Augereau in the centre, that of Marshal Soult on the right, and the imperial guard as a body of reserve. He gave orders to Marshal Soult to advance by the way of Gulstadt, and make himself master of the bridge of Bergfried, that he might fall on the rear of the enemy with the whole force of the army.

Marshal Soult dispatched General Guyot with his light cavalry, to take possession of Gulstadt, the centre of the Russian magazines; which he effected, though not without an obstinate resistance on the part of the enemy. Of the Russians 1,600 were made prisoners. The Russian magazines at Liebstadt and Allenstein were also taken. In the meantime Marshal Soult, with the other two divisions of his corps, hastened to the bridge of Bergfried.—The Russians, who were sensible of the importance of this place, for protecting the retreat of their left wing, defended the bridge with twelve of their best battalions. At three in the afternoon, a cannonade was opened on both sides. The Russians, after a severe conflict, and a heavy loss in killed and wounded, were driven from the bridge; but they retreated in good order. They were followed by Marshal Ney, and some skirmishing took place. But night overtook the French and Russian detachments facing each other.

On the morning of the 4th of February, Murat, at the head of his cavalry, reconnoitered the position which the Russians had occupied the preceding day, and found that they had employed the night in retreating, and had left behind only the rear-guard, which followed, and which was fiercely pursued, fighting all the way for six hours. The difficulty of the ground, according to the French accounts, prevented their cavalry from doing the enemy much injury. In fact, the French cavalry were repulsed; though an attempt was made to veil the discomfiture, by ascribing their want of success to the nature of the ground.

In the meantime, General Van Essen harassed the French corps that was opposed to him by frequent detachments; and though the country occupied by that corps was defended by the natural fortresses of woods and morasses, carried off, at different times, numbers of prisoners. When he received intelligence that Bonaparte had set out from Warsaw, and marched against General Bennigsen, at the head of a force greatly superior to that of the Russians, being desirous of making a diversion in favour of the main army, he attacked the French, February 3, on the whole extent of their line, defeated them at all points, and drove the Generals Savary, Suchet, and Becker, back on the Narew.

On the night of the 4th of February, Bonaparte slept at Schlett, but his advanced guard pushed on to Deppen. On the 5th, the whole French army was again in motion. While this advanced, the enemy constantly retreated, falling back by the way of Arensdorf and Landsberg, in the direction of the Pregel; except one column, which had not passed the river Alla, and was thus cut off from the main body of the Russians, by the left of the French army. The emperor therefore ordered the Grand Duke of Berg, with the Marshals Soult and Davoust, to follow the main body of the enemy; and Marshal Ney, with one division of light cavalry, and another of dragoons, to attack the cut-off column. The grand duke, on the heights of Waterdorf, fell in with seven or eight thousand of Russian cavalry; which, after sustaining and repelling several charges, were at last forced to retreat.

Ney came up at Deppen with the advanced guard of the column just mentioned, which, finding itself to be surrounded, adopted the bold resolution of cutting their way through the French corps, but met death on the points of their bayonets. The other part of the column, learning the fate of the advanced guard, retreated in confusion, with the loss of their standards, cannon, and baggage.

On the morning of February 6, the French army marched in pursuit of the enemy; the Grand Duke of Berg, with Marshal Soult's corps, in the direction to Landsberg, that of Marshal Davoust towards Heilsberg, and that of Marshal Ney to prevent the escape of the Russian corps that had been cut off from the main army at Deppen.

The Grand Duke of Berg came up with the rear-guard of the Russians, commanded by General Barclay de Tolly, between Glandau and Hoff, and immediately attacked it. For the support of this, several lines of cavalry were drawn up, with the heights of Landsberg in front; and their right and their left were flanked on the one side by a small conical hill, and on the other by a wood. After repeated attacks on these two wings had been repulsed, the French dragoons and cuirassiers of General Hautpoul's division fiercely charged, overthrew, and destroyed two regiments of Russian infantry. Their cannon and colours were taken, with all their colonels, and the greater part of their officers. The main Russian army made a movement for the support of the rear-guard. The French corps, under Marshal Soult and Marshal Augereau, took a position on the left of the enemy, and occupied the village of Hoff. The Russian general perceiving the advantage of this position, sent ten battalions to retake it. But the Grand Duke of Berg, making a second charge with his cuirassiers, attacked this party in flank, and cut them to pieces. The Russians filed off in the night.

Such was the French account; but the advantages gained were without doubt greatly exaggerated, for it was noticed in the same bulletin, as a remarkable circumstance, that part of the two armies passed the night between the 6th and 7th in the presence of each other. It appeared evidently, that this engagement of Hoff was a drawn battle, and that the Russians never quitted the field the day on which they fought. If the main army had filed off in the night, leaving only a post quite close to, and in the very presence of, the enemy, as a forlorn hope, that post, separated from the rest of the army, must have fallen into the hands of the enemy, which would have been announced as a matter of great triumph.—From the moment that General Bennigsen ascertained the great numerical force opposed to him, he prudently adopted the plan of retreating on the Pregel, which he did, fighting all the way, though not without very great loss, yet with invincible valour and resolution.

In pursuance of this plan, on the morning of the 7th of February, before break of day, the whole Russian army filed off to take up a new and advantageous position at the little town of Eylau. Between this town and the wood near Hoff, just mentioned, the rear-guard of the Russians was attacked by the French, and a part of it made prisoners. The van-guard of the French, pursuing their advantage, discovered that the Russians had posted themselves behind the town. Both sides prepared for battle. At the distance of a quarter of a league from this place, is a rising ground or flattish hill, which, in the military phraseology of the French, is called a plateau, (platform) which commands the entrance into the plain or valley in which it is situated. This eminence was defended by three Russian regiments. These three regiments were attacked by an equal number of French. A column of Russian cavalry took the assailants in flank, and threw one of their battalions into great confusion. Some squadrons of dragoons, commanded by General Klein, came up in time for the relief of this disordered column. The Russians, however, maintained their ground on the eminence.

But in Eylau, where the Russians wished to maintain themselves, but which the French were eager to possess, before the commencement of the general battle, the contest was most sanguinary. The Russians had placed some regiments in a church and the yard around it. There they made a most obstinate resistance, and the post was not taken till after a dreadful carnage on both sides, at ten o'clock at night. The night was spent by the two armies under the bare canopy of heaven, facing each other. One division of the French army, under Le Grand, was posted in front of the village; and one under Saint-Hilaire, on its right. The corps of Augereau was placed on its left. That of Davoust had been detached in the evening, to stretch beyond Eylau, and to come round and fall on the left flank of the Russians, if they should not have changed their position. Marshal Ney was likewise in motion to outflank and fall on them on the right.

On the following morning, (February 8) the Russians commenced the attack with a brisk cannonade on the village of Eylau, and by the divisions under Saint-Hilaire. The emperor, with his guards, took post in the church and burying-ground, which the Russians had so well defended the day before.

To the military eye of Bonaparte, the hill commanding the entrance into the plain, which the French had failed to carry the day before, presented itself still as the most important object of attack. Till this should be carried, the centre of his army could not act offensively against the enemy: for, in order to do this, it was necessary that it should stretch into the plain. Marshal Augereau was therefore ordered to advance with his corps, and to open a cannonade against this commanding spot, with forty pieces of artillery belonging to the imperial guard. A terrible cannonade ensued on both sides. The armies being within half a gun-shot of each other, every shot took effect, and the slaughter on both sides was dreadful. At one time it appeared, from the movements of the Russians, that, impatient of suffering so much without any decisive result, they had a mind to outflank the French on their left wing. But, in the same instant, Marshal Davoust, with his sharp-shooters, appeared, and fell on their rear. Upon this, Augereau's corps filed off in column, to attack and occupy the centre of the Russian army, which might otherwise have overwhelmed Davoust with superior numbers. At the same time, the division under Saint-Hilaire filed off to the right to support Davoust, and eventually to facilitate a junction between Davoust and Augereau, should his assistance become necessary.

No sooner had these movements commenced, than so thick a fall of snow covered the two armies, that they could not see beyond the distance of two feet. The point of direction was lost, and the French columns, inclining too much to the left, wandered about in uncertainty. This darkness lasted half an hour. When the weather cleared up, 20,000 Russian infantry, supported by cavalry and artillery, by beginning to turn, threatened the division of Saint-Hilaire with excision.—At this moment, when destruction hovered over the French army, the greater part of which was straggling in columns, incapable of supporting one another, the cavalry under Murat, supported by the imperial guard under Bessieres, coming round about the division of Saint-Hilaire, extricated the French from their critical situation, by making a desperate and successful charge on the formidable mass of the Russian infantry. The Russian cavalry, who endeavoured to oppose this manœuvre, were routed with great slaughter. Two lines of infantry were broken; and the third falling back, supported themselves on a wood.

The issue of the battle, which had been long doubtful, was decided from the moment that Davoust, whose progress was greatly impeded by the weather, was at last enabled to fall upon the rear of the enemy, according to his orders, and drive them from the hilly ground or platform. The Russians, after repeated attempts to repulse that general, retreated, leaving their wounded and sixteen pieces of cannon on the field of battle.

In a contest, maintained for twelve hours, during the whole of which 300 pieces of cannon vomited death from the opposite lines so near each other, the number of killed and wounded on either side could not be otherwise than very great. The loss of the French, according to their own accounts consisted, exactly in 1,000 killed and 5,700 wounded, including 1090 so severely as to be rendered for ever unfit for service; and that of the Russians in 7,000 left dead on the field of battle. Among the wounded on the side of the French, were four colonels and five generals, one of whom was Marshal Angereau, and another General Hautpoul, who died of his wounds. In the number of the killed, were four colonels. The eagle of one of the French battalions, according to their own accounts, was lost; that is, no doubt, it was taken by the enemy. "Thus, the Russian expedition, which set out on the 27th of January, and which had for its object to stretch out towards Thorn, and turn our left wing, has proved exceedingly fatal to them. It has cost the enemy from 12 to 15,000 prisoners, as many in killed and missing, forty-five pieces of artillery, and eighteen standards."

Very different from this was the account given of the battle of Eylau by the Russian general, who, in a letter dated on the field of battle, at Prussian Eylau, 8th of February, 1807, assured the Emperor, that the enemy had been completely defeated; that 1,000 prisoners, and twelve standards, which he had the honor to send to his imperial majesty, had fallen into the hands of the conquerors. He had been attacked, he said, that day, on his centre and both his wings, by Bonaparte in person, who, however, had been beaten back at all points, and every where defeated. His guards had attacked the centre of the Russians several times, and as often been repulsed: several columns of French infantry, and regiments of cuirassiers, had been destroyed. The loss of the Russians he believed might exceed 6,000 men; but that he might estimate, without exaggeration, the loss of the enemy at more than 12,000.

The character and result of this memorable battle were exhibited with great candour, in a letter written by a Russian officer of the army, three days after the contest. "Our army has performed prodigies of valour; though our loss has been very great. It is generally agreed, that it was a miracle we did not lose more: which is ascribed to the excellent discipline and order which prevailed even in the hottest of the action, and in the midst of such a fire as was never perhaps witnessed before. For these three days we have been enquiring of each other, on which side the victory lay? This question may appear singular: but in truth it is impossible for me to say which of the two armies fought with the greater courage and obstinacy, and did the greater mischief to the other." It is a very remarkable circumstance, in the battle of Eylau, that there was little or no engagement between the infantry of the two armies. The battle was fought by the artillery and cavalry. The day after the battle presented a horrid scene of dead and dying men: to bury all the dead required immense labour. A great number of Russian slain were found with the insignia of their orders. Forty-eight hours after the battle, there were still upwards of 500 wounded Russians, whom the French had not been able to carry off. Brandy and bread were taken to them, and they were successively carried to the ambulance, or train of carriages. On the space of a square league were seen 9 or 10,000 dead bodies; 4 or 5,000 horses killed; whole lines of Russian knapsacks; broken pieces of muskets and sabres; the ground covered with cannon-balls, howitzer-shells, and ammunition; twenty-four pieces of cannon, near which lay the bodies of their drivers, killed at the moment when they were endeavouring to carry them off. All this was the more conspicuous, as the ground was covered with snow. The 500 wounded Russians were all conveyed in sledges to Thorn, and to the French hospitals, on the left bank of the Vistula. The surgeons observed, with astonishment, that the fatigue of this conveyance did no harm to the wounded.

At the same time that Marshal Davoust attacked the elevated ground, the possession of which was so warmly disputed, Marshal Ney came round by Altorf, driving before him the same column which he had attacked at Deppen, and, in the evening, occupied the village of Schoneditton. The Russian general therefore, harassed on his flanks by Davoust and Ney, who threatened to cut off his rear-guard, ordered several battalions of grenadiers to make an attack on Schoneditton; which was accordingly made at eight o'clock at night, but without effect. The next day, (February 9) the Russians were pursued as far as the river Frischeling, while they retreated behind the Pregel. The French gazette said, in conclusion, "The expedition is ended. The enemy is beaten and driven back eighty leagues from the Vistula. The French army is going to return to its winter-quarters."

That the main body of the Russian army—not absolutely the whole, as will presently appear, were forced to fall back eighty leagues from the Vistula, is true, but it is also true, that Bonaparte did not find himself in a condition, at this time, again to attack them, and hazard another battle. The Russian army, without any material loss, effected its retreat to Koningsberg.

Bonaparte was now only a short distance from Koningsberg, a grand depository of the enemy. The steeples of this place, which had been held out as a rich prey to the French soldiers, were to be seen from the heights of Eylau. Nothing could have been more desirable than to take a place which would at once have been a most advantageous military position, furnished abundance of provisions and stores, and gratified the army by pillage. And that the reduction of Königsberg was accordingly, in fact, his object, appeared from a letter addressed to the Empress Josephine, by Berthier, Prince of Neuf-Chatel, the most confidential minister of Bonaparte, on the evening before the battle, dated at Great Glandau, February 7. "At the approach of his imperial majesty, the Russian army fell back. On the evening of the 6th he had passed Landsberg, with the intention of continuing his retreat during the night. The emperor, who commanded the advanced guard, ordered an attack on the rear of the Russians, which had been lately reinforced. It was unable to resist the vigour of an attack conducted by his majesty in person.—To-morrow we shall be at Königsberg." And an attempt on Königsberg would, no doubt, have been made, if, after the battle of Eylau, Bonaparte had conceived that he possessed means for accomplishing his object. But this was, in truth, a drawn battle; and the severest check he had as yet received since the commencement of his career.

It was not, however, without some degree of plausibility that both sides claimed the victory, or at least a discomfiture of the design of their opponents. It was the intent of Bonaparte to take Königsberg. He was forced to fall back on the Vistula. It was the design of the Russians to drive the French back beyond the Vistula, to retake Elbing and Thorn, and to force them to raise the sieges of Colberg, Graudenz, and Dantzic. By a series of successive actions, they had been driven back by the French as far as Eylau, and on the day after the battle, beyond the Pregel. The French had buried the Russian dead; collected and taken care of the greatest part of their wounded, taken a number of their cannon dismounted in the action; and, finally, remained seven or eight days on the field of battle.

The relative positions in which the French and Russians were placed after the battle of Eylau, were not misunderstood by Bonaparte; who, according to his usual policy on all great crises, dispatched Bertrand, a general of division, to the Russian commander-in-chief, with some overtures of a pacific nature. But General Benningsen, in the true spirit of a gallant soldier, replied, that he had been sent by his master not to negotiate, but to fight. Bertrand was then ordered to proceed from Königsberg to Memel, with the same overtures to the King of Prussia; with whom he had not greater success than with the Russian chief. Bonaparte endeavoured, however, after these repulses, to make it believed in Germany, that both the Prussians and Russians were desirous of peace, and that treaties were on the point of being concluded. It was given out in his newspapers, that Duroc had gone to St. Petersburg, and that the King of Prussia was governed by the counsel of Lombard, Beyme, and Kockyriz, the men who, together with Haugwitz and Lucchesini, had theretofore managed, as he wished, the court of Berlin. He was desirous to spread a conviction that he possessed the same influence at the court of Memel. Thus he hoped to sow the seeds of jealousy among the allies, and to deter any of the German states from insurrection, on the reliance of support from powers with whom he was likely, very soon, to be on terms of peace, amity, and even in alliance.

The Russians were not induced by the battle of Eylau, and the necessity their main army was under of retreating behind the Pregel, to give up their original plan of acting on the offensive against the French, and harassing them without ceasing, by all means and at all seasons. While the main army of the French still lay at Eylau, 3,000 Russian prisoners were rescued by a squadron of Cossacks, 1,000 strong, at Wildenbergh, from fifteen to twenty leagues on this side of Eylau, on the Omulcio, to the south-west of the lakes of Passenheim. General Van Essen, February 15, at the head of 25,000, advanced to Ostrolenka, along the two banks of the Narew. At the village of Flakis Law-owa he met the advanced guard of General Savary, who commanded the fifth corps of the French army. On the 16th, at day-break, General Gazan with a part of his division moving towards the advanced guard, met with the enemy on the way to Novogorod, attacked and defeated him. But at the same moment, the Russians by the left bank attacked Ostrolenka, which was defended by General Campana, with a brigade of the division of General Gazan, and General Ruffin, with a brigade of the division of General Oudinot. The Russian infantry advanced in several columns. They were suffered to come fairly within the town, as far as half the length of the streets; when they were charged by the French with fixed bayonets. Thrice did the Russians make an attack on the French, and were as often repulsed, leaving the streets covered with the dead. Their loss was so great that they were forced to abandon the town, and take a position behind the sand-hills which cover it.

The divisions of Generals Suchet and Oudinot advanced, and at noon the heads of their columns arrived at Ostrolenka. General Savary drew up his army in the following manner. General Oudinot commanded the left in two lines; General Suchet the centre; and the General of division Reille, chief of the staff of the army, commanding a brigade of the division of Gazan, formed the right. He covered himself with all his artillery, and marched against the enemy. General Oudinot putting himself at the head of the cavalry, made a successful charge, and cut in pieces the Russian Cossacks of the rear-guard.

A very brisk fire was kept up for a considerable time by both parties. The Russians at last gave way on all sides, and were followed fighting for three leagues. The loss of the Russians was 1,300 killed, among whom were two generals, above 1,200 taken, seven pieces of cannon and two standards. The French, according to their accounts, had only sixty men killed, and among these, the general of brigade Campana, an officer of great merit, and it is observed, a native of the department of Maringo.

At Gattenfield, February the 12th, 500 French soldiers were made prisoners by Platoff, hetman of the Cossacks. On the same day a division of one of the French corps marched to Marienwerder, situated on a small river, called the Leibe, not far from its junction with the Vistula, thirty-four miles south from Dantzic, and forty-four north-east of Thorn. Seven Prussian squadrons, found at this place, were attacked and routed, and 300 men with 250 horses taken. The rest of the Prussians making their escape, took refuge in Dantzic.

On the 16th of February, the day before Bonaparte began to march from Eylau, for the disposition of his troops in winter-quarters, he thought it proper to counteract any notion that might be entertained of this being a retreat, and to keep up the courage of his army, by assuming a very lofty air of triumph, which he did in the following proclamation, dated Prussian Eylau, February 16.

"Soldiers, we had begun to enjoy a little repose in our winter-quarters, when the enemy attacked the first corps, and shewed themselves on the Lower Vistula. We broke up and marched against him; we have pursued him, sword in hand, eighty leagues; he has fled to his strong holds, and retired beyond the Pregel. In the battles of Bergfried, Deppen, Hoff, and Eylau, we have taken from him sixty-five pieces of cannon, and sixteen standards, besides the loss of more than 40,000 men, in killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. The heroes, who, on our side, remain in the bed of honor, have died a glorious death. It is the death of a true soldier. Their relatives will always have a just claim to our care and beneficence. Having thus defeated all the enterprises of the enemy, we shall return towards the Vistula, and resume our winter-quarters. Those who shall dare to disturb these quarters, shall have reason to repent: for whether beyond the Vistula, or on the other side of the Danube, whether in the middle of winter or the beginning of autumn, we will still be found French soldiers, and soldiers of the grand army."

The first and leading consideration in the choice of positions for winter-quarters for the French army, was, to cover the line of the Vistula, and to favor the reduction of Colberg, Graudenz, and above all of Dantzic. It was therefore concentrated in cantonments, behind, that is, to the westward of the Passarge, a small river which, passing by the town of Braunsberg, discharges itself, a little below this place, into Frisch-haaf. The Prince of Ponte Corvo, Bernadotte, with his corps, lay at Prussian Holland, and Braunsberg; Marshal Soult, with his, at Leibstadt and Mohrungen; Marshal Ney, at Gutstadt; Marshal Davoust, at Allenstein, Hohenstein, and Deppen; a Polonese corps of observation, commanded by General Zayoncheek, at Nidenbourg; Marshal Le Febvre before Dantzic; the 5th corps of the French army was stationed at Omulew; and the 8th, as a corps of observation, in Swedish Pomerania. There was a corps under Jerome, or Prince Jerome Bonaparte, employed in the reduction of the fortresses of Silesia. The Bavarian division, commanded by the heir-apparent, or as the French style him, the Crown-Prince of Bavaria, serving under Jerome, lay at this time at Warsaw, and was on its route to-join the French army. There was still a strong garrison at Thorn, where General Rapp, Bonaparte's aide-de-camp, was appointed governor, in the room of Marshal Le Febvre, now employed in the siege of Dantzic. The head-quarters were at Osterode, nearly equidistant between Thorn, which formed as it were a bastion, on the right of the French, supposing their eye still directed to the east, and Marienwerder, and Elbing with the Isle of Nogat, which supported the left. And, for maintaining a communication between the opposite banks of the Vistula, as well as for securing a retreat, in case of any disaster, in the course of future operations, the têtes-du-pont, or fortified bridges, at Praga, Modlin, Dirchaw, in the palatinate of Ulm and Thorn, were put in a proper state of defence, and new ones constructed at Marienburg, and Marienwerder. From the country around Marienwerder, and Elbing, which, particularly the Isle of Nogat, is exceedingly fertile, the French army was abundantly supplied with provisions.

It was now the immediate object of Bonaparte to refresh and recruit his army, and to secure the possession or command of the countries he had over-run, by reducing the Prussian fortresses that still held out on the Vistula and the Oder. But the Russians, determined and resolute in their purpose to give him no rest, engaged the French in continued skirmishes, and in some very sharp actions, which were attended with considerable loss to both parties.

On the 26th of February, a Russian detachment marched against Braunsberg, the head, that is, the most advanced or easterly of the French cantonments. Bonaparte being informed of this, gave orders to the Prince of Ponte Corvo, that it should be attacked; the excution of which orders was committed to General Dupont, an officer of great merit, who on the same day, at two o'clock in the afternoon, attacked the Russian detachment, which was 10,000 strong, overthrew it with fixed bayonets, drove it from the town, and across the Passarge, took sixteen pieces of cannon, and two stands of colours, and made 2,000 prisoners.

On the side of Gutstadt, General Leger Belair, on receiving advice that a Russian column had arrived during the night at Peterswalde, repaired to that village at day-break on the 25th; overthrew it, took the general, Baron de Korff, who commanded it, with his staff, several lieutenant-colonels and other officers, and 400 men.

After the affairs of Braunsberg and Peterswald, for the encouragement of the French no doubt, particularly the conscripts for the year, whose services were now to be called for, though six months before the time fixed by the constitution, a statement was published of all the pieces of cannon taken from the enemy by the French, since their arrival on the Vistula. In the engagements of Pultusk and Golymin, they had taken eighty-nine pieces of cannon; at the engagement of Bergfried, four pieces; in the retreat of Allenstein, five pieces; at the engagement of Deppen, sixteen pieces; at the engagement of Hoff, twelve pieces; at the battle of Eylau, twenty-four pieces; at the engagement of Ostrolenka, nine pieces; and at that of Braunsberg, six pieces; in all, 175 pieces of cannon. It must be owned that an account of the cannon taken from the enemy was a more satisfactory proof of success, than of the numbers said to be killed and wounded: for the cannon could be produced, as vouchers of its accuracy.

The French gazettes accordingly stated how the cannon taken was disposed of.

The attempts of the Russians, on the Lower Vistula, being frustrated by the engagements of Bergfried, Deppen, and Hoff, and the great battle of Eylau, Bonaparte was at leisure to form the blockade, and to push the siege of Dantzic. The proper positions being taken, and works necessary for the complete investment of this place constructed, trenches were opened before it on the night between the 2d and 3d of April. But it was necessary, for carrying on the siege, to bring battering cannon from the fortresses of Silesia, upwards of one hundred leagues. Part of this artillery arrived on the 12th, and the rest on the 24th.

Bonaparte, that he might be nearer to Graudenz and Dantzic, had by this time moved his headquarters from Osterode to the castle of Finkenstein. The grand French army formed a semicircle around the corps under Le Febvre, employed in besieging those two fortresses; which corps was composed chiefly of Polanders, Hessians, Badenese, and other troops of the confederation of the Rhine. The left wing extended from Elbing to Braunsberg, along the course of the Passarge, on which were constructed têtes-du-pont, as far as Gutstadt. The centre retired a little behind this line to Prussian Holland, Leibstadt, and Mohringen. From Gutstadt, the army extended by a chain of posts to Allenstein; and the left wing communicated through Ortelsburg, with the left of the corps of Massena, whose right was posted on the river Bug, and stretched from thence to the mouth of the Narew. The left wing of the French, for the whole extent of the line along the Passarge, was covered with a great number of entrenchments and batteries. In front of the centre and the right wing, were vast forests and morasses. For security against accidents in the rear, a post was occupied between the Passarge and the Vistula, and here were established some magazines.

The right wing of the allied army, composed of the wrecks of the Prussians, and who had not been engaged in the battle of Jena, extended from the Frisch-haaf along the right bank of the Passarge, as far as Wormditt. At this place, the channel of the river was both so shallow and so narrow, that deserters were in the practice of fording it. The Prussians were a fine body of men, loyal, brave, and well disciplined. They were under the immediate command of General Blücher.

The Russian army occupied Wormditt, and stretched from thence over Heilsberg, Bartenstein, and Schippenbell. Before the centre, and each of the wings of the Russian army, there was an advanced guard. The left wing was commanded by Platoff, hetman or chief of the Cossacks, who pushed detachments as far as Ortelsburg, where several actions took place; while on every other part of the line there was a tacit armistice. A considerable body of Russians, also a recent reinforcement, was stationed near the Narew.

Besides the grand French army opposed to the line of the Russo-Prussian, there was the corps of Le Febvre, before Dantzic and Colberg, already mentioned. There was an army also, noticed before, of Bavarians and Wirtembergers, under Prince Jerôme, in Silesia, occupied in completing the reduction of the fortresses. And, in addition to the whole, a grand army of observation had begun to assemble from different, and some of those very remote countries under the orders of Marshal Brune, in Pomerania, whose headquarters were established provisionally at Stettin. This army, when completed, was to be 80,000 strong, half French troops, the other half confederates of the Rhine, Hollanders, and Spaniards. The Germans that formed part of the army of observation, were furnished chiefly by the King of Bavaria, the Grand Duke of Baden, and the Grand Duke of Wurtzburg. The King of Wirtemberg sent three new regiments to recruit the army, under Jerome, in Silesia. To the grand army was added a new levy of 15,000 Poles, 3,000 of which were cavalry. To the Saxon troops serving in the grand army, three new regiments were added, and fifteen men to each company of the old ones.

Marshal Le Brune, by an order, May 21, called the troops that were dispersed in the Hanse Towns, Hanover, and the duchies of Magdeburg, and Mecklenburgh, to Pomerania; they were replaced by 31,000 Spaniards, the flower of the Spanish army: of these 26,000, including 6,000 cavalry, came directly from Spain, under the command of the Marquis of Romana; the other 5,000 from Etruria. These last arrived in different columns on the Oder, between which river and the Elbe the grand army of observation was stationed, at the end of May, and in the beginning of June. But the whole, or part of this division, of the Spaniards, appear to have joined the grand French army. The former were distributed in the Hanse Towns, Hanover, and Mecklenburg, in the end of June, and beginning of July. The Queen of Etruria, too, made an extraordinary levy of 20,000 men, "for promoting the general end of the war, as well as for the defence of her own coasts." The Swiss, who had shewn themselves very backward to raise the 16,000 men, to be furnished, according to treaty, to the armies of France when demanded, were called on by a letter from Bonaparte to the Landamman, to furnish the troops without delay, under the pain of forfeiting the French alliance.

Not satisfied with all this host of auxiliaries, Bonaparte invited his people to send twelve regiments of the conscripts of 1807 to the theatre of war, six months before the time fixed by the constitution; and ordered the 80,000 conscripts for 1808, to be prepared and to hold themselves in readiness to march when called on.

While the commander of the French armies, and of France, was thus employed in repairing his loss by disease and by a series of hard-fought battles, particularly that of Eylau, the allies on their part laboured, though unfortunately with less success, to repair their loss, to increase their force, and oppose numbers to numbers. The court of St. Petersburg, which had been loudly importuned to take up arms in defence of Prussia, reckoned with confidence on the co-operation of Great Britain, not only in the way of a subsidy, but of an army, that should form a junction with the Swedes and Prussian insurgents, and occupy a portion of the French force, by a diversion on their rear. It was hoped that a combined army of Swedes and English would oblige the French to raise the siege of Stralsund, and moving up along the left bank of the Oder, menace the rear of the French army, and lay siege to Stettin, which was but weakly garrisoned, and in a bad state of defence; the possession of which would open a communication with Berlin, the Elbe, and the rest of Germany. If the French should have remained in Poland, so considerable a force acting in their rear might have obliged them to evacuate that country, or at least to detach such a considerable portion of their force as might have rendered them, in point of numbers, inferior to the allies. Even if the French should have maintained themselves on the line of the Oder, this diversion would have been of the greatest importance, as it would have enabled the Russians to march with the greater part of their army into Silesia. It was the apprehension of such an auxiliary force, that determined Bonaparte to assemble so large an army of observation in Pomerania. Repeated and earnest applications for an English army, infantry and cavalry, were made in vain. A subsidy was granted of 500,000*l.*—but no troops were sent from Britain until it was too late: and the force then sent to the island of Rugen, in July, consisted only of the German legion, about 8,000 strong. But the King of Prussia made some, though small, atonement for the selfish, blind, and infatuated policy that had disgraced his reign, by the resignation, patience, and firmness of his conduct after the disastrous day of Jena; and the heroic, though romantic bravery of the King of Sweden, and his gallant little army, served, no doubt, both to enliven the hopes of the Emperor Alexander, and to excite his emulation.

This young monarch, having set out from St. Petersburg on the 28th of March, to join his army, accompanied only by Count Tolstoy, was met at Polanden, on the Prussian frontiers, by the King of Prussia, who conducted him to Memel, and accompanied him in his progress from thence to Koningsberg. The Archduke Constantine, with a reinforcement of 30,000 men, consisting principally of the imperial guard, arrived at that place about eight days thereafter, when the trenches were opened before Dantzic.

The force that lay before Dantzic was between 30 and 40,000 men: that before Graudenz 3,000. Dantzic was defended by double, and in some places, by triple rows of fortifications, by marshy ground, inundations, the fort of Weischelmunde, and a garrison consisting of 12,000 Prussians and 6,000 Russians: the whole under the command of the Prussian General Kalkreuth.

The siege of Dantzic was pushed on with great vigour and courage by the besiegers, and the defence of the place maintained with equal courage by the besieged. All the artillery re-

BOOK VII. required having arrived, the whole of the batteries were mounted, and the bombardment commenced on the 24th of April. The garrison not only returned the enemy's fire with skill and persevering resolution, but made frequent sorties, in which they both suffered very considerably. Among the most important of these, was one which took place at ten hours after noon of the 29th. Some battalions issuing from their fortifications, rushed upon the French of the 3d parallel. They were twice repulsed, and returned a third time to the charge. They were driven back at last by the French body of reserve, who came up to the aid of the troops defending the parallel. The French found it necessary to defend this trench against similar sorties, by the erection, on both flanks, of new batteries.

A grand council of war was held at Bartenstein, a town on the Alla; at which the King of Prussia and the Grand Duke Constantine attended. The subject of their deliberations was the dangerous situation of the city of Dantzic. It was agreed that Dantzic could be relieved only in two ways. The first was to force a passage across the Passarge, attack the French line at different points, and hazard a general engagement, the result of which, if successful, would be to compel the French army to raise the siege of Dantzic; the second to throw succours into Dantzic by sea. The first plan was deemed too dangerous, as it might expose the Russian army to complete defeat and dispersion. It was therefore resolved to confine themselves to the plan of relieving Dantzic by water.

In pursuance of this plan, Lieutenant-general Kamenskoy, son of the field-marshal, embarked at Pillaw, with two Russian divisions, formed of twelve regiments, and several Prussian regiments. On the 10th of May, the troops were landed from sixty-six transports, under the convoy of three frigates, in the port of Dantzic, under the protection of the fort of Weischelmunde.

Bonaparte on this immediately ordered Marshal Lasnes, who commanded the reserve of the grand army, to advance from Marienburg, where he had his head-quarters, with the division of Oudinot, to reinforce the army of Marshal Le Febvre. The general arrived, after an uninterrupted march, at the very moment when the Russians were landing. On the 13th and 14th, the Russians made preparations for attacking the French. The opposite port of Weischelmunde was separated from the town of Dantzic, by a space from two to three miles in extent: this space was occupied by French troops.

The general of brigade, Schramm, who was at the advanced posts of the French by two o'clock in the morning of the 15th, had formed the troops under his command, consisting of the second regiment of light infantry, a battalion of Saxons, and another of Poles, in order of battle, covered by the redoubts opposite the fort of Weischelmunde. The Russian General Kamenskoy, in the morning of the same day, and a little after the same hour, advanced at the head of his troops, disposed in three columns, from the fort, with an intention to penetrate to the town, along the right banks of the Vistula. An action took place, in which the Russians, who were superior in numbers to the French, and not inferior in bravery, would have overpowered General Schramm if he had not received opportune assistance.

Marshal Le Febvre repaired to the bridge, which is situated below the fort on the Vistula, and ordered the 12th regiment of light infantry, together with a battalion of Saxons, to cross over that way, to support General Schramm. General Gardanne, who was charged with the defence of the right bank of the Vistula, also pressed that way with the rest of his troops. Marshal Lasnes, with the reserve of Oudinot, was placed on the left bank of the Vistula, where it was expected, the day before, that the enemy too would make his appearance. But when Marshal Lasnes saw the movements of the Russian general disclosed, he crossed the Vistula, with four battalions of General Oudinot's reserve. After two hours hard fighting, the whole of the line and reserve of the Russians were thrown into confusion; and pursued to the palisadoes. A Russian column, which held out to the last, was put to the bayonet to a man. At nine in the morning, they were all shut up in the fort of Weischelmunde. The field of battle was strewed with dead bodies. The loss of the French, according to their accounts, was not more than 25 killed, and 200 wounded; that of the Russians 1,300 killed, 1,500 wounded, and 200 taken prisoners.

As soon as the Russian commander-in-chief was assured that his maritime expedition had arrived before Dantzic, his light troops began to reconnoitre and alarm the whole French line, from the position occupied by Marshal Soult on the Passarge, to that of General Morand on the Alla. They were received at the mouth of the musket by the voltigeurs, or sharp-shooters; lost a considerable number of men, and retired with precipitation. The Russians also presented themselves at Malga before General Zayoncheek, commander of the Polish corps of observation, and carried off one of his posts. The general of brigade, Fischer, pursued, routed them, and killed sixty men, one colonel, and two captains. They likewise presented themselves before the 5th corps, and insulted General Gazan's advanced posts at Wildenberg. This general pursued them several leagues. But they made a more serious attack on the brigade of Omulew at Drenzewo. The general of brigade, Girard, marched against them with the 88th regiment, and drove them across the Narew. General Suchet arrived, pursued the Russians closely, and defeated them at Ostrolenka, where he killed sixty men, and fifty horses.

On the same day, May 13, the Russians attacked General Marrois at the mouth of the Bug. This general had passed that river on the 10th with a Bavarian brigade, and a Polish regiment. In the course of three days, he had constructed several têtes-du-pont, and had advanced to Wis-kywo, for the purpose of burning the rafts on which the Russians had been at work for six weeks. This expedition completely succeeded, and the foolish work of six weeks was destroyed in a moment.

This general attack on the French advanced posts, on the same day when General Kamen-skoy was to make his attempt on Dantzic, was no doubt intended to occupy the grand French army, in such a manner as to prevent them from reinforcing the besieging army. The project of carrying relief to Dantzic, by means of a maritime expedition, appeared very extraordinary to such military men as were acquainted with the ground and positions occupied by the French army, and at the same time informed of the works that had been constructed for intercepting the navigation of both the Vistula and the canal of Dantzic. An English brigantine, the Dauntless, with that thoughtless, but, on the whole, not unfortunate audacity with which a series of glorious successes had, at this time, inspired all British seamen, having 120 English for her crew, fifty Russian and Prussian soldiers, carrying twenty-four carronades, and laden with powder and ball, appeared on the Vistula, in full sail, with an intention to enter the port of Dantzic. On her near approach, however, to the French works, she was attacked, not only by the batteries from both the shores, but a heavy shower of musketry, and forced to surrender. An aide-de-camp of General Kalkreuth, who was on his return from the Russian head-quarters, and several English officers, were on-board the vessel.

On the 16th, a Russian division, of 6,000 men, under General Turkow, advanced from Brock to the Bug, and towards Pultusk, with a view to prevent the execution of some works, for strengthening a tête-du-pont. These works were defended by six battalions of Bavarians, under the command of the Prince Royal of Bavaria in person. The Russians advanced four times to the attack, and were four times repulsed, by grape-shot from the different batteries. The Russians, for this attack on Pultusk, had prepared a great number of rafts, in the same manner as they had done in their attack on the works of General Le Marrois. Those rafts, prepared at so great an expense of time and labour, were burnt in two hours time. Those repeated attacks on works constructed with consummate skill, and defended by strong batteries, without a chance of success, were matter of astonishment to the French, and almost induced them to suppose, that the only purport of these attacks was to draw their attention from other parts of their line, to the right wing of their army. But the position of this was calculated for every imaginable ease, whether of attack or defence. Meanwhile the important siege of Dantzic was continued.

On the 19th of May, when every thing was prepared by Marshal Le Febvre, and the French were proceeding to the assault, General Kalkreuth demanded a capitulation, on the same conditions that he had formerly granted to the garrison of Mayence. It appeared to the French general, that the difficulties remaining to be surmounted, in bringing the siege to a conclusion, were such, that the besieged might hold out yet fifteen days longer. In these circumstances it was deemed expedient to grant them what they demanded, an honorable capitulation. It was agreed, among other articles, that the garrison should march out of the city with all the honors of war, and be conducted to the advanced posts of his majesty the King of Prussia, at Pillaw, by a march of five days.

The garrison engaged not to serve against the French army or its allies, for the space of a year, counting from the date of the capitulation, that is, the 20th of May. The prisoners of war confined at Dantzic, whether French, or allies of the French, to be exchanged.

As the garrison had not sufficient means for carrying off the whole of its baggage, a vessel was to be afforded for this purpose, to sail directly for Pillaw, under the command of a French officer. The magazines, and in general all that belonged, not to individuals, but to his Prussian majesty, to be consigned into the hands of the French government.

The Prussian officers, who were prisoners on their parole, living with their families at Dantzic before the blockade of the place, had permission to remain there if they pleased, till farther orders from his serene highness Major-general the Prince of Neuf-Chatel (Berthier). Nevertheless, in order to be entitled to this privilege, they were to produce a certificate, from the governor, that they had not taken any part in the defence of the place. The wives of the officers and others, that is, persons in civil employments or situations, were to be at liberty to remove from the city. The sick and wounded to be left under the care of Marshal Le Febvre;

and, on their recovery, to be sent to the advanced posts of the Prussian army.

Marshal Le Febvre engaged to the inhabitants of Dantzic, to employ all the means in his power for the protection of persons and property. This capitulation was to be carried into execution at twelve o'clock at noon, the 26th of May. It was to be understood, that between the present and that period, the garrison of Dantzic was not to make any attack on the besiegers, in case of their being engaged in any action with the Russo-Prussian army without the city.

On the 27th of May, the garrison marched out of the city with General Kalkreuth at its head. This strong garrison, which consisted at first of 18,000 men, as before stated, and, at the opening of the trenches, of 16,000, was now reduced to 9,000, of which number 400, and among these some officers, deserted. The officers said, that they had no mind to go to Siberia. Several thousands of artillery-horses were given up to the French, according to the terms of capitulation, but most of them in a very bad condition; 800 pieces of artillery; magazines of every kind; more than 500,000 quintals of grain; well-stored cellars; immense collections of clothing, and spices and great resources of every kind for the army.

The Russian Lieutenant-general Kamenskoy, who, after his defeat of the 15th, retired under the fortifications of Weischelmunde, remained there, without making any farther attempts, and was a spectator of the surrender of Dantzic. When he perceived that the French were employed in erecting batteries for burning his ships, he set sail, and returned with his fleet to Pillaw. The fort of Weischelmunde, however, still held out. But when Marshal Le Febvre summoned it on the 26th, while the terms were only under consideration, the whole garrison advanced from the fort and surrendered at discretion. The commandant, thus abandoned by the garrison, saved himself by sea.

After the fall of Dantzic, a detachment was sent, closely to blockade and besiege, in form, the fortress of Graudenz, which, though strong, both by art and nature, could not be supposed to hold out long, hemmed in, as it was, on all sides, by the besieging and grand French army.

The last hope that remained to the allies of a favorable turn to the war, on the left, or western side of the Vistula, was Stralsund.

Marshal Mortier, having first plundered, introduced a regular system of exaction, and completely established the tyranny of France in Mecklenberg, Hamburgh, and Lubeck: and had orders, towards the middle of February, to enter Swedish Pomerania, and lay siege to the capital of that province. It was invested on the land side, but the siege was not pushed with vigour.

Marshal Mortier, being charged with the siege of Colberg, drew off 7,000 men to that place, leaving the siege of Stralsund in charge to General Granjeau.

In the mean time, while the operations of the besiegers were but languid, the besieged made several bold sorties, demolishing the batteries of the enemy, and spiking their guns. The garrison of Stralsund received considerable reinforcements; and troops were also landed at other points from the Swedish flotilla.

In the beginning of April it was thought proper to reinforce the army besieging Dantzic. The siege of Stralsund was raised; and the besieging troops, by degrees, began to march to the Lower Vistula.

As soon as the General Baron Van Essen, the governor-general of Swedish Pomerania, perceived that the French were filing off from that province, in small detachments, he determined to march against them, and compel them to abandon their entrenchments, and completely to evacuate Pomerania. His troops were divided into two columns; the first under his own orders; the second under those of Lieutenant-general Baron Armfeldt. Each column consisted of eight squadrons of hussars, a detachment of mounted artillery, and four battalions of infantry, with their proper divisions of chasseurs or hunters. These two columns, advancing in the same line of direction, came up with the enemy at Lussow, drove them from thence to Ruderhagen, and pursued them from thence to Voigdehagen.

In the mean time the French had abandoned their batteries and entrenchments at Stralsund, and entrenched themselves on the heights between Voigdehagen and Teschenhagen, on which they had mounted a battery of four pieces of artillery and two howitzers. This being silenced by the Swedish artillery, they endeavoured to take possession of a morass, skirted by a wood, but were forced to desist from the attempt, and continue their retreat from one post to another, which they did with admirable skill and courage, even according to the Swedish account. On the 3d of April, General Van Essen's column entering Demnin, made the garrison, after a slight resistance, prisoners, and sent out his light troops in pursuit of the enemy on the side of Mecklenburg. On the morning of the 4th of April, the column under Baron Armfeldt entered the town of Anclam, where he took 150 men prisoners. The military chest also, containing 3,000 crowns, fell into his hand. The loss of the French in this well-conducted retreat was not very considerable. But the prisoners made, during the retreat, by the two Swedish columns, were said to have been 10,000 men, and, among these, twenty officers.

After the retreat of the French from Swedish Pomerania, the Swedish army occupied a line of positions of very great extent, having the heads of its columns at Falkenwald, Stoltzenberg, Stadsfort, Belling, and Darkitz; that is, from the banks of the Oder to the confines of Mecklenberg Strelitz. Marshal Mortier determined to bear, with his whole force, on the centre of this dilated line, without giving himself any trouble about the other positions, being convinced, that by a rapid march on the river Peene, which the Swedes had inconsiderately crossed, he could throw them into the utmost confusion and consternation. Having assembled a part of his forces at Pasewack, on the evening of April 15, he advanced on the 16th, before break of day, on the road to Anclam, overthrew a Swedish post at Belling, and another at Ferdinandskaff, took 400 prisoners, and two pieces of cannon, entered Anclam at the same time with the enemy, and made himself master of the bridge on the Peene. Thus a Swedish column, commanded by General Cardell, was cut off. It remained at Nekermunde when the French were already at Anclam. General Armfeldt, one of the Swedish commanders-in-chief, was wounded by a grape-shot. All the magazines at Anclam were taken, together with all the Swedish sloops of war, on the lake adjoining to Anclam, and transports. The column of General Cardell, which was cut off from the other Swedish troops, was attacked on the 17th, by the general of brigade Veau, near Neckermunde, when it lost three pieces of cannon, and 500 men. Another column took possession of Demnin, and made 500 soldiers prisoners. The Swedes were driven back again behind the river Peene.

General Armfeldt, after informing the Baron Van Essen of his having been wounded, and that he had been obliged to make the infantry of his division fall back on Ranzien, retired to Stralsund. It was ordered by Van Essen to march to Grimm, and thereafter to the head-quarters of Van Essen, the commander of the other division, and who had now the supreme command of both at Griefswald. Here, April 17, he was joined by a detachment of hussars, belonging to the royal guard from Stralsund. Early on the morning of that day, he had sent a flag of truce to Marshal Mortier, of twenty-four hours, for the purpose of removing the sick and wounded to hospitals. It was not difficult to persuade the marshal, who knew how much his master wished to detach Sweden from the cause of the allies, to comply with his request. Soon after noon, the first adjutant of Marshal Mortier arrived with a flag of truce at Griefswald, with an answer to that which had been sent by the Swedish general.

Before mid-day of the 18th, another flag of truce arrived from Marshal Mortier, and an early hour was fixed for a conference between the two generals at Sklatkow, within an English mile and half of Anclam, where an armistice was agreed on, not to be broken without ten days' previous notice. Besides this, which was the principal article, there were others, and these altogether in favor of the French. The Swedes were to restore the isles of Usedom and Wollin, which were to be occupied by the French garrisons, to be sent thither for that purpose, on the day after, that is, the 20th of April. The line of demarkation between the two armies was to be the Peene and the Trebel. But the French were farther to occupy a position beyond the Peene, and behind the barrier of Anclam. During the armistice, the Swedes were not to afford succours of any kind to the towns of Graudenz and Dantzic, nor yet to the troops of any of the powers at war with France or its allies. During the armistice, no troops belonging to any of the powers at war with France were to be landed at Stralsund, or any other part of Swedish Pomerania, or the isle of Rugen. If, however, there should be a debarkation of any troops at Stralsund, in consequence of superior orders unknown to General Van Essen, the general engaged, that they should not commit any act of hostility against the French.

Towards the end of the same month, (April,) Marshal Mortier and General Van Essen improved the terms of mutual accommodation into a more certain prelude to a permanent peace. It was agreed, April 29, that none of the parties should resume hostilities without giving a month's previous notice, instead of the ten days fixed by the armistice of the 18th.

When the King of Sweden was informed of the armistice, and the events that led to it in Pomerania, he determined to come thither, and take the affairs of this province, political and military, into his immediate management, and accordingly arrived at Stralsund early in May. Though he was far from approving of the armistices of the 18th and 29th of April, he was sensible that those armistices, which he considered as most disgraceful, were owing, not to any misconduct on the part of the general, Baron Van Essen, but to the imprudence and precipitation of General Armfeldt, in crossing and advancing too far with his column beyond the Peene. While General Van Essen, therefore, was appointed governor-general of Pomerania, and decorated with the grand cross of the Swedish order of the sword, General Armfeldt obtained permission from the king to resign his commission. These marks of favor were shewn to General Van Essen on the 14th of May, at a grand parade; when the officers of the different Swedish regiments stationed at Stralsund, and various places in the vicinity, were also presented to his majesty, by whom they were received in the most gracious manner. He expressed his entire satisfaction with their conduct in the last cam-

While Gustavus was thus employed in reviewing and promoting his brave and loyal Swedes, he was himself not a little animated by the arrival at Stralsund of the English General Clinton, with assurances of speedy succours of all kinds from the British government, in the administration of which there had been, on the 24th of March, a great change.

This change was produced by the Catholic question. Lords Grenville and Howick being desirous of granting the wished-for relief, respectfully communicated to the king their sentiments; the next day they received an intimation from his majesty, that he must look out for other ministers. A new administration was accordingly formed, the great leaders of which were the Duke of Portland, first lord of the treasury, Mr. Perceval, chancellor of the exchequer, Lord Eldon, lord chancellor, Lord Liverpool, secretary for the home department, Lord Castlereagh, war department, Mr. Canning, minister for foreign affairs, and Lord Mulgrave, first lord of the admiralty.

CHAPTER VIII.

Bonaparte's Pacific Proposal.—Circumstances which led to those Offers of Peace.—Miserable State of France.—Campaign of ten Days.—Battles of Hielsberg and Friedland.—Peace of Tilsit.—Siege of Colberg.—War with Sweden.—Evacuation of Stralsund.

AFTER the battle of Jena, a proposition was made, either by Russia in concert with her allies to the ruler of France, or by the ruler of France to Russia and her allies, for a congress of all the belligerent powers, to be held for the purpose of a general pacification. The Russian government, keeping a steady eye on Constantinople, objected to the admission of the Turks into the congress. Bonaparte insisted on the admission of the grand-signior as the friend and ally of France, in return for which, Russia would be permitted likewise in the congress to make common cause with England. The basis of negotiation proposed by Bonaparte, between what he called the two belligerent masses, was equality and reciprocity, and a system of compensations. Though the negotiation had been interrupted by a series of hot actions, and the King of Prussia and the Russian generalissimo had declined to enter into any treaty for an armistice, or peace; after the battle of Eylau, Bonaparte, on the fall of Dantzic, made a direct proposal for renewing the negotiation to the Emperor Alexander, accompanied by a declaration that he was desirous of peace, above all things, and ready to listen to any reasonable overture for that end.

There is no doubt but that Bonaparte was sincere in the present pacific proposal. The progress of his arms from the Elbe to the Oder, and from the Oder to the Passarge, beyond the Vistula, and the commanding position of his army, strengthened by the reduction of Dantzic, enabled him to treat with advantage, and to return to Paris with glory. On the other hand, the battle of Eylau, as well as that of Pultusk, and other engagements, proclaimed the uncertain issue of a decisive action with such an enemy; and in whose favor a powerful diversion might have been occasioned by a combined Swedish and English army landing in Pomerania, in his rear, and commanding the course of the Oder from Stralsund to Frankfort. The necessity, too, which would occur by a prolongation of the war, of drawing levy after levy of unfortunate young men and boys from their wretched families, could not be any other than a cause of most serious alarm and apprehension.

Since the commencement of the war against Prussia, that is, in the course of six or seven months, three several levies of conscripts had been raised. The last of these, by which the conscripts of September 1806 were called for in March 1807, created a melancholy bordering on despair. Although all correspondence relative to the position of the armies was rigorously interdicted, and no letters suffered to pass without scrutiny, it was impossible wholly to conceal the mortality and the hardships inseparable from the various movements of the troops, and the unaccustomed rigours of a northern winter. A third conscription was generally considered as an undertaking too bold for the internal administration, especially at a moment when a belief was current among all ranks, that the emperor would not be able to extricate himself from the embarrassments in which, after the battle of Eylau, he was supposed to be involved. The government, apprehensive of the danger, set themselves to prepare the public mind for the event, by employing emissaries to announce their intention in whispers through the circles, and three thousand coffee-houses of the capital. But an impression of terror was visible, even to a cursory observer, on the countenances of those who were either themselves exposed to the danger, or shuddered at the prospect of new revolutionary horrors, and of suspicion and joy, but half disguised in the lowering brows of the most resolute of the disaffected, constantly on the alert to improve the concurrence of opportunity, and who hailed this desperate expedient as a confirmation of their hopes. The orator of the government, Renaud St. Jean D'Angely, shed tears as he stated the necessity of the measure: and the senate received it, contrary to their usual practice, in silent acquiescence, and with every symptom of reluctance and dismay. In order to assuage the general grief, it was found advisable to qualify the new call for 80,000 men, by a clause enacting that they were then to be merely organized, and retained within the limits of the empire, as a national guard. Circumstances enabled them to adhere to this condition, which most certainly would have been violated, if the armies had sustained a defeat. In the midst of disquietude and fear, public festivals were multiplied, in order to give the administration at home an air of confidence: and an unusual degree of splendour brightened the court of the empress, who remained in Paris, and took a principal share in those mummeries of despotism.

It was not to be wondered at, therefore, if, all things considered, Bonaparte should be desirous of a pacification. There was no reception, perhaps no return for him to Paris, but in the character of a conqueror. Though, after the fall of Dantzic, the main army was increased by a disposable force of more than 30,000, and though there was neither truce nor armistice, he did not take any measures for immediately opening the campaign, and surprising the enemy according to his usual system, by the promptitude and the celerity of his movements, but manifested every symptom of a sincere and even somewhat earnest desire that hostilities might be, for the present, terminated by negotiation. Till this negotiation should be brought to some issue, he seemed determined to remain on the defensive. The ambassadors attending his court at Finkenstein were witnesses of the proud eminence on which he now stood, and abundant care was taken that they should fully understand the importance of his recent conquest, the great bulwark of the Vistula. When the ambassador of the porte (Seid Mahomed Vahid) was presented, on the 28th of May, by the Prince of Benevento (Maurice Talleyrand) to Bonaparte, he said to the ambassador, that he and the Sultan Selim would be for ever after as in-separably connected as the right hand and the left. The offices and administration of the government were now transferred from Warsaw to Dantzic, which seemed at this time to be intended for the capital of the French dominions in those parts. This city was visited, on the 30th of May, by Bonaparte, attended by the greater part of his staff, his minister for foreign relations, and in short all his court. He reviewed his troops, and gave orders for the reparation of the works demolished in the course of the siege. General Rapp, a great favorite, was appointed governor, and Le Febvre created Duke of Dantzic. Each soldier engaged in the siege received a gratuity of ten francs.

From his imperial camp at Finkenstein, May 28, Bonaparte wrote to the conservative senate, that he had instituted duchies as rewards for eminent services done him, whether military or civil; and that, in pursuance of this system of encouragement, he had created, by letters patent, the Marshal Le Febvre hereditary Duke of Dantzic; not only in consideration of his late achievement, but because on, and ever since the first day of his reign, Le Febvre had rendered him the most signal service. It was his business, he said, to establish the fortunes of such families as devoted themselves without reserve to his service, and constantly sacrificed their own particular interests to his.

Though, before the fall of Dantzic, the Russians had avoided a general action, yet, fifteen days after the capitulation of that place, they made a vigorous attack on the French. June 5, the grand French army was attacked by the allies, at different points of its line. On the right of the allies, and the left of the French, twelve Russian and Prussian regiments, forming two divisions, attacked the tête-du-pont of Spanden on the Passarge, which was defended by a regiment of light infantry, strongly covered by entrenchments and redoubts. They were repulsed seven times, and as often renewed the attack. But immediately after the last assault, they were charged by a regiment of dragoons, that had come up to the assistance of the regiment of infantry, and forced to abandon the field of battle with a great loss in killed and wounded. Two divisions belonging to the centre of the allied army attacked at the same time the tête-du-pont of Lomitten, which was defended by a brigade of the corps of Marshal Soult. The Russian general, with 1,100, fell in the action; 100 were taken, and a great many wounded. The loss of the French, according to their bulletin, was no more than 120 men. This is incredible; and it is here stated merely as an instance of that extravagance of misrepresentation, which is sufficient excuse for not repeating, on all occasions, their gasconades of this kind. At the same time, also, the Russian commander-in-chief, General Benningsen, with the Grand Duke Constantine, the imperial guard, and three divisions of the other troops, attacked the positions of Marshal Ney, on the right wing of the French line, at Aldkirken, Gutstadt, and Wolsdorf. After a severe contest, Marshal Ney fell back, but in good order, to Ackendorf.

On the following day, June 6, the allies attacked the sixth corps of the French army, under the command of Marshal Soult and General Marchand, at Deppen, on the Passarge. The Russians in the action of this day lost, according to their own acknowledgment, if we may credit the French bulletin, 2,000 killed, and more than 3,000 wounded. The loss of the French, according to their statement, in killed and wounded, was extremely trifling, as usual. But they acknowledged the loss of 250 taken prisoners, for the most part by the Cossacks, who, on the morning of the attack, had got into the rear of the French army.

Bonaparte, informed of the movement of the allies, left Finkenstein on the evening of the 5th of June, passed the night of the 6th at Saalfeld, and that of the 7th in bivouac, (i. e. a guard at night performed by the whole army, which, either at a siege, or lying before an enemy, every evening draws out from its tents, or huts, and continues all night in arms,) with Marshal Ney at Deppen, and immediately took upon himself the command, and issued the necessary orders to the whole army. On the 8th, the fourth corps marched to Wolsdorf, where it fell in with the division of Kamenskoy, on its way to rejoin the main body. The French corps attacked and defeated it, and in the evening took its position at Aldkirken. At the same time, Bonaparte, with the corps of the Marshals Ney and Lasnes, his guard, and the cavalry of reserve, advanced to Gutstadt. Part of the rear-guard of the Russian army, comprising 10,000 cavalry and 15,000 infantry, took a position at Glottaw, and attempted to dispute the way. The Grand Duke of Berg, after some very skilful manœuvres, drove the Russians from all their positions. Three brigades of light, and a division of heavy cavalry, carried all before them; and the French having taken 1,000 prisoners, and all the positions and redoubts, of the Russians, between them and Gutstadt, entered that town, sword in hand, at eight o'clock in the evening.

On the 10th, the French army moved towards Heilsberg, and on its march took several of the enemy's camps. About a quarter of a league beyond these camps, it came up with the rear-guard of the allied army, consisting of from 15 to 18,000 cavalry, and several lines of infantry. It was immediately attacked by a division of French dragoons, the cuirassiers of another division, and a brigade of light cavalry. The French were repulsed again and again, and as often renewed the attack. At two o'clock the corps under Marshal Soult was formed. Two divisions marched to the right, while a third marched to the left, to seize on the edge of a wood, the occupation of which was necessary, in order to support the left, of the cavalry. Reinforcement after reinforcement, of both infantry and cavalry, was sent to the rear-guard from the main army, which was posted at Heilsberg; and many efforts were made by the Russians, who were defended by the fire of more than sixty pieces of cannon, to maintain themselves in their positions before that town in vain. Several of their divisions were routed, and at nine in the evening the French found themselves under the Russian entrenchments. The fusileers of the guard, commanded by General Savary, were put in motion to sustain the division of Verdier; and some of the corps of infantry of the reserve, under Marshal Lasnes, attacked the enemy at the close of the day, when it had begun to be dark, in order to cut off his communication with Lansberg, in which he completely succeeded. The ardour of the troops was such, that several companies of the infantry of the line insulted the Russians in their entrenchments. A number of them fell in the ditches of the redoubts at the foot of the pallisades.

Bonaparte passed the 11th on the field of battle. He there drew up the different corps and divisions of the army in order of battle, that the war might be terminated at once by a decisive engagement. The whole of the Russian army was assembled at Heilsberg, where the magazines were established, and it occupied a position strong by nature, and farther strengthened by the labour of four months. At four in the afternoon, Bonaparte ordered Marshal Davoust to change his front, and push forward the left wing of his corps; a movement which brought him upon the Lower Alla, and completely blocked up the road from Eylau. To every corps of the army was assigned its proper station. They were all of them re-assembled except the first corps, which continued to manœuvre on the Lower Passarge. Thus the Russians, who had been the first to recommence hostilities, found themselves blockaded in their entrenched camp, and were offered battle on the ground which they themselves had chosen. It was for a long time believed that they would make an attack on the 11th. At the moment when the French were making their dispositions, the Russians shewed themselves ranged in columns, in the midst of their entrenchments, fortified with batteries. But at ten o'clock at night they began to pass the Alla, abandoning the whole country to the left, and leaving their magazines and their wounded to the disposal of the conqueror. On the 12th, at day-break, all the corps of the army were in motion, and took different directions.

In the several actions, from the 5th to the 12th, according to the French accounts, the Russian army was deprived of about 30,000 fighting men. The number of wounded left prisoners in the hands of the French amounted to between 3 and 4,000. The loss of the French, as stated by them, amounted to no more than 6 or 700 killed, 2,000, or 2,200 wounded, and 300 prisoners.

On the 12th, at four in the morning, the French army entered Heilsberg, where they found in the magazines several thousand quintals of grain, and a great quantity of different kinds of provisions. A division of dragoons, and a brigade of light cavalry, pursued the Russians to the right bank of the Alla. In the mean time, the light corps of the army advanced in various directions in order to pass the Russians, and get between them and their magazines, by cutting off their retreat to Königsberg. On the same day, at five o'clock P. M. the head-quarters of the French army had arrived at Eylau. Here the fields were no longer covered with ice and snow, but, on the contrary, presented one of the most beautiful scenes in nature. The country was every where adorned with woods, intersected by lakes, and enlivened by handsome villages.

On the 13th, while the Grand Duke of Berg and the Marshals Soult and Davoust had orders to manoeuvre before Königsberg, Bonaparte, with the corps of Ney, Lasnes, Mortier, the imperial guard, and the first corps, commanded by General Victor, advanced on Friedland. On the same day the 9th regiment of hussars entered that town, but was driven out of it again by 3,000 Russian cavalry. On the 14th, the Russians advanced on the bridge of Friedland, with the intent of pursuing their march to Königsberg, and at three in the morning a cannonade was heard. "It is a fortunate day," said Bonaparte, "it is the anniversary of the battle of Marengo." Different movements and actions took place, by which the Russians were stopped on their march, and could not pass the village of Postenheim.

A mighty struggle was now unavoidable; and both armies prepared for a decisive battle. By five in the evening, the several corps of the French were at their appointed stations. Marshal Ney was on the right wing; Marshal Lasnes in the centre; and Marshal Mortier on the left wing. The corps of General Victor and the guards formed the reserve. The cavalry, under the command of General Grouchy, supported the left wing: the division of dragoons of General La Tour Maubourg, was stationed as a reserve behind the right: and General La Housaye's division of dragoons, with the Saxon cuirassiers, formed a reserve for the centre. The whole of the Russian army was also drawn up in the best order that the place and circumstances seemed to the general to admit. His left wing extended to the town of Friedland, and his right wing a league and a half in the other direction. The position taken by General Benningsen on the left bank of the Alla was, apparently, one continued plain; but intersected by a deep ravin full of water, and almost impassable. This ravin ran in a line between Domnow and Friedland, where it formed a lake to the left of that place, and separated the right wing of the Russians from their centre. A thick wood, at the distance of about a mile and a half from Friedland, on more elevated ground, fringed the plain of the Alla, nearly in the form of a semicircle, except at its extremity at the left, where there was an open space between the wood and the river. In front of the wood, about a mile from the town of Friedland, and nearly opposite to the centre of the army, was the small village of Henrichsdorf. The field of battle lay between the left of this village and the Alla, to the south of Friedland.

Bonaparte having reconnoitred the position of the enemy, instantly determined to take the town of Friedland. Then suddenly changing his front and advancing his right, he commenced the attack with the first part of that wing; the firing of twenty cannon from a battery being the signal of battle. At the same moment the division under General Marchand, supported on the left by another division, advanced sword in hand on the enemy, his line of direction being pointed towards the steeple of the town. When the Russians perceived that Marshal Ney had left the wood in which his left wing had been posted, they endeavoured to surround him with some regiments of cavalry, and a multitude of Cossacks: but General La Tour Maubourg's division of dragoons rode up at full gallop to the right wing, and repelled the attack. In the meantime, General Victor, who commanded, as has been mentioned, a corps of the grand army, erected a battery of thirty cannon in the front of his centre; and his works pushing forwards more than 400 paces, greatly annoyed the Russians, whose various manoeuvres for producing a diversion were all in vain. Marshal Ney was at the head of his troops, directing the most minute movements with his characteristic intrepidity and coolness. Several Russian columns that had attacked his right wing were received on the point of the bayonet and driven into the Alla. Thousands were lost in that river, and some escaped by swimming. In the meantime, Marshal Ney's left wing reached the raveline which surrounded the town of Friedland. The imperial guard of Russia, both horse and foot, which had been placed there in ambush, rushed suddenly on Marshal Ney's left wing, which for a moment wavered. But Dupont's division, which formed the right of the reserve, fell on the Russian imperial guards, and defeated them with great slaughter. Several other bodies were sent from the centre of the Russian army for the defence of the most important position of Friedland: but the impetuosity, the numbers, and the prompt and skilful co-operation of the assailants with an immense artillery, prevailed. Friedland was taken; and its streets bestrewn with dead bodies.

The attempts of the Russians on the left wing of the French being defeated, they made repeated attacks on their centre. But all the efforts of both their infantry and cavalry, to obstruct the progress of the French columns, were exerted in vain. Marshal Mortier, who, during the whole day, had exhibited the greatest coolness and intrepidity, in supporting the left wing, advanced, and was in his turn supported by the fusiliers of the guard under the command of General Savary. The French columns pressed forward on the Russians, chiefly along the sides of the ravin; which was, thus, as advantageous to the French, as disadvantageous to the Russians. Victory, which had never, in the judgment of the French generals who drew up the bulletin, been for a moment doubtful, now declared decidedly in their favor. The French horse and foot guards, and two divisions of the reserve attached to the first corps, were not in the action.

The field of battle presented one of the most horrible spectacles of wounded, dying, and dead men and horses, that was ever beheld. The number of the dead on the side of the Russians was estimated by the French at from 15 to 18,000; and that of the dead on their own side at less than 500. But they admitted that the number of their wounded amounted to 3,000. Eighty cannon, and a great number of covered waggons and standards, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The Russians were pursued in their retreat towards Koningsberg till eleven o'clock. During the remainder of the night, the cut-off columns endeavoured to pass, and part of them did pass the Alla at several fordable places. But next day covered waggons, cannon, and harness, were every where seen in the river.—“The battle of Friedland,” said the French bulletin, “is worthy to be numbered among those of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Jena. The enemy were numerous, had fine cavalry, and fought bravely.”

Next day, June 15, the Russians endeavoured to re-assemble on the right bank of the Alla, while the French army manœuvred on the left bank to cut them off from Koningsberg. The heads of the hostile columns arrived at Wehlaw, a town situated at the confluence of the Alla and the Pregel, nearly at the same time. The Russians, at day-break on the 16th, passed the Pregel, and continued their retreat to the Niemen.—The French bulletin stated, that “having destroyed all the bridges, they took advantage of that obstacle to proceed on their retreat.” If there were several bridges on the Pregel, they must, however, have left one at least standing, till they had crossed the river themselves, though the French gazetteers insinuated, that they escaped only by means of the demolition of all the bridges.

The following account, which was given by an eye-witness of the campaign of Poland, appears faithful and consistent. “At Wehlaw the Russian army passed the Pregel, without any loss or even annoyance, on a single bridge. A detachment of 4,000 French troops watched their movements, but did not oppose their retreat. The bridge was then burnt: and the Russians continued their retrograde movement to Pepelken, where they were rejoined by the Prussian corps, under General Lestocq, and a Russian corps, under General Kaminskoy, who had been detached to Koningsberg on the 10th: for, after the defeat of the main Russian army, Koningsberg was untenable.” At eight in the morning Bonaparte threw a bridge over the Pregel, and took a position there with the army. Almost all the magazines which the enemy had on the Alla, had been thrown into the river or burnt. At Wehlaw, however, the French found more than 6,000 quintals of corn—possession was taken of Koningsberg by the corps under Marshal Soult. At this place were found some hundred thousand quintals of corn, more than 20,000 wounded Russians and Prussians, and all the ammunition that had been sent to the Russians by England, including 160,000 muskets that had not been landed.

The French bulletin concluded as follows: “It was on the 5th of June that the enemy renewed hostilities. Their loss in the ten days that followed their first operations may be reckoned at 60,000 men, killed, wounded, taken, or otherwise put hors de combat. They have lost a part of their artillery, almost all their ammunition, and the whole of their magazines on a line of more than forty leagues. The French armies have seldom obtained such great advantages with so little loss.”

The conduct of the Russian general, who had been so much extolled when his operations were supposed to have been successful, was now, as commonly happens to the unfortunate, very much censured.

General Benningsen did not attempt to conceal the real situation of affairs after the battle of Friedland, as he had done after that of Eylau: and he did not hesitate to give it as his opinion, that any farther contest with the French in the field of battle, would be, at that time, a hopeless proposed. It was computed by the most dispassionate and competent judges that the French commenced this short campaign of ten days with 160,000 men, including all kinds of troops stationed between the Oder and the Alla; and that the allies had about 100,000 effective men, infantry and cavalry, besides Cossacks, Bashkins, and other irregular troops. It was acknowledged by the French officers, that from the 5th to the 14th of June, the grand army had lost, in killed and wounded, at least 20,000 men.

On the 19th, at two o'clock P. M. Bonaparte with his guards entered Tilsit. The Russians, pursued after the battle of Friedland by the Grand Duke of Berg, at the head of the greater part of the light cavalry, and some divisions of dragoons and cuirassiers, crossed the Niemen, burned the bridge of Tilsit, and continued their retreat eastward. The Emperor of Russia, who had remained three weeks with his Prussian majesty at Tilsit, left that place along with the king in great haste. On the 19th, an armistice was proposed to the chiefs of the French army, by the Russian commander-in-chief. In consequence of this proposition, an armistice was agreed on at Tilsit, on the 22d of June, by which it was settled that hostilities should not be resumed on either side without a month's previous notice of such an intention. That a similar armistice should be concluded between the French and the Prussian armies in the course of five days. That plenipotentiaries should be instantly appointed by the different parties, for the salutary work of pacification; and that there should be an immediate exchange of prisoners. The boundary between the French and Russian armies, during the armistice, was the Thalweg, or middle of the stream of the Niemen from the Kurisch-baff, where it falls into the sea to Grodno: and a line from thence to the confines of Russia, between the Narew and the Bug. Such was the formidable position of the French, while nothing remained to the King of Prussia but the small town and territory of Memel.

The first interview between Bonaparte, or the Emperor Napoleon as he was now called, and the Emperor Alexander, took place on the 25th of June, on a raft constructed for the purpose, on the Niemen, where two tents had been prepared for their reception by the French. Alexander and Bonaparte landed from their boats at the same time, and embraced each other. It was settled that half the town of Tilsit should be considered as neutral ground, and be occupied by the Emperor of Russia, with the officers of his household, and his body-guards. Great were the mutual courtesies and expressions of kindness and respect that ensued among French, Russians, and Prussians of all ranks: visiting, feasting, and all kinds of entertainment and festivity that could be thought of. Human nature gladly relaxed from the miserable rage of war, and was eager to acknowledge, and emphatically express every sentiment of social and generous affection. A magnificent dinner was given by Napoleon's guards to those of Alexander and the King of Prussia. At this entertainment they exchanged uniforms, and were seen in the streets in a motley kind of dress, partly Russian, partly Prussian, and partly French. It is much in the same spirit that the chiefs of so many islands in the South-seas exchange names for a time, with persons to whom they wish to shew friendship, or pay a compliment. A stranger to the ways of Europe, witnessing at Tilsit such ardent love among those different tongues and nations, from the highest to the lowest, might have wondered what could possibly have impelled such good-natured and tender-hearted people to the most horrid scenes of war and bloodshed.

A treaty of peace was concluded between his majesty Napoleon, styling himself Emperor of the French, and King of Italy, and his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, at Tilsit, July 7. As the contest between Russia and France related not to any direct interests of their own, but wholly to those of their respective allies, there was nothing to be adjusted between these powers on their own account, farther than that there should be henceforth perfect peace and amity between their imperial majesties; that all hostilities between them should immediately cease at all points by sea and land; and that, for this purpose, couriers should be dispatched to their respective generals and other commanders. The great sacrifice to peace, was, of course, the kingdom of Prussia, which was reduced at once from the rank of a primary to that of a secondary, at best, power of Europe, and all that had been done for the augmentation and aggrandizement of the monarchy by the great Frederick, in the course of twenty years, undone in one day. The King of Prussia, by the peace of Tilsit, together with an immense territory, lost near the half of his yearly revenues, and 5,000,000 of his subjects.

The greater part of those provinces which formed a part of the kingdom of Poland, and had, at different times, been subjected to Prussia, were annexed to his majesty the King of Saxony, with power of possession and sovereignty, under the title of the Duchy of Warsaw, and was to be governed according to a new constitution or system of fundamental laws, that should secure the liberties and privileges of the people of the said duchy, and be consistent with the security of the neighbouring states.

This constitution, framed on the model of that of France, was presented, approved by Napoleon, by the grace of God and the constitution, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Pro-

BOOK VII. tector of the Confederation of the Rhine, and signed by him, and counter-signed by his secretary of state, Maret at Dresden, as early as the 22d of July.

CHAP. VIII.

The city of Dantzic, with a territory of two leagues around it, was restored to her former independence, under the protection of his majesty the King of Prussia and his majesty the King of Saxony, to be governed by the laws by which she was governed at the time when she ceased to be her own mistress. For a communication between the kingdom of Saxony and the Duchy of Warsaw, his majesty the King of Saxony was to have the free use of a military road through the states of his majesty the King of Prussia: this road, the number of troops to be allowed to pass at once, and the resting-places, with magazines, to be fixed by a particular agreement between the two sovereigns, under the mediation of France. Neither his majesty the King of Prussia, his majesty the King of Saxony, nor the city of Dantzic, were to oppose any obstacles whatever to the free navigation of the Vistula, under the name of tolls, rights, or duties. In order, as far as possible, to establish a natural boundary between Russia and the Duchy of Warsaw, a certain territory, heretofore under the dominion of Prussia, to be for ever united to the empire of Russia. This territory added several subjects to those of the Russian empire.—Their royal highnesses, the Dukes of Saxe-Cobourg, Oldenburgh, and Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, were each of them to be restored to the complete and quiet possession of their estates; but the ports in the Duchies of Oldenburgh to remain in the possession of French garrisons till a definitive treaty should be signed between France and England; for accomplishing which, the mediation of Russia was to be accepted, on the condition that this mediation should be accepted by England in one month after the ratification of the present treaty. Until the ratification of a definitive treaty of peace between France and England, all the ports of Prussia, without exception, to be shut against the English.

His majesty the Emperor of all the Russias acknowledged the confederation of the Rhine; his majesty Joseph Napoleon, King of Naples; his majesty Lewis Napoleon, King of Holland; and his imperial highness Prince Jerome Napoleon, as King of Westphalia; a kingdom to consist of the provinces ceded by the King of Prussia on the left bank of the Elbe, and other states then in possession of his majesty the Emperor Napoleon. These were the most generally important articles in the treaties. There were others relating to private estates and other property, more interesting, no doubt, to individuals. The time and manner in which the different stipulations in the treaties were to be carried into execution, were fixed by a special convention between France and Prussia.

The Prussian fortresses in Silesia, that held out the longest against the besieging French, were Glatz and Silverberg. They capitulated at last about the end of the campaign, begun the 5th and ended on the 21st of June. Graudenz and Colberg, though vigorously besieged, still held out when a negotiation for peace was entered into at Tilsit. The siege of this last place was fatal to thousands of the French. If all the governors of Prussian fortresses, from the 14th of October, 1806, to the 14th of June, 1807, had been animated with the fidelity and persevering courage of General Blücher, the issue of the war might have been very different. It was at this siege that Colonel Schill, whose heroism, loyalty, and patriotism shone forth so conspicuously afterwards in the north of Germany, first attracted the attention and admiration of his countrymen. He was in the situation of a Prussian captain retired from service, when the misfortunes and dangers of his country called his courage and military skill into action. He was extremely successful, during the siege of Colberg, in harassing the French at the head of an irregular levy. It was this officer that took General Victor prisoner, on his way to Dantzic; when he also intercepted a treasure of 100,000 ducats belonging to the enemy. The King of Prussia, as a reward for his services, raised him to the rank of colonel, and gave him the command of a regiment.

Neither the loss of so much and so fine territory, nor of revenue, nor of population, was so severe a wound, at least a wound so severely felt by the Prussian monarchy, as the degrading conditions on which he was suffered to retain what remained; a military road across Silesia, for opening and maintaining a communication between the King of Saxony's German dominions, and his new Duchy of Warsaw, and the shutting up of all the Prussian ports against England; those very ports through which he had just received arms, and other succours.

The more attentively we consider the pacification at Tilsit, the more we must perceive the Machiavelian policy and deep-laid designs of Bonaparte.

The fine Duchy of Silesia would not, it may be presumed, have been restored to Prussia, if, in the hands of the Prussians, it had not been calculated to serve as a constant source of hostility between the courts of Berlin and Vienna. The military high-way across Silesia was, in like manner, calculated to foment jealousy and discord between the courts of Berlin and Dresden; while it was to be at the same time wholly under the mediation, that is, the control, of France. The confederation of the Rhine, strengthened by the creation of the new kingdom of Westphalia, was rendered too powerful to be shaken by any aggression on the part of Austria on the one hand, or of Russia on the other. And this same kingdom of Westphalia, which it should seem was intended to be pre-eminent among the other members of the confederation, was to receive farther accessions of territory, by the annexion of any other states that might be thought proper by his majesty the Emperor Napoleon. And the Emperor of all the Russias engaged to recognize the limits—whatever they might be—that should be determined by his majesty the Emperor Napoleon in pursuance of the foregoing article. The combination of this article with a passage in Bonaparte's address to the senate about a month thereafter, gave rise to very serious reflection and anticipation. "If," said he, "the house of Brandenburg, which was the first to conspire against our independence, yet reigns, it owes this to my sincere friendship for the powerful emperor of the North. A French prince shall reign on the Elbe. He will know how to conciliate the interests of his subjects, with his first and most sacred duties." By the appellation of the Emperor of the North, it was understood by many to insinuate that the Emperor of Russia was not to extend his dominions any farther to the west or the south.

The young King of Sweden was now the only potentate on the continent of Europe that refused to bend his neck to the domination of Bonaparte. It has been already mentioned, that, on the 18th, an armistice was concluded between the Swedish and French generals at Skatklow, to be continued till ten days should have expired, after notice of an intention to resume hostilities: which term of ten days was afterwards, by an additional article, extended to thirty. But the King of Sweden, having himself assumed the command of his army in Pomerania, immediately declared his intention to acknowledge only the first stipulation of a term of ten days. In the mean time, notwithstanding the armistice, the Swedish navy held all the ports on the Baltic, in the possession, or under the influence of France, in the strictest blockade, and carried on hostilities at the mouth of the Trave, and against the corps of French and Germans besieging Colberg. Remonstrances were made on this subject, a correspondence ensued about the meaning and terms of the armistice, and, at the King of Sweden's request, a conference was held between his majesty and Marshal Brune, June 4, at Skatklow, which lies within the Swedish territory.

The marshal being admitted to the presence of the king, after a short silence, said, "I come here by order of your majesty." The king immediately told him, that he wanted to speak with the marshal himself, that they might come to a clear understanding respecting the additional article of the armistice of Skatklow, and declared his unalterable resolution to recognize only the first armistice.—The conversation, after this, turned on the general situation of affairs in France; the allegiance due by the French to their legitimate king; the virtues and talents of that prince; and, in a word, the principal topics that are usually insisted on by the French loyalists. The king also brought under the marshal's consideration the instability of the present violent order of affairs in France; spoke of the king's proclamation, in which he promised to all the officers who should return to their duty, the continuance of their rank, and plainly attempted to shake his adherence to Bonaparte, and draw him over to the cause of Louis XVIII. his legitimate sovereign. In this conference, the king displayed extensive information and promptitude of understanding, as well as the sublimest sentiments of virtue and religion. The French general, though precluded by his situation from any display of honor, virtue, or religion, sustained the part he had to act, uniting firmness in his own cause, and quick recollection and good sense, with all due respect for the person of his Swedish majesty.

From the first day of the king's arrival at Stralsund, he had been indefatigable in his exertions for improving the fortifications of Stralsund, and for the erection of new works on the island of Rugen. His army at Stralsund consisted of about 13,000 Swedes and 4,000 Prussians, and he was in expectation of being soon joined by a large force from England.

Even after the peace of Tilsit, this heroic prince, too much, alas! in the spirit of Charles XII. of Sweden at Bender, issued from the fortress at Stralsund the following address to the German nation: "German soldiers! A German prince still speaks to you, who has never forgot what is due to honor and duty. Still his voice assails you, to remind you that ye are a nation destined to honor and independence; not to infamy and oppression. Your princes have forgotten the loyalty of their ancestors. They have forgotten that Germany is but one state, and the Germans but one nation. They have exposed you to the most infamous destiny; to promote the abhorred principles and designs of the Corsican Napoleon Bonaparte. Shake off, then, in God's name, the ignominious bondage. Never can a more favorable opportunity occur to turn your arms against the oppressors of your unhappy country. From the ramparts of Stralsund, the only independent burg remaining in Germany, and which has bid defiance to time, thousands will descend and unite with you for your deliverance."

At Putt, a town of Anterior Pomerania, eight miles SSW. from Stralsund, the Swedes were attacked in their entrenchments by a corps of the BOOK VII. grand army of observation, under Marshal Brune. The Swedes, though bearing no proportion to the number of the assailants, made an obstinate, and, to the enemy, a destructive resistance. The loss of the French, or rather of their German and Dutch allies, was computed at 2,400 in killed and wounded; that of the Swedes at 1,500. A regiment of Hollanders was cut in pieces; one of Bavarians destroyed by a masqued battery. The Swedes, however, were driven under the walls of Stralsund; from whence they made frequent and vigorous sallies. They performed prodigies of valour: but these availed not against the army under Le Brune, composed of different nations to the amount of 70,000 men. The Swedish army found itself reduced to the necessity of evacuating Stralsund, which it did on the 19th of August, after destroying their magazines, spiking their cannon, and smashing their carriages, and throwing them into the ditches.

In the evacuation of Stralsund, his Swedish majesty shewed a good deal of finesse. The king being sensible of the impossibility of drawing any more troops, consistently with the safety of the kingdom, from Sweden, and of the necessity there was of strengthening the defence of Rugen, sent his adjutant-general, Baron Vegesack, chief in command at Stralsund, to the senate and deacons of the corporations of Burghers, to ask them if they were determined to stand a siege; in which case they might depend on all the assistance and protection to be expected from the valor of Swedish troops: or if, in order to avoid the calamities of a siege, they were inclined, agreeably to a former petition of theirs to the king, to treat with the enemy for peace? They humbly thanked his majesty for his gracious message; and, of the two options they had given to them, preferred the latter: in consequence of which, the fortress of Stralsund was on the same day committed to their care, and measures were immediately taken for conveying the troops and stores to Rugen; which was effected in the night of the 19th and 20th of August. On the 20th, at three o'clock in the morning, the king leaving Stralsund, went to Altafer, to give all necessary orders respecting the operations going forward; and remained there during the passage of the troops. That the measure adopted by the Swedes might not be suspected by the enemy, an aid-de-camp, by orders of the king, presenting himself at the out-posts of the French, announced, that at any hour that should be appointed, a Swedish officer, General Peyron, would attend General Brune with some proposals relating to the fortress of Stralsund, and that, in the mean time, there should be a suspension of hostilities for twenty-four hours. The aid-de-camp was received by General Reille, and it was agreed on that Marshal Brune should see General Peyron at six o'clock in the evening. At that hour, deputies from the senate of Stralsund arrived at the French out-posts, and in a little time thereafter General Peyron, who had it in charge to declare, in the name of his master the King of Sweden, that as the fortress of Stralsund had been wholly given up to the management of the senate, the king had nothing to do with any military arrangements respecting it; and that he appeared, on the part of his master, only to see that the terms of capitulation should be just and reasonable. Early on the 20th, all the troops and stores were safely landed on the island of Rugen, where 8,000 Germans, in British pay, had arrived some weeks before, under the command of Lord Cathcart, but were by this time employed in another part of the Baltic. The small Swedish army capitulated early in September, and all the islands on the German coast of the Baltic were included in the capitulation.

Revolution at Constantinople.—Fruitless Expedition to the Dardanelles.—Capture, and subsequent Evacuation by the English, of Alexandria.—Unauthorised Expedition against Buenos Ayres.—State of Europe after the Peace of Tilsit.—Decrees of Bonaparte against the Commerce of England.—British Orders of Council.—Misunderstanding with the United States.—Character and Policy of General Christophe, Chief in St. Domingo.—Capture of Curaçoa.—Transactions in the East Indies.

THE designs of Russia on Constantinople have been already intimated in a preceding chapter. During her struggle with France, her attack on Turkey was so well-timed, that a revolution suddenly happened at Constantinople, by means of which Mustapha IV. was placed on the throne. The French attributed this to the influence of British gold, but it is much more probable that it was occasioned by the resentment of the Janissaries, on account of some late innovations made by the government, supposed to be favorable to the Christians. Like his predecessor, the new Turkish monarch fell into the influence of France, which naturally resulted from the hostility of Russia, notwithstanding the Russians declared that it was only their wish to rescue the Ottoman empire from the hands of Bonaparte.

Early in this year, a British fleet was sent out under the command of Sir John Duckworth, consisting of seven sail of the line, two of them three-deckers, besides frigates and gun-boats. This was occasioned by the representation of Mr. Arbuthnot to the British government of the state of affairs, as well as by the advice of the Russian minister at St. Petersburg, and was intended to give weight to the negociation of Britain and Russia with the Ottoman Porte, for the purpose of concluding a peace. The British fleet cast anchor at the Isle of Tenedos about the middle of February, being joined by a British frigate from the harbour of Constantinople, in which Mr. Arbuthnot made his escape, from the dread of personal violence. The English fleet passed the Dardanelles (the Bosphorus Thracius of antiquity) on the 19th, and made no return to the fire of the Turks, as a token of forbearance. But while passing the narrow strait between Sestos and Abydos, they were under the necessity of answering a very heavy cannonade, which was opened on them from the inner castles. Sir Sidney Smith destroyed a small Turkish squadron, and the marines spiked the cannon of a formidable battery.

A fruitless negociation commenced after this, which continued for several days, during which time the Turks constructed very formidable batteries along the shore. From the highest to the lowest orders, the people of Constantinople were employed in this work, which they carried on with unbounded enthusiasm, mounting 600 pieces of artillery on batteries and breast-works. These were managed by French engineers, whom, at the commencement of hostilities with Russia, the sultan had procured from Dalmatia. The British admiral and ambassador offered, in the mean time, to withdraw beyond the Dardanelles, would the Porte deliver up its fleet and naval stores, although the amity of Britain and Russia should be declined; but should this be refused, they threatened to bombard the Turkish metropolis.

However, during the whole of the negociation, the British had it not in their power to put this threatening in execution, as they could not, through stress of weather, maintain a station sufficiently near for bombarding it. Had the Turks been allowed another week to complete their batteries, it is even doubtful whether the British squadron would ever have returned home. From this perilous condition the admiral was glad to get away, instead of attempting to assault a city defended by 200,000 enemies, whose destruction, had it been even possible, would have been an extremely unprofitable act of vengeance. He weighed anchor to repass the Dardanelles on the 1st of March, which was not accomplished without loss and danger. Bullets and prodigious blocks of marble, one of which, weighing full seven hundred weight, cut the mainmast of the Windsor Castle man-of-war in two, and the ship herself was with difficulty saved. The loss in men, sustained by the British admiral, amounted to 250.

General Fox dispatched a force of 5,000 men from Messina, under General M'Kenzie, to take possession of Alexandria, which was accomplished with little difficulty or bloodshed on the part of the British; but unhappily, from a groundless dread of scarcity in the captured place, an attempt was likewise made to take Rosetta, and from the failure of expected assistance from the Mamelukes, as well as from the orders of the commander-in-chief being intercepted, which were sent to the storming party, a large force of the British were surrounded and cut off, in which affair about 1,000 men were killed, wounded, or lost. The commanding officers at Alexandria being now menaced with expulsion by the disaffection of the inhabitants, and with repeated attacks from the enemy, pouring down troops from Cairo, gave up all idea of defending the place, and agreed to the evacuation of Egypt, on condition that the Turks would restore the prisoners who had been taken at Rosetta. These terms being obtained, the British troops returned to Sicily.

The result of Sir Home Popham's unauthorised expedition to Buenos Ayres had left the remainder of the British troops in that quarter, at the close of 1806, in possession of nothing more than the solitary post of Maldonado. Not resembling the conduct of the ministry that succeeded them in respect of Alexandria, though the ministry of Lord Grenville did not approve of the expedition, they were unwilling that the glory of the nation should be tarnished, by being obliged to relinquish a conquest once made.

When the ministers received information of the recapture of Buenos Ayres, they ordered General Craufurd, who had been sent on an expedition to Chili, to give up that enterprize, and repair to the Rio de la Plata, after which the whole British force in the Plata amounted to 9,500 men. It was truly an unfortunate circumstance, that ministers sent out orders to General Whitlocke to take the chief command; and he proceeded to attack the city of Buenos Ayres, with 8,000 of these troops, some of them unquestionably the finest brigades in the service of Great Britain.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. IX.

Though provided with artillery, he marched the troops with unloaded arms, and iron crow's to force their way into the town, and burst open the houses with these porter-like weapons. Some of the British troops forced their way into the town, by their characteristic gallantry, but many of them were overpowered by irresistible numbers. Alarmed at the loss of 3,000 men, who fell as a sacrifice to this mad and desperate measure, he negotiated with the enemy for the restoration of the prisoners, and having agreed to withdraw his army from the river Plata, he returned to Britain, and was condemned to be dismissed from his majesty's service.

After the battle of Friedland and peace of Tilsit, all the continent of Europe lay prostrate before Bonaparte. But the island of Great Britain, mistress of the seas, still defied his power, and threatened to harass his extended coasts with never-ceasing aggression, which she seemed still able to continue by means of the resources opened by her vast commerce. Sweden and Portugal were willing, but not able, to maintain their independence: and Denmark was, above all things, desirous of avoiding the evils of war, either with France or England, by a strict and rigid observance of that neutrality which had hitherto protected her. But, the open country of Holstein opposed no barriers for its own defence and that of Jutland, while its richness and fertility both invited and facilitated the entrance of that army which had hovered long on its frontier.—It was against the commerce of England alone, that Bonaparte had now to make war: and as he could not do this at sea, his fleets having been almost annihilated, he conceived the extravagant, and almost frantic design of doing it at land, by shutting it out, not only from the ports of France, Italy, and Holland, but from all the ports of Europe.

The idea of opposing power at land to power at sea, and undermining the naval greatness of England, by excluding her trade from the great inlets of Europe, occurred to the Directory in 1796. In various publications issued by authority, the advantages to be expected from such a system were represented in glowing colours. But the impression they produced was very feeble.

By a decree dated at Hamburgh, 11th of November, 1807, and another at Milan, 27th of December, declaring the whole island of Great Britain to be in a state of blockade, Bonaparte prohibited and compelled all the other continental powers, even Portugal for a time not excepted, to prohibit commerce with any of the dominions of his Britannic majesty. No nation was allowed to trade with any other country, in any articles of the growth, produce, or manufactures of any of the British dominions, all of which, as well as the island of Great Britain itself, were declared to be in a state of blockade. He appointed commercial residents in every trading country; and no ship was to be admitted into any of his ports without a certification of origin, that is, of the nature of the goods they carried, and that no part of these was English. The wants of men, not the less importunate that they were luxurious or artificial, having opened back-doors to various English articles, both manufactures and colonial produce, he enforced the execution of his decrees against English commerce, by means of new regulations, with greater and greater rigor.

In consequence of these decrees, the English commerce, during the months of August, September, and October, 1807, that part of the year in which the Berlin decree of November, 1806, was carried into full effect, was not only greatly cramped, but lay prostrated on the ground, and motionless, before a protecting and self-defensive system was interposed by the British orders in council. An order of council, January 7th, 1807, containing a measure of mild retaliation, had been evaded, and turned to the advantage of the enemy, in carrying on a circuitous trade to this country. Therefore new orders of council were issued on the 11th, and 21st of November, allowing neutrals to trade with countries not at peace and amity with Great Britain, on the condition of their touching at the ports of this country, and paying the customs or taxes imposed by the British government. The neutrals were thus placed between confiscation and confiscation. If they went to an enemy's port without first paying duty in England, they were to be captured by the British cruisers: and if they came to England and paid the duty, then they would be confiscated if they went to the ports of the enemy. The options were both of them hard. The American government prohibited, as far as their authority could have effect, the subjects of the United States from taking either.—The French certificates of origin were devised to prevent British colonial produce from finding a market. Now, however, under the operation of these orders, the whole of the colonial produce, French as well as English, being brought to this country, would be so mixed that it would be impossible for the enemy to distinguish the one from the other, and the produce of Great Britain could no longer be undersold. This was the general spirit or object of the orders of council. It was a kind of compromise between belligerent rights and commercial interests. It was a system that ran into great complexity; order upon order, in explanation, was issued respecting various cases. And on the whole, immediately after the orders of council were issued, trade began again to lift up its head, and to flourish: not perhaps so greatly as at its best former period; for the injurious and violent system of the enemy, though counteracted by the orders of council, could not be wholly fruitless. Mr. Stephen, in the house of commons, observed: "Our commerce had been in a state of suspended animation; and to complain now, because it was not as flourishing as in its best former period, was just as reasonable as if a man, rescued from drowning, when his vital functions were suspended, should find fault with his deliverer next day, because he found himself weak and languid, or not so full of life and vigour as before he fell into the river."

A treaty of amity had been made by Lord Grenville, with America, on the 31st of December, 1806: but it was not ratified by the president of the congress. For an unauthorised act of force, committed against an American ship of war, spontaneous reparation had been made by Great Britain. But with this particular case, the American government attempted to connect the general question, respecting the right of searching for British seamen, and deserters; to abandon which, was considered by the British government as inconsistent with the maritime rights of Britain.

To balance, in some measure, the discouragements arising to commerce, from the misunderstanding with the United States, which was every day growing worse, a commercial and friendly intercourse was established between Great Britain and General Christophe, who, having defeated and destroyed the Emperor Dessalines, governed a great part of the island of St. Domingo, under the more modest title of the President of Hayti. He had been long opposed in arms by Petion, at the head of the Mulattoes. But in the decisive campaign of 1807, the Mulattoe party were broken and dispersed, and Christophe remained, though not without a competitor for the supreme power, yet without any formidable rival.

Christophe (who was born in St. Domingo, but of African parents) appears to have possessed, in a very eminent degree, the virtues of humanity, and a regard to the true interests of his country, as well as good sense, and military skill and courage. He declared it to be the great object of his government, to repair the havock and devastation of Hayti, by the establishment of just laws, social order, freedom of trade, and, above all, a commercial and friendly alliance with the only people that had stood forth in support of regular government and law, in so many countries subverted, and every where shaken. He had great confidence, and a predilection, for the personal character of the English. He spared the lives of the crowds of prisoners that had fallen into his hands, took great care of the sick and wounded, and assured all men, peaceably disposed, of his protection. This was his ultimate view, even when their mistaken conduct had reduced him to the necessity of opposing it by force of arms. "The friend of humanity," said he in his proclamations, "the man who loves his country, and is submissive to the laws, demands to know what purpose the rebel Petion meant to serve, by exposing to massacre the miserable tools of his ambition. What would have been the destiny of those miserable people whom the fate of war had placed under the power of the president, if his clemency had not spared even those who had pointed their weapons against his person? Why should that CANNIBAL Petion shed such deluges of blood, if it was not on a plan of destruction, conceived on purpose to diminish the population of Hayti? A plan in perfect unison with the projects of their implacable enemies, a plan favored by a faction that had never made any account of the blood that was spilt, when it was to be subservient to the ambitious views of the commander."

Christophe, with the assistance of other men of enlarged views, had been employed for some time in the formation of a new constitution for Hayti; which was proclaimed on the 17th of February, 1807, the fourth year of independence. It was founded on a moral and religious basis; it breathed a spirit of moderation, justice, political wisdom, and enlarged views of the true interests of Hayti, in its foreign and in its internal relations, or concerns. Slavery was for ever abolished in Hayti. Every man was to find a sacred asylum in his own house: his person and property were secure, under the safeguard of the law. Assassination was punished with death. The first magistrate was invested with the title and quality of president and generalissimo of the forces of Hayti, at land and sea, and he was to appoint his successor out of the number of his general officers. The whole of the articles or clauses of the fundamental laws, or constitution of Hayti, fifty-one in number, were reduced under ten heads.—I. The condition of the citizens.—II. Government.—III. Council of state.—IV. Superintendent of the finances.—V. Secretary of state.—VI. Tribunals.—VII. Religion.—VIII. Public education.—IX. No attempts to be made on the neighbouring colonies.—X. General regulations, relating to service in the national militia; security of the persons and properties of foreign traders resorting to Hayti; uniformity of weights and measures in Hayti; marriage, and a rigorous prohibition of divorce; the heritage of children; agriculture, the first, the noblest, and the most useful of all the arts; public festivals for celebrating the national independence, and in honor of the president and his spouse.

The proclamation of the constitution was followed by an address from Henry Christophe, president and generalissimo of the forces, at sea and land, of Hayti, to the army and people. "The light comes to shine among us, and a beneficent constitution has foiled the intrigues and plots that had consigned you to destruction. At length a wise code of laws, consonant with our manners, our climate, our usages, springs as it were out of chaos, to make yet one effort more for fixing the destinies of Hayti.—You have all of you been witnesses, O my fellow-citizens! of the purity of my views, and the sincerity of my intentions. But have not abandoned wretches abused even that sincerity, in fomenting revolt, and kindling the flames of a civil war? Their machinations, however, could not intimidate me, nor divert me for a moment from pursuing, with steady aim, the good of our land. I have never ceased, night or day, to employ myself in devising means for the safety of our native country. What have I not done for the accomplishment of this object? What have I not suffered, in order to frustrate the secret intrigues and plots of faction?

“I have always been in the midst of you, and you can declare, if ever I have suffered views of ambition to influence my conduct, or tarnish my honor. Raised now to the possession of power, by the will of my fellow-citizens, and my brethren in arms, I have been obedient to their call; I have accepted the heavy as well as honorable load of duty, because it was their pleasure to commit it into my hands, and because by doing so, I might once more be of service to our country: happy if my efforts shall be crowned with success, and procure the felicity of my fellow-citizens!

“But for the attainment of this end, my efforts alone are not sufficient. Obedience to the laws is farther necessary, and a conformity with that constitution which has just been presented to you. Your rights, in this, have been religiously maintained. Every individual citizen will find there the safe-guard of his person, his property, and his family.

“The fatal consequences of the wars we have sustained; and, still more, the immoral example of the French had thrown religion into a state of languor, dejection, and depression. Morality was despised, and the corrupted youth abandoned themselves to all the licentiousness of which human nature is so prone at their time of life. Public education was vilified, and committed to the charge of mere mercenaries. It was necessary to restore religion to dignity, respect, veneration, and attachment; to elevate morality to honor, to impress on the minds of the rising generation the sacred principles of good morals, and of honor; and to convince the people that without morality and religion, human society cannot exist.

“Your interests are also guarded by tribunals: whose decisions will be dictated by equity and justice. It is, above all, by probity and good faith that it remains for the people of Hayti to make themselves known, and to be distinguished in the world. As they are, from their local situation, and the peculiar nature of their manufactures, essentially a commercial people, it is their business, by equity, fair dealing, and good faith, as well as by the produce of the country, to draw to their territory merchants from all parts of the world. Commerce being to us the source of all kinds of riches, strangers who come to seek their fortunes in our ports, must receive the same protection we enjoy ourselves, and be treated with that hospitality they well deserve. To feed commerce, and raise it to a state of the highest activity; after restoring the dignity, and veneration due to religion, purified morality, re-established good morals, and encouraged agriculture and commerce, great exertions remain still to be made. It is not permitted to us to neglect the use of arms. The enemy watches our motions, and keeps an eye on our proceedings. The affections of our friends are yet without any guarantee. Treaties of alliance must connect us with the latter. With arms in our hands, we must always be ready to fight the former.—The politics of foreign nations, in regard to us, has not yet been openly displayed. Whatever it may be, let us place ourselves, without however assuming any bravadoing airs of defiance, in such a position as that we may have nothing to fear from hostile intentions. The states that may be desirous of forming political relations with us, or to enjoy the advantage of our commerce, will find us disposed to meet them half way, on principles of a fair reciprocity. To enemies we hold out nothing but battles and death.

“In the midst of all these subjects of attention, let us never forget that the only guarantee of liberty is arms. Though a part of our fellow-citizens be necessarily called to the occupations of agriculture, we ought never to forget that we are all soldiers, and that warlike nations alone have been able to preserve their liberties. Let us bear in mind, how a handful of Greeks confounded the rage of a million of Barbarians, who had come to subdue them to slavery. Let us swear to imitate their example; let us swear to observe ourselves, and make others observe, our sacred constitution, and rather to die than to suffer that, ever, in the smallest instance, to be violated.”—Given at head-quarters, at the Cape, 17th of February, 1807, fourth year of independence.

The character of Toussaint L'Ouverture, another native, who, after a short but brilliant career, fell into the hands of the French, as recorded in the eighth chapter of our fifth book, affords a strong parallel to the patriotism, talents, and virtues of Christophe, the whole of whose code displayed considerable moderation, fortitude, and wisdom. The tenth head, guaranteeing the neighbouring colonies, was a masterly stroke of policy. "The government of Hayti declares to the powers possessing colonies in the neighbourhood, never to interfere in the government of those countries. The people of Hayti make no conquests beyond their own isle, and content themselves with the conservation of their own territory."

A number of turbulent persons in the southern part of Hayti had formed designs of revolt and revolution in Jamaica, and had sent emissaries there for that purpose. But General Christophe, who had been informed of the plot, and who were the principal individuals concerned in it, immediately denounced them, and they were arrested.—It was impossible for the British government to be otherwise than on good terms with such a neighbour. An order of council was issued at the court of St. James's, February 1807, authorizing all British merchant-men bound for Buenos Ayres, and La Plata, to proceed to any port in the island of St. Domingo, not under the power of France or Spain, there to dispose of their cargoes, to take the produce of the country in return, and either to bring such cargoes directly to any port of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or to ship them on-board neutral vessels, to be sold at any of the colonies of the enemy: the owners of the cargoes to return with the proceeds of such adventures on-board the neutral vessels to any of the ports of the United Kingdom.—This measure was certainly wisely calculated both for encouraging the trade of Hayti, and of Great Britain and Ireland.

Another event, fortunate for the British commerce, happened on the 1st of January, 1807. The island of Curaçoa was taken by a squadron of British frigates, commanded by Captain Brisbane, under the orders of Vice-admiral Dacres, with the loss of only three men killed, and fourteen wounded. Yet the harbour was defended by regular fortifications, of two tiers of guns; Fort Amsterdam alone mounted sixty-six pieces of cannon. The entrance was only fifty yards wide, and across it were moored two frigates, and two large schooners of war. A chain of forts on the commanding heights of Misleburg, and Fort Republique, deemed nearly impregnable, was within distance of grape-shot, and enfiladed the whole harbour. Soon after day-break, the British frigates made all possible sail in close order of battle. The vessels appointed to intercept their entrance, were taken by boarding; the lower forts, the citadel, and town of Amsterdam, by storm. The port was entered at a quarter after six in the morning. Before ten a capitulation was signed. The British flag was hoisted on Fort La Republique, and the inhabitants of the town, to the number of 30,000, swore allegiance to the British government.

Affairs in the East Indies were also prosperous, though symptoms appeared of a lurking spirit of discontent, alarm, and daring enterprise, bred by the late horrors at Vellore, the unfortunate and frivolous causes in which they originated, and the repulse of the British arms, after two most desperate attempts on the strong, and it would appear almost impregnable fortress of Burt-pore. The pitiful alterations that had been so childishly introduced into the military dress of the Sepoys, were given up immediately after the insurrection and massacre at Vellore, in July 1806. But for several months after, a spirit of alarm, restlessness, and commotion, was discerned among different corps of native troops: nor did this immediately or fully subside, even after the judicious proclamation of the government of Madras.

A chief, named Dundie Khan, had received a tract of land in addition to that which he held of the company, for his neutrality during the war with Holkar and Scindiah. This man being called on to pay his tribute, said he was not then able to do it; alleging in excuse, that his ryots (tenants) had not brought into his treasury money sufficient to pay the demand. He was treated gently: but this year a complaint was again made against Dundie Khan to the judge and magistrate of the district, who sent him a subpoena, commanding his attendance in the court, by a hircarah, who is a messenger of the lowest class. This indignity was so offensive to Dundie's pride, that he ordered the man's head to be cut off. For this atrocious act of contumacy, he was again summoned before the civil tribunal, and again refused to make his appearance: whereupon a military force was called out, under the command of Major-general Dickens, and encamped before Comona, his principal fort. But, instead of attacking it immediately, as the general advised, the government procrastinated the siege, and allowed him one month to deliver himself up. During the interval, he employed himself in widening his ditch, strengthening his wall, and making every other preparation he could think of for a determined and resolute resistance. At the expiration of the month, he sent word that he would deliver up both himself and the fort to the general, provided he was assured that his life was safe: but he would never consent to appear before a judge; as his government was not subject to the civil jurisprudence of Great Britain.

In consequence of orders from the governor-general the place was invested. Tranches were dug, batteries erected, and a breach that had been made, reported to be practicable. On the 18th of November, about three o'clock, P. M. five companies of his majesty's 17th regiment of infantry, the same regiment that had been so severely handled in the mad attack on the fortress of Burt-pore, with some companies of sepoy, went down to the breach. At the same time, an attack was, made on a fortified garden, to the right of the fort; which was repelled with great slaughter on the side of the storming party. When the English descended the head of the glacis, they saw a ditch twenty-eight feet deep and forty-four broad; but found numberless obstacles in the way of their ascending to the breach, for, at the bottom of the ditch, the enemy had dug pits, which they had filled with powder: and on these, they threw lighted choppers; coverings for huts made of dry wood and straw, and cemented with pitch; by which numbers were blown up. Exposed to this furnace, while bastions, still entire, completely enfiladed the whole of the storming party, the troops remained for two hours, leaving nothing untried that the most determined bravery could suggest for getting into the fort, without effect. They were, at last, called off from this murderous scene, not without difficulty. Next night the enemy evacuated the fortress of Comona, and proceeded to that of Ghurnowrie. The loss of the British at Comona was 35 officers, killed and wounded, and 700 men, of whom 147 were Europeans.

On the 24th of November, regular approaches began to be made to Ghurnowrie; and when these were sufficiently advanced, shells were thrown, which annoyed the troops of Dundie Khan, who had no garden to retreat to as at Comona, so much, that, about seven in the evening of the 10th of December, they abandoned the fort, and escaped across the Jumna. This attempt to take the fort of Comona, without either filling up or partly filling up the ditch, or destroying the bastions, seemed to exceed, in absurdity, and a wanton disregard to the lives of men, the attempt to reduce Buenos Ayres with iron crow's and bayonets.

Extension of Hostilities.—War with Denmark.—Attempt to preserve Peace between Great Britain and Denmark by Negotiation.—Expedition under the Command of Lord Cathcart and Admiral Gambier.—Its Progress and Result.—Projected Partition of Europe.—Bonaparte's Measures for carrying his Design into Execution.—His Chicanery.—Journey to Italy, and Invasion of Portugal,

In contemplating the events of this year, the mind must be forcibly impressed by the very calamitous extension of the war in which Great Britain had, so many years, been almost uninterruptedly engaged. Austria, Russia, the Ottoman Porte, Prussia and Denmark, were now added to the already-formidable host of England's enemies; and it is worthy of observation, with what indifference so large an accession of hostile agency was received by the British public, as well as by the governments into whose hands the management of the war was thrown.

The rupture with the four first of these powers was not, indeed, passed over without discussion or animadversion in the British public, or in the British senate. The circumstance attending, particularly the commencement of the war with Turkey, necessarily occasioned long and animated debates. Still, however, it is true, that the excitement of the national sensibility was chiefly reserved for the Danish war: a circumstance highly creditable to the national feelings and character, as it must be recollected, that Denmark was, with one exception, the weakest of the new adversaries, and that it was from hostilities against her only, that Great Britain derived those advantages by which she succeeded in counteracting the designs of the more powerful of them.

The war with Denmark, and the military and naval measures by which it was commenced, offering the first grand feature of active and successful warfare that occurred in this year, as well as the first specimen of the politics of the new administration, it is the historian's duty to present this subject to his readers in one connected view; in order to which he must take a short retrospect of preceding events.

In the course of the negotiations which, from the unfortunate peace of Presburg, and the still more lamentable policy of the Prussian cabinet, terminated in the conclusion of the treaties of Vienna and Paris, between Prussia and France, repeated intimations were given by Bonaparte, when he found that the tide of fortune continued to run in his favor, that one of the first and principal uses he should make of his success, would be to cut off those channels of communication which Great Britain still preserved with the continent. As the concurrence, and even the co-operation of Prussia was necessary for this purpose, to her were these intimations first addressed. By a most unaccountable infatuation, and in-veiled by motives which it were charity not to characterize, she was not long in acceding to those fatal measures which, ere many months elapsed, proved the cause of her own downfall. She took forcible possession of the king's German dominions, and excluded the British flag from her own ports, and from others to which her power or influence extended.

Previous, however, to the court of Berlin proceeding to this extremity, it was not consistent with Bonaparte's policy that his intentions on the subject should remain secret. It was, on the contrary, very generally rumoured, and as generally credited by the best-informed persons in the north of Europe, that the French ruler would proceed to the immediate execution of this long-threatened measure. He was, at the time, sure of Prussia: Denmark offered yet a feeble obstacle to his wishes; it was to overawe her that he next turned his attention. To engage her by fair or foul means to shut the ports of her German provinces, and to attempt to obstruct the commerce of England in its passage through the Sound, was the next step in his restless career. This was announced in no unintelligible terms, by the many official and unofficial agents which his active diplomacy employed in every court of Europe: the public newspapers were sometimes made the expounders of his will upon these topics.

The court of Denmark could not be the last informed of what was passing; her own interests, and the desire of Bonaparte that she should, at once, learn his determination, and the success he had met with in binding Prussia to it, speedily put her in possession of what she was to expect. She took the alarm. In hopes, perhaps, of obtaining some consolatory information, or in the still more delusive expectation of deriving some assistance by which to avert the impending storm, Count Bernstorff, the Danish minister for foreign affairs, undertook a journey to Berlin. That court, divided as it had been, for some months, between the honest but feeble endeavors of one minister, and the infamous intrigues of another, to regulate its concerns according to their respective views, had not yet thrown itself into the gulph from which it was never to arise. Its final and official consent to Bonaparte's proposal had not been given. He, indeed, knew what he had to depend upon; but the well-intentioned part of the Prussian ministry was still in hopes of preserving their own and their country's honor. To these men, Count Bernstorff directed his attention—on them his hopes rested; and as they did not despair of maintaining their own independence, they allowed him to believe, that they would assist in the support of that of Denmark. He accordingly did not hesitate to assert, that Denmark would resist any attempt upon her independence, from whatever quarter it came. At that time, possibly, he believed it, and the events of the summer of the preceding year rather tended to confirm him in this belief.

The battle of Jena, however, and its immediate consequences, dissipated the delusion. Then Bonaparte became the absolute disposer of all the north and north-east of Germany: he placed garrisons in the Hans-towns; he violated the neutrality of the Danish territory, assumed, for the winter, a position so bordering upon it, held himself, and by his agents, such language, and authorized acts of such magnitude, that there could no longer remain, in the mind of any unprejudiced man, a doubt as to his future intentions. The first of these portentous acts was issued as soon as the suspension of military operations allowed a moment's repose. It was his decree of the 21st of November, declaring the British isles to be in a state of blockade, and rendering the circumstance of this pretended blockade, being violated by any neutral vessel, a ground of legal capture against such vessel.

This was a virtual declaration of hostility against every neutral power that was in habits of commercial intercourse with Great Britain.

When the British flag and commerce had been excluded from the Elbe and the Weser, and those rivers were, in consequence, blockaded by British squadrons, although little was said of the violation of all right, justice, and public law, by which this blockade was occasioned, yet the English government was incessantly harassed with complaints and remonstrances. Prussia, the power principally concerned, and which suffered the most from England's measures, acknowledged the justice of them nevertheless, Great Britain was importuned from day to day, for the interests of Gluckstadt and Altona, and called upon to give up a great measure of national policy for the benefit of the Danish herring-fishery. The consequence of these importunities was, the allowing of such modification in the exercise of the right of blockade as entitled England to the gratitude of Denmark. But this produced only an increase of angry and captious remonstrance. What had been conceded was taken only as a ground for asking more, and for aggravating the pretended injustice of withholding any thing. This also was the case in respect to the very mitigated measure of retaliation adopted by Great Britain, in consequence of the decree of the 21st of November. There, too, all the injustice was on her side. Remonstrances, in a tone little suited to the relative power of Great Britain and Denmark, were addressed by the Danish chargé d'affaires in London, to the secretary of state for foreign affairs, against his majesty's order in council of the 7th of January. They were answered by that minister with all the strength which the justice of his cause afforded him, with all the dignity which Although Denmark was the organ through which these remonstrances reached the British court, they doubtless originated in French councils, and they were recommended, by France, as a means of forcing England to recede from her public measures, or of embarrassing her in the execution of them. Other steps, soon after taken by Denmark, demonstrated, beyond all possibility of doubt, the existence of such an influence. The official documents of the Danish government on the foregoing subject, had not been long received, when others were presented, upon a topic, the very discussion of which would appear to be incompatible with the continuance of a friendly intercourse between the two countries. The epistolary correspondence still carried on between Great Britain and Denmark, as between countries at peace, and between the former and other continental states, had long been an object of jealousy and dissatisfaction to Bonaparte. The British packet-boats still arrived at Tonningen, delivered there the London mails for Denmark, and for other parts of Europe; and English messengers were sent as far, and as often as was thought requisite, in the same directions.

Although the French bureau d'espionage might have occasionally benefited by this intercourse, yet the desire of cutting off all Great Britain's communication with the continent was thought to overbalance this advantage; and Denmark was instructed to propose, that English packet-boats should no longer resort to the ports of Holstein or Sleswig; and that England should, by acquiescing in their exclusion, have the appearance of enabling Denmark to concede a point to Bonaparte, at which he was so much disposed to take umbrage. This was, at first, brought forward as a plan of amicable arrangement, by which Great Britain could, without injury or inconvenience to herself, disembarass Denmark from the importunities and threats of the French government. The proposal was afterwards maintained with more or less animation, according as hopes were entertained of the British government acceding to it: it was, however, rejected by that government; and served only to shew the obsequiousness with which, in every even the minutest particular, the court of Denmark was disposed to further the designs of France. There were, however, other co-existing indications of the malignity of those designs towards Denmark herself; and the sort of infatuation with which they, as well as every other means of intimidation employed against her were overlooked, convicted her government, if not of being wilful accomplices in Bonaparte's nefarious practices, at least of such weakness and submissiveness to his will, as must of necessity produce consequences equally pernicious to Denmark herself, and to the general welfare of Great Britain and her allies.

The manner in which the French decree of the 21st of November was notified to the Danish court, conveyed a sufficient notice of the light in which that decree was to be regarded, and of the authoritative style in which it was meant to be enforced. The French chargé-d'affaires at Copenhagen, not satisfied with the accustomed channels of official communication, repaired to Kiel, to make known his master's will to the prince-royal himself, or to his principal minister.

The town of Hamburgh, where this decree excited more apprehension than at Copenhagen and Kiel, thought it advisable to send a deputation of its senate to Bonaparte, in the faint and delusive hope of persuading him to withdraw a decree which must be fatal to the commerce, and consequently to the independent existence of their town. These deputies were coolly received at the French head-quarters, then established at Posen, in West Prussia. Their having dared even to think of altering the resolves of the autocrat, had excited, in no small degree, his displeasure, which was announced in gestures as well as expressions. Of granting their request he evidently did not entertain an idea; on the contrary, he availed himself of the occasion, as a fit one, to frighten all other powers from hazarding a similar intervention, and, in particular, he addressed a direct and most intelligible menace to the prince-royal of Denmark. It was, perhaps, difficult to speak to the deputies of the commercial intercourse of Hamburgh, without some allusion to the neighbouring towns of Altona and Gluckstadt, and to the commerce which Great Britain carried on in those as well as other parts of the Danish provinces. He, therefore, specifically mentioned the conduct of the prince-royal, and, in a tone of the most despotic arrogance, added—"Let that little prince take care of himself."

It is evident that the Corsican despot was not satisfied with the conduct of Denmark; he exacted still further submission to his will than she had yet testified, and nothing short of the absolute surrender of her independence would satiate that domineering ambition, of which Denmark was not the accomplice, but the victim.

The treachery and audacity of Bonaparte being obvious, the British government sent to sea a powerful military and naval armament, consisting of about 20,000 men, and a fleet of twenty-seven sail of the line, and vessels of all other descriptions, to the number of near ninety pendants. But such had been the secrecy attending these preparations, that the whole force was nearly ready for sea before the extent of it was known to the public, and it had actually left the ports of England many days before its destination was even suspected. A division of the fleet, under the immediate direction of Commodore Keats, was detached to the Great Belt, with instructions to allow no military force whatever to enter Zealand. That enterprising and judicious officer led his line-of-battle-ships through a little known and intricate navigation, without the smallest accident, and stationed his whole squadron in such a manner, as that, by the vessels being within telegraph distance of each other, nothing could attempt to pass them without a certainty of interception. The communication was entirely cut off between Zealand, the adjacent isle of Funen, and the main land of Holstein, Sleswig, and Jutland. No troops from any of the latter could pass into Zealand, which was thus placed, as to any military succour, in a complete state of blockade—a most wise and humane precaution, calculated at once to ensure the success of the enterprise, and to render it as bloodless as possible, if it should be ultimately necessary to have recourse to arms. The British army accompanied the main body of the fleet to the Sound, where it was reinforced by the troops that had been for some time employed at Stralsund and the isle of Rugen, as auxiliaries to the King of Sweden. Lord Cathcart, who was with those troops, was appointed to the chief command of the whole land force. Admiral Gambier, one of the lords of the admiralty, commanded the fleet.

Hitherto the warlike preparations of the British government appear as the most prominent feature of this undertaking. Much of its success was indeed expected to be derived from them; but it was, at the same time, understood, that with the exception of the above-mentioned eventual and precautionary order, to obstruct the passage of any troops across the Belt, the whole of the armament was to remain, in the first instance, inactive. No offensive operations were to be undertaken, until the result of a negociation was known, which was, at the same time, to be opened with the court of Denmark, in order to obtain, without hostility, and by an arrangement equally advantageous to both countries, the object which was considered of paramount importance to Great Britain.

To conduct this negociation, his majesty's ministers selected Mr. Jackson, who had, for several preceding years, resided at the court of Berlin, as envoy from Great Britain, and who was supposed to have become peculiarly well acquainted, in that and other high diplomatic situations, with the general politics of the north of Europe.

Upon the ground of Bonaparte's design to shut the ports of Holstein against the British flag, and forcibly to employ the Danish navy against this country, Mr. Jackson was instructed to repair to the residence of the Prince-Royal of Denmark, and to enter into immediate and unreserved explanation with his royal highness respecting the views and sentiments of the British government. He was to use every argument in his power to induce the prince-regent to enter into these views and sentiments, as no less conducive to his royal highness's own interests and safety; and he was to endeavour, by every means, to establish, on terms of friendly accommodation, the measure which was to be the main object of his whole proceedings. This measure was the delivery of the Danish fleet into the possession of the British admiral, under the most solemn stipulation that it should be restored at the conclusion of the war between Great Britain and France.

Mr. Jackson was directed to urge, in proof of the necessity of taking this step, the belief which the conduct of the court of Denmark had created of her adherence to French, rather than to British interests. The tone assumed by her in the discussions relative to the French decree of blockade, and the reprisals of Great Britain, was to be particularly insisted upon as a sufficient motive of itself, for calling upon Denmark for an unequivocal declaration of her intentions, and for an infallible pledge of the execution of them, if not hostile to his majesty's interests. The recent events in the north of Europe rendered this indispensable, and left no option between exposing Denmark to great and immediate danger, and disarming France of the means on which she was known to rely for the formation of a grand maritime league against Great Britain. The removal of the Danish fleet was necessary, on account of the season of the year, which would soon impede naval operations in the Baltic, and give time and opportunity for the French troops being beforehand with the English in the arsenal of Copenhagen: for that reason, too, ordinary measures of precaution, such as might at other times, and under other circumstances, have been resorted to, were altogether insufficient. This demand, therefore, was to be steadily adhered to, and the British negotiator was directed, after having exhausted every endeavour to obtain the prince-royal's consent to it, as the foundation of a treaty of alliance and general co-operation between the two countries, to announce unequivocally to his royal highness the determination of the British court to enforce it by the operations of the powerful armament assembled in the Sound. In presenting this alternative, every possible stipulation was to be advanced, by which the present and future interests of the crown of Denmark were to be fostered by all the resources of the British empire. Permanent alliance; guarantee, and even aggrandizement of their actual possession; every thing that the fleets and armies, and the treasury of England could afford, both for immediate support, and for future safety, was to be put at the prince-royal's disposal. Specific proposals were made to this effect; and whatever other conditions the Danish government might suggest, would, it was declared, be readily listened to, and, if possible, admitted on his majesty's part. If they feared the effects which an appearance of connivance at the views of England might produce in France, the former had an imposing force at hand, which would give to acquiescence an air of constraint, rather than of free-will, and the extent of the British armament was well calculated to put that construction upon it. In short, every possible stipulation, whether public or secret, that could be devised by either party, for the purpose of rendering the proposed measure acceptable to the feelings of Denmark, and propitious to her permanent interests, was to form a part of the agreement to be entered into upon this occasion: but, in the last resort, the prince-royal was to be informed, that if he failed to agree to them, the British commanders would forthwith proceed to hostilities.

Under these instructions, and with a charge to bring his negotiation to a speedy termination, Mr. Jackson left England on the 1st, and arrived at Kiel on the 6th, of August. The case was foreseen that impediments might be thrown in the way of his communication with the British mission at Copenhagen, and with the British commanders; and a period was therefore fixed, beyond which they were not to wait to hear from him, but were to suppose a constraint to have been put upon his person, and were to proceed in the execution of their instructions.

On reaching Holstein, Mr. Jackson found that a considerable degree of fermentation prevailed there, especially in the port of Tonnungen, on account of an order issued for the second time, under the sanction of the British minister, to the circle of Lower Saxony, enjoining the masters of all British vessels to quit that port, and to place themselves under the protection of the squadron blockading the Elbe. This order Mr. Thornton judged necessary, in consequence of the intelligence he had obtained, of its being the intention of the French General Bernadotte, at that time commanding the French troops in the neighbourhood of Hamburg, to proceed on a certain day to occupy the ports of Holstein and Sleswig. The Danish ministers not having received the same information, or not choosing to give credit to it, were highly offended at this step, which they termed precipitate and rash, and they furthermore asserted, that it did not come within the limits of Mr. Thornton's functions.

It was under these untoward appearances, that, on the day after his arrival at Kiel, Mr. Jackson had to announce the purport of his instructions to Count Bernstorff, and to apply for an audience of the prince-royal, to whom he was directed to address his overture personally. It was understood, that the Danish minister exhibited much warmth of temper, and violence of expression, in the discussion; and that he inveighed, with unusual vehemence, against the general policy of England, which he described with the most unqualified terms of reprobation. —The prince, his master, on the contrary, remained calm and unruffled, during a long interview with the British minister, argued upon the proposals made to him with dignity, and in terms of strong, but decorous resistance, and finally declared his determination to reject them, and to adhere to the line of policy which he had hitherto pursued. It was then that Mr. Jackson had to execute the delicate and painful task of announcing the immoveable determination of his court to employ means of coercion.

The next day, he was informed by Count Bernstorff, that the prince had set out for Copenhagen, and that any proposals Mr. Jackson might have to make in the name of his court, would be sent there after him. Mr. Jackson deemed it, however, most conducive to the interests entrusted to him, whether with a view to the feeble hope he might still entertain of coming to a friendly accommodation, or to the more awful alternative of a rupture, to follow the prince to his capital, and to make, without the necessary interruption and delay of distant communications, a last effort to avert the calamities of war. He accordingly embarked in the bay of Kiel, with a prospect of reaching Copenhagen as soon as his royal highness; but a storm, and an extraordinary continuance of tempestuous weather, baffled this hope, and after a day and a half contending with contrary winds, he landed, and undertook the journey to Copenhagen, through the duchies.

A circumstance attending this journey is worthy of being recorded, as a proof that, in prosecuting the measures of rigour, and apparent harshness, which the interests of the country demanded, no opportunity was lost of shewing such acts of courtesy and conciliation as might induce a corresponding disposition in the minds of the Danish government. In the vessel in which Mr. Jackson crossed the Great Belt, were some twenty or thirty militia-men, going to join their regiments in Zealand. This vessel was boarded by boats from the British squadron, and at the same time another was stopped, in which were several officers belonging to the prince-royal's staff. The British naval officers were, conformably to their instructions, about to send them all back to Funen, when Mr. Jackson interfered, and recommended that they should be allowed to proceed, because the officers were attached to the prince's person, and because it would be indecorous to commit any act of violence or hostility under the eyes of a minister, who was on his way to the seat of the Danish government, with the hope of accomplishing an amicable arrangement of existing differences.—They were accordingly allowed to pass.

In the afternoon of the 12th of August, Mr. Jackson reached Copenhagen; it was no doubt satisfactory to perceive that the secrecy with which the measures of his court had been hitherto pursued, and the vigilance of the squadron stationed in the Belt, had been so successful, that no progress whatever had been made in assembling an army in Zealand. The few militia-men that accompanied him, were the first that had come from without; some dozens were on the road from different parts of that island; a levy had been made in Copenhagen from amongst the populace: but without the walls of that city, and of Elsinour, there was not throughout the whole island a battalion of troops of any description. Not a gun was mounted on the ramparts of Copenhagen. Some fermentation prevailed amongst the inhabitants, occasioned by the prince-royal's sudden arrival there, the cause of which had not become generally or accurately known, although the appearance of the English men-of-war and transports in the Sound, and the secession of the French minister, and of others whose courts were dependent upon France, were thought to indicate that the pressure of the moment came from the side of England. The departure of Mr. Brook Taylor, who had been appointed to supersede Mr. Garlike, as resident minister at the Danish court, strengthened the belief that no friendly disposition existed on the part of England, and that little hope was left of the possibility of an accommodation, especially as it was known that he went off without notifying his intention to the minister for the foreign department, and consequently that no communication of a satisfactory nature could have taken place between them. The apprehensions therefore of the public, as to what was about to happen, were becoming gradually more and more general, when Mr. Jackson's appearance occasioned a momentary suspension of them, and renewed the hope that something might yet be done to avert the calamities which the operations of a large military and naval force could not fail to bring down upon a populous city. Accordingly, his proceedings were watched with the utmost anxiety, and every word that he was known, or supposed to have uttered, was noticed with eagerness by the crowd that soon surrounded the inn at which he had alighted.

Count Joachim Bernstorff, in the absence of his brother, who had not accompanied the prince-royal from Kiel, was charged, in the capacity of under-secretary, with the direction of the foreign department. To him the British negociator had been referred by the principal minister, and to him therefore he applied as soon as he reached the Danish capital, in order to renew his intercourse with the prince-royal, and to ascertain exactly what could be yet expected to result from his royal highness's determination. He was admitted without delay to an interview, and informed at the beginning of it, that the prince had stayed but a short time at Copenhagen, and was returned to Sleswig, whither he had directed all communications to be forwarded to him. The intention of the Danish government now became evident: their plan could only be to gain time, to amuse the British minister by an appearance of negotiation, the particulars of which, when he was at Kiel, were to be sent for decision to Copenhagen; and when he was at the latter place, to be returned back to Kiel. This sort of equivocating conduct, on the part of the Danish government, could not fail to be regarded as an unequivocal symptom of a studied disposition to avoid negotiation, and at the same time to prevent the British minister from forming that conclusion upon which the operations of the British forces were to be regulated. It therefore became necessary for him to state the case pointedly to Count Joachim, and to require an unequivocal answer, whether or not the prince-royal had left him any power and authority to negotiate upon the basis on which alone it was known to his royal highness that a rupture could be prevented. No distinct answer was for a long time given to this question; but upon being closely pressed, the Danish minister was under the necessity of acknowledging that he was at liberty only to take ad referendum the overtures that might be made to him, and to transmit them to Kolding; and that he had no authority whatever to conclude any arrangement upon terms at all compatible with Mr. Jackson's instructions. Upon this point then the negotiation broke off; and Mr. Jackson having taken his leave of the Danish minister, and being furnished by him with the necessary passports, which were accompanied by some expressions of personal courtesy and good-will to him, repaired that same evening on-board the advanced frigate of the British squadron at anchor within a few miles of the port of Copenhagen.

The next morning the British commanders were informed that all hope of a friendly accommodation had been frustrated, and that they were at liberty to proceed in their operations ac-

According to the instructions with which they were for that case provided. The army landed, without opposition, at the village of Vedbeck, on the morning of the 16th of August; and, after some ineffectual attempts of the enemy to annoy its left wing, by the fire of their gun-boats, and to impede its progress by sallies which were always repulsed with loss, it closely invested the town on the land-side. The fleet removing to an advanced anchorage, formed an impenetrable blockade by sea; at the same time, a proclamation was issued by the commanders, notifying to the inhabitants of Zealand the motives of their undertaking; the conduct that would be observed towards them; and an assurance that at any time when the demand of his Britannic majesty should be acceded to, hostilities should cease.

On the evening of the 2d of September the land-batteries, and the bomb and mortar vessels, opened a tremendous fire upon the town, and with such effect that, in the course of a very short time, a general conflagration appeared to have taken place. The fire was returned but feebly from the ramparts of the town, and from the citadel and crown batteries. On the night of the 3d, the British fire was considerably slackened. This has been variously accounted for, some supposing that it was owing to the great expenditure of ammunition on the preceding night, and the apprehension that enough would not remain for the prosecution of the siege: others, that the British general expected that the impression already made would produce proposals for capitulation. It was probably because the enemy adopted the first of these suppositions, that the second was not realized: they, on the contrary, conceived some hope, and were encouraged in their resistance by the relaxation of the fire of the English, which was, however, resumed with so much vigour and effect on the night of the 4th, that the next morning a trumpeter appeared at the British out-posts with a letter from the commandant of the town, containing the proposal of a truce for twenty-four hours, to give time to negotiate a capitulation, which he was willing to conclude on the basis of no British troops being admitted within the city of Copenhagen. It should seem, however, either that that basis was not at first considered as admissible, or that it was accompanied by some other objectionable condition: for the capitulation was not signed until three days afterwards, viz. the 8th of September, when the British army took possession of the citadel, dock-yards, and batteries, dependent upon them. The British admiral immediately began rigging and fitting out the ships that filled the spacious basons where they were laid up in ordinary, and at the expiration of the term limited in the capitulation, they were all, together with the stores, timber, and every article of naval equipment found in the arsenal and storehouses, conveyed to England, where, with the exception of one line-of-battle-ship, that grounded on the isle of Huen, and was destroyed, they all arrived safely in the latter end of the month of October.

It was understood that the capitulation was not altogether approved by his majesty's government, and it must be evident to every body, that the officers who concluded it, unless they did so in virtue of specific instructions, assumed powers that could belong to no commanders.—By stipulating to withdraw from Zealand in so short a time, they brought no small embarrassment upon their employers, if this expedition was to be considered not as a predatory attack upon an unoffending neutral, but as the first step of a great system of policy, calculated to thwart the views of France, and to maintain the just ascendancy of Great Britain; because, with a view to the latter purpose, the mere possession of the Danish fleet was insufficient to protect the navigation of the English flag, to influence the wavering councils of Russia, and completely to disjoin the confederacy that was apprehended; and upon the prospect of which this enterprise was originally undertaken, and subsequently justified, it would have been necessary to keep possession of Zealand. It was thought that proposals for so doing, even after the signature of the capitulation, and without violating its conditions, were in agitation; but, for some unknown reasons, these proposals were not acted upon, and whatever was afterwards done, or attempted in that quarter, bore the appearance of a languor and irresolution, and want of system, which seemed to indicate a change in the policy of the British cabinet, or at least a doubt as to the merits of that which they had hitherto pursued.

So far from taking advantage of the conquest thus easily made of all Zealand, (the small castle of Cronenbourg alone excepted,) the Danes were left at liberty to repair their losses, and to annoy the English again on that element from which they seemed, for a time at least, to have been driven. In the capitulation, no notice whatever was taken of the large quantity of shipping and naval stores that were in the merchant's docks: the consequence of which neglect was, that the English had scarcely left the waters of Copenhagen, before a considerable number of armed vessels was prepared to act against them, and actually drew up in line of battle, in front of the port of Copenhagen, when Admiral Gambier's flag-ship was still in sight of the town. The losses suffered by the British commerce, from this newly-created species of Danish naval force, were very considerable, and they were the more sensibly felt, because, under the apprehension of the turn which might be given, during the ensuing winter, to the politics of the court of St.

Petersburgh, large purchases of hemp, timber, and other naval stores, had been made; these were sent home in single ships, in the confident expectation of having no danger to fear till they cleared the Categat, or that they would obtain ample protection before they reached the Sound; instead of which, they were for the most part captured by small privateers, from the isle of Bornholm, and those which escaped in that quarter fell into the hands of the Danes off Draco Point, where no adequate force had been stationed for their protection.

It seems to have been the prevailing belief of the British government, that they could as easily allay, as they had excited, the animosity of the Danish court, and that it was therefore unnecessary to take any precaution to ward off the effects which that animosity might reasonably be expected to produce. Mr. Jackson, as soon as the capitulation was concluded, presented himself at the Danish out-posts, on the isle of Funen, in order to renew a negotiation to which he probably thought that the prince-royal might be more inclined, by the progress that had been made toward the conquest of his dominions. In this, however, he was disappointed, as, although the object of his appearance off Nyeborg was well known to the prince, he was not allowed to land; and so strict was the determination of the Danes to hold as little communication as possible with a British agent upon any subject whatever, that it was notified, about that time, to the officer commanding the squadron in the Belt, that he should not in future send his flags of truce within cannon-shot of the shore. Notwithstanding this rebuff, a fresh mission was afterwards sent to renew the attempt at negotiation, but with as little success; Mr. Merry, who was employed for this purpose, not having been able any more than his predecessor to draw the Danish government into any sort of intercourse with him.

As soon as the effect of the operation of the English forces was known, a declaration was published by his majesty's government, setting forth the grounds on which the expedition was undertaken, and the sentiments which were still entertained towards Denmark by his majesty. This declaration was afterwards laid before parliament, and became the ground-work of the defence set up by ministers when attacked, as they were most vigorously, on the policy of the whole undertaking.

This Danish war, though justifiable and commendable, was not improved to the extent of which it was capable. The terms of the capitulation of Copenhagen must be considered as highly impolitic—the attempt to negotiate with Denmark, after she had unequivocally expressed her determination to reject all terms of reconciliation, as undignified; and the abandonment of the island of Zealand, as productive of nearly as much evil as the benefit derived from the original undertaking.

Though the Emperor Alexander was seduced by the promises and cajoleries of Bonaparte, the Russian nation remained friendly to the English; by an ukase, however, of the 10th of November, an embargo was laid on all English ships in the harbours of Russia. But through the favor of the inhabitants, and even the officers of the revenue, the English were apprised of this beforehand, so that they had time to set sail and make their escape: which they did, with a favorable wind, to the number of eighty sail, with their cargoes, and arrived, all of them, safely in British harbours.

It is certain, that a partition of Europe was carved out and settled between Bonaparte and Alexander in their conferences at Tilsit. Napoleon, in his speech to the legislative body at the opening of one of their sessions, in August, said: "France is united to the people of Germany, by the laws of the confederation of the Rhine; to those of the Spains, of Holland, of Switzerland, and the Italies, by the laws of our federative system. Our new relations with Russia are cemented by the reciprocal esteem of these two grand nations."—In the same speech, speaking of Alexander, he called him the powerful Emperor of the North. By this federative system, of which Bonaparte was the absolute head and ruler, all the west of Europe, with the isles belonging to Italy and the transmarine dominions of Spain, for this was implied in the Spains and Italies, belonged to himself. He made no mention of the sovereigns of those countries whose power was intended to be only temporary and nominal, but only of the people. What he called a federative system, on this occasion, he afterwards denominated the great empire. In short, according to Bonaparte's views and designs, there were but two independent nations in Europe,—two great empires;—the one under the dominion of the powerful Emperor of the North, and the other under his own. The arrangement agreed on at Tilsit was thus stated in a Corunna gazette, "Bonaparte, or, as he affects to be called, Napoleon, to seize all that part of the continent of Europe which would extend, in one line, from the mouth of the Vistula to Corfu, situate very nearly in the same longitude, and confined in the other directions by the Baltic, the ocean, the Mediterranean, and the Adriatic. Russia was to hold the rest." In this statement of the partition, Turkey in Europe was not excepted: it is probable that Bonaparte, who was aware of the long entertained designs of Russia, and the eager desire of the Archduke Constantine to wear a crown, deemed it politic, for the present, to let the cabinet of St. Petersburg indulge its fancies.

In pursuance of this project, it remained for Bonaparte to take possession of Etruria, the states of the church, the Hanseatic towns, and Denmark; and to subdue Spain, Portugal, and, finally, Austria. And, while he meditated the extension of his conquests, it was necessary, in the first place, to secure the possession of those he had already made, among which, France herself ought to be comprehended, and, by all means, to prevent insurrection and revolt both at home and abroad.—As to the French, he set himself to manage them by gratifying their national vanity and feeding their hopes, while he fastened, more and more, around their necks the rope of despotism. To shew that the interests of the capital still occupied a place in his mind, even amidst campaigns and battles, he issued a decree from his camp at Warsaw, January 13, for the construction of a new bridge on the Seine, in front of the Champ de Mars, the enlargement of quays, and the excavation of four common sewers, for receiving the contents of the other sewers of Paris. A triumphant arch at the Thuilleries was completed on the 1st of December, and, about the same time, a magnificent fount in front of the School of Medicine. Affecting to believe the professions of the French, when he was at the distance of 500 leagues, sincere, he said, in a remarkable speech to his senate, “You are a good and a great people;”—vous êtes un bon et grand peuple. He briefly stated, or rather hinted at, the measures that had been taken, and institutions established or to be established for the promotion of agriculture and the arts, the revival of commerce and general industry; leaving what was farther to be communicated on these heads to his ministers.

Mollien, the minister of the French treasury, or exchequer, in the printed budget for 1807, congratulated his emperor on this subject in the following terms: “Your majesty, sire, has protected your people from both the scourge and burthen of war. Your armies have added to their harvest of glory, one of foreign contributions, which has ensured their support, their clothing, and their pay.” This last compliment, indeed, had nothing in it of the exaggeration of flattery.

During the whole of the campaign, or rather campaigns of this year, in the north, the treasury of Paris was overflowing. A large sum, exclusive of the foreign or exterior exactions for the maintenance of the troops, the splendid establishments of the generals, and the gratification of private cupidity, was thrown into the lists of ways and means, in order to favor an idea that had been publicly insinuated, that foreign tributes would one day exonerate the masters of the world from the burdens they now bore; just as, in the history of the Romans, the military at all times, and at one period the whole states of Italy, were exempted from taxation. In the budget of this year, the whole of the receipts of the treasury for the preceding year was stated at 986,992,539 livres; but this printed account was greatly short of what was actually collected: which had been estimated by some at fifty, and by others at not less than fifty-five millions sterling.

In the report of the minister of war, of July, 1807, the number of Prussian prisoners, taken by the French in the war with Prussia, 1806-7, was estimated at 5,179 officers, and 123,418 privates and subalterns: the number of killed at about 50,000. There was a very natural transition from this exulting report of the minister of war, to that of Visconti, one of the directors of the Imperial Museum of Arts. It recorded, as the spoil collected in the North by the Protector of the Arts, 350 paintings; 242 rare and precious MSS. many of them oriental; 50 statutes; 80 busts; 192 articles of bronze, armour, &c.

At the same time that Bonaparte used every means for flattering French vanity, and feeding the hopes of a sanguine and volatile people, he was anxious to destroy any remains they possessed of liberty, and to render the form of government purely monarchical. By a senatus consultum of the 19th August, communicated to the legislative body on the 18th of September, the tribunate was abolished, and the members of this, still retaining their former salaries undiminished, transferred into the legislative body: committees of which were thenceforth to do the business of the tribunes. It was possible that a conjuncture might arise, which might strike out a spark of liberty, and even kindle a flame of patriotism among the tribunes, a kind of representatives, or advocates of the people. But there was no danger of such an accident happening in the senate. The princes of the blood, that is, the blood of Bonaparte, were members of the senate by their quality: the great dignitaries of the state, officially. And to this body were associated the generals of division detached from foreign service: so that all these classes, taken together, possessed almost a numerical preponderancy in the senate. The meetings of the senate were always private. Strangers might be admitted to those of the legislative body, but not to those of the senate. This last, during the whole double campaign in the North, was not once assembled.

According to the constitution, the judges were chosen for life. But by a senatus consultum of the 12th of October this year, it was enacted, that they should undergo a probation of five years, and then be continued, or dismissed. A commission was also created for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of the judges in being; that the emperor might remove such as should be pronounced unfit for their stations. In all political cases, and all cases of alleged fraud and evasion, the authority of the ordinary courts was superseded by special tribunals: one of which, consisting of three judges appointed by the emperor, was established in each department.

The common objects of fiscal regulations, and the political dominion of the conscription, and of espionage, placed all offices of profit or trust, throughout the empire, that is, France, Italy, and the Low Countries, in the hands of Frenchmen. In the countries nominally allied to France, which were treated with less lenity than the territories annexed to the empire, public authority was everywhere exercised by Frenchmen. Not only were the government and civil employments in the kingdom of Westphalia administered exclusively by Frenchmen; but the Napoleon code, or, a government on the plan of that of France, and the French language, established in its courts. In every thing France gave the ton, and was held to be a model of excellence. In one of the numbers of the Westphalian Moniteur, the French were called "la noblesse du genre humain." Clerks were draughted from the post-offices of Paris to conduct similar establishments in Hamburg and Dantzic. The custom-house officers of Bourdeaux and Nants regulated the whole southern coast of the Baltic. For the purpose of excluding the English commerce, as was given out, and probably still more for that of retaining those parts in subjection, French troops lined the whole coast of Holland. Lewis Bonaparte, acceding, of course, to the desire of his brother, in shutting the ports of Holland against the English, was nevertheless believed to be too indulgent to the trading nation on whom he was imposed. Napoleon, therefore, after a severe reprimand, ordered him not to let the fishing-boats, by means of which a smuggling trade was carried on with the English, go to sea, without having in each a soldier, who should make a report of their proceedings.

Bonaparte, for the establishment of his influence and dominion in Germany, demanded in marriage for his brother Jerome, whom he had torn from his American wife, a daughter of the Elector, or King of Saxony. The princess firmly resisted this project, and rejected the proposal with abhorrence. After this, Jerome was married to the princess Catharine of Wirtemberg.

In both Westphalia and Bavaria the men proper for bearing arms were organized into national guards, and drilled and trained with the greatest diligence and activity. Nor did Bonaparte hesitate to initiate the Bavarian generals in all the secrets or principles of the French tactics. He had great confidence in the king and court of Bavaria. He considered them as the rivals and enemies of the Austrians, against whom he designed in due time to employ them. For he could plainly perceive that Austria was not to be brought under his subjection without a struggle. She was then, and had ever since the peace of Presburg been very actively employed in fostering a military spirit, and reviving public credit. The French troops were not withdrawn from Silesia, or other parts of Prussia. The Austrian fortress of Brannau, that had been retained contrary to the treaty of Presburg, was at last restored in October; but the Austrian territory on the right bank of the Ilonzo was not. In exchange for this, by a treaty concluded at Fontainebleau in that month, the Austrians found it convenient to accept the town and district of Montfalcone, on the left bank of that river; though, as the Austrians affirmed, this was not equal in value to the tenth part of the territory ceded on the right of the Ilonzo.

Some of the secret articles of the treaty of Tilsit were disclosed so early as the latter part of August. The mouths of the Cattaro were evacuated by the Russians, and put into the hands of the French; and French troops were carried by ships belonging to Russia, though yet professing peace and amity towards England, from Otranto to the Seven Isles on the Ionian sea, whose independence had been recognized in a treaty between the Sublime Porte and Russia. All the seaport towns of Italy, those of the ecclesiastical states not excepted, were occupied by French troops, under the pretence of preventing their commerce with England. On the same pretence of waging war with the commerce of England, and enforcing the continental blockade, for the purpose of compelling the common enemy to make a maritime peace, large bodies of troops were marched to Boulogne, to Toulon, to Bourdeaux, and above all to Bayonne.

The treaty of Tilsit was hardly concluded, when Bonaparte turned his eyes towards the west of Europe, and resolved on the subjugation of Portugal and Spain. Or, perhaps, it was at first his design, not directly or formally to subvert the thrones of these kingdoms; but, under the veil of alliance and union, to reduce them to the same total dependence on himself as the confederation of the Rhine, Holland, Switzerland, and Italy. He fomented, through Beauharnois, his ambassador at the court of Madrid, discord in the royal family of Spain, that he might assure to himself the arbitration of their differences. The ambassador suggested to the Prince of Asturias the idea of intermarrying with a princess related to the Emperor Napoleon. The anxiety of the prince to avoid another connection, into which an attempt was made to force him, with a lady selected for him by his greatest enemy, the favourite at once of the queen and the king, and on that account alone the object of his aversion, induced him to acquiesce in the proposition of Beauharnois; with the reservation that it was to meet with the approbation of his royal parents; and he wrote a letter, signifying his wishes, to the French emperor. The clandestine communication between the Prince of Asturias, and other circumstances artfully prepared, gave colour to an accusation of the innocent prince. A few days after he wrote that letter, the Prince of Asturias was arrested and confined in the monastery of St. Laurence. On the 31st of October, all the members of the different councils of state being assembled, a declaration by the king was read, of a discovery that the Prince of Asturias had formed a conspiracy for dethroning him. He had been surprised, it was said, in his own apartments, with the cyphers of his correspondence; which were laid before the council of Castile, with instructions to them to investigate the whole matter. The whole Spanish nation instantly suspected that the pretended conspiracy was an infernal calumny fabricated by the Prince of the Peace, Don Emanuel Godoy, for the purpose of removing the only obstacle that then opposed his audacious ambition.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. X.

The imprisonment of the Prince of Asturias, and the decree fulminated against his royal person, produced an effect quite contrary to the expectations of the favourite; who now, being afraid, thought proper to recede, and to mediate a reconciliation between the royal parents and their son. He forged penitential letters, November 5, to both the king and queen, and made the Prince of Asturias, while a prisoner, sign them. There was nothing in the confessions of the prince of a very heinous nature; and all that they could be fairly supposed to allude to, was the step he had taken, in writing to Napoleon, without the king's knowledge, on the subject of the projected marriage. But a decree that had been addressed, November 3, to archbishops, bishops, prelates, and all the clergy, both secular and irregular, for a solemn thanksgiving to God for the king's deliverance, was calculated to preserve the idea that the prince had formed or entered into a conspiracy against his father's government, if not his life. On the same day that the prince's letters were received by the king and queen, November 5, a royal edict was addressed to the governor ad interim of the council of Castille, declaring that the voice of nature having disarmed the hand of vengeance, the king had been moved by pity, and the intercession of the queen, to pardon his penitent son, who had given information against the authors of the horrible design in contemplation.

Such was the state of affairs when a French courier arrived at the royal palace of St. Laurence, with a treaty concluded and signed at Fontainebleau, on the 27th of October, by Don Eugenio Isquierdo, as plenipotentiary of his Catholic majesty, and Marshal Duroc, in the name of the Emperor of the French. By this treaty it was agreed, among other articles, that the province of Entre Minho y Duero, with the city of

Oporto, should be made over in entire property and sovereignty to the King of Etruria, with the title of King of Northern Lusitania. The province of Alentejo, and the kingdom of the Algarves, in entire property and sovereignty to the Prince of Peace, to be by him enjoyed under the title of Prince of the Algarves. The provinces of Beira, Tras los Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, were to remain undisposed of, until there should be a general peace. The kingdom of Northern Lusitania, and the principality of the Algarves, were to acknowledge, as their protector, his Catholic majesty, the King of Spain, and in no case to make peace or war without his consent. In case of the provinces of Beira, Tras los Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, held in sequestration, devolving at a general peace to the house of Braganza, in exchange for Gibraltar, Trinidad, and other colonies, which the English had conquered from Spain and her allies, the new sovereign of these provinces was to have, with respect to his Catholic majesty, the same obligations as the King of Northern Lusitania, and to hold them on the same conditions. His majesty the King of Etruria ceded the kingdom of Etruria, in full property and sovereignty, to his majesty the Emperor of the French and King of Italy. By a secret convention, it was agreed that French troops should be admitted into Spain, where they were to be joined by bodies of Spanish troops, and marched into Portugal. The troops to be subsisted and maintained by Spain during their march through that country, but to be paid by France. The main body of the army to be under the orders of the commander of the French troops: nevertheless, it was added, should the King of Spain, or the Prince of the Peace, think fit to join the said body, the French troops, with the general commanding them, were to be subject to their order. It is probable that Bonaparte was under no hesitation in paying them this compliment. Another body of French troops, to the number of 40,000, was to be assembled at Bayonne by the 20th of November at the very latest, to be ready to enter Spain, for the purpose of proceeding to Portugal, in case the English should send reinforcements there, or menace it with aggression.

While bodies of French troops poured into Spain, or advanced towards it, Bonaparte set out on a journey to Italy from Fontainebleau, November 15, and arrived at Milan on the 21st. The intention of this journey had been announced in all his gazettes. It was preceded by great preparation and parade, and attracted the eyes of all Europe. And when this journey was combined with the occupation of the Seven Isles, from whence there is so short and easy a passage to Albania, and the mouths of the Cattaro, it was very generally imagined, that a concert had been entered into, between Napoleon and the Emperor Alexander, for an immediate attack on Turkey, and fixing the destinies of Europe. But it appeared almost certain that he had no other object than to divert the attention of Europe from his designs against Spain and Portugal; for he did nothing in Italy suitable to the air of importance that was studiously given to his journey to that interesting peninsula—nothing of any consequence that might not have been done by his authority, without his presence. The Queen-regent of Etruria, as might well be imagined, acceded to the arrangement that had been made for the establishment of her family in Portugal, without a murmur. In a proclamation which she published in the name of her son, it was declared, that in consequence of an arrangement between the King of Spain and Napoleon, Emperor of France and King of Italy, the kingdom of Etruria had been disposed of otherwise than at present, and absolved the Tuscans from their oath of allegiance.

At Milan, Bonaparte received the homage of the Italians in every part of the peninsula. The inhabitants of Tuscany swore allegiance to Napoleon: under whose influence, it was stated in the gazette of Florence, Etruria might expect to be roused from that lethargy into which it had been sunk for some time. The aged elector, now King of Bavaria, including the Tyrol, with his spouse, came also to Milan; thus doing homage, as a kind of vassal, to Napoleon. Eugene Beauharnois, the viceroy, was appointed Bonaparte's successor in the kingdom of Italy, under some restrictions or reservations, in certain contingent cases closely connecting that kingdom with the crown of France. Count Melzi was created Duke of Lodi. From Naples, Bonaparte went to Venice, where he gave orders for some improvements, both for the defence of the city and the promotion of commerce. He returned to Paris in January, 1808, by the way of Lyons, under the title of the Count of Venice, bringing in his train the late Queen-regent of Etruria and her young son.

After the peace of Tilsit, Bonaparte demanded of the court of Lisbon, 1. To shut up the ports of Portugal against England. 2. To detain all Englishmen residing in Portugal. 3. To confiscate all English property; denouncing war in case of a refusal. And, without waiting for an answer, he gave orders for detaining all Portuguese merchant-ships that were in the ports of France. The Prince-regent of Portugal, hoping to ward off the storm, acceded to the shutting up of his ports; but refused to comply with the other two demands, as being contrary to the principles of the public law, and to the treaties that subsisted between the two nations. The court of Portugal then began to adopt measures for securing its retreat to the Portuguese dominions in South America. For that purpose, the prince-regent ordered all ships of war, fit to keep the sea, to be fitted out; and also gave warning of what was intended to the English, directing them to sell their property and leave Portugal; in order thus to avoid an effusion of blood, which, in all probability, would have proved useless. He resolved also to comply, if possible, with the views of the Emperor of the French, in case he should not allow himself to be softened down to more moderate pretensions. But Bonaparte peremptorily insisted, not only on the shutting up of the ports, but on the imprisonment of all British subjects, the confiscation of their property, and a dereliction of the project of a retreat to America. The prince-regent, when he had reason to believe that all the English, not naturalized in the country, had taken their departure from Portugal, and that all English property had been sold, and even its amount exported, adopted the resolution to shut up the ports against England, and even to comply with the other demands of France; declaring, however, at the same time, that should the French troops enter Portugal, he was firmly resolved to remove the seat of government to Brazil, the most important and best-defended part of his dominion.

It had been frequently stated to the cabinet of Lisbon by the English ambassador, Lord Strangford, that the King of Great Britain, in agreeing not to resent the exclusion of British commerce from the ports of Portugal, had gone to the utmost extent of forbearance; that, in making this concession to the peculiar circumstances of the prince-regent's situation, his majesty had done all that friendship could justly require; and that a single step beyond this line of modified hostility, must necessarily lead to the extremity of actual war. Nevertheless, the prince-regent, in the fond hope of preserving Portugal by conciliating France, on the 8th of November, signed an order for detaining the few British subjects, and of the very inconsiderable portion of British property that yet remained at Lisbon. On the publication of this order, Lord Strangford removed the arms of England from the gates of his residence, demanded his passports, presented a final remonstrance against the recent conduct of the court of Lisbon, and proceeded, November 17, to a British squadron, commanded by Sir Sydney Smith, who immediately, on the suggestion of Lord Strangford, established a most rigorous blockade at the mouth of the Tagus. A few days after, the intercourse between the court of Lisbon and the British ambassador was renewed. Lord Strangford, under due assurances of protection and security, proceeded to Lisbon on the 27th: when he found the prince-regent wisely directing all his apprehension to a French army, which had entered Portugal, and was on its march to Lisbon, and all his hopes to an English fleet. The object of this march he was at no loss to understand: for Bonaparte had declared in his journals, "That the house of Braganza had ceased to reign." Lord Strangford promised to his royal highness, on the faith of his sovereign, that the British squadron before the Tagus should be employed to protect his retreat from Lisbon, and his voyage to the Brazils. A decree was published, November 28, in which the prince-regent announced his intention of retiring to the city of Janeiro until the conclusion of a general peace, and of appointing a regency to administer the government at Lisbon, during his royal highness's absence from Europe.

On the morning of November 29, the Portuguese fleet set sail from the Tagus, with the Prince of Brazil and the whole of the royal family of Braganza on board, together with many of his faithful counsellors and adherents, as well as other persons attached to his present fortunes. The fleet consisted of eight sail of the line, four large frigates, several armed brigs, sloops, and corvettes, and a number of Brazil ships; amounting in all to about thirty-six sail. While they passed through the British squadron, the English ships fired a salute of twenty-one guns, which was returned with an equal number. The friendly meeting of the two fleets, at a juncture so critical and important, was a most interesting and affecting, as well as a grand scene. Four English ships of the line were sent by the British admiral to accompany the royal family to Brazil.

The Portuguese fleet had not left the Tagus, when the French, with their Spanish auxiliaries, appeared on the hills above Lisbon, under the command of General Junot, who had formerly resided for several years at the court of Portugal, in the character of an ambassador from France.

Though the Portuguese had long been under an apprehension of a visit from the French, they were surprised by their sudden arrival. The court of Portugal had always considered the march of an army through the mountains of Beira as a matter of extreme difficulty, if not impracticable, especially in the winter season. They never dreamt that their invaders would advance by any other route than the course of the Tagus. The entrance of the French troops into Portugal was not known at Lisbon till their advanced-guard had reached Abrantes. The retreat of the royal family from Lisbon was, of course, a matter of extreme precipitation. Junot did not meet with any more opposition on his entrance into the capital, than when he passed, on his march, the Portuguese frontier. The greatest professions were made on the part of the French army, and nation, of friendship and affection for the people of Portugal. Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Lisbon were disarmed; they were inhibited from assembling together to the number of more than ten at a time; cannon were placed in all the streets and squares; very heavy contributions were imposed for the support and maintenance of the French, with their Spanish auxiliaries: and, in a word, the French system of governing subdued countries was completely established.

After Portugal had fallen under the dominion of France, the valuable island of Madeira was committed to the protection of British troops; but to be restored to Portugal on the conclusion of a general peace.

A copious exposition of the French emperor's intrigues, for the purpose of subjugating Spain, shall be given in the succeeding book.

CHAPTER I.

Bonaparte intent on the Subjugation of Spain and Portugal—Description of Spain, and its Inhabitants.—The Inquisition.—Bonaparte's Plan of Treachery and Force.—Arrival of the Grand Duke of Berg in Madrid.—Deplorable Situation of the Prince of the Peace.—Success of Murat's Intrigues.—King Ferdinand in Bonaparte's Power.

THE treaty of Tilsit was hardly concluded, when Bonaparte, agreeably to what had been agreed upon between himself and the Emperor Alexander, turned his eyes to the west of Europe and Portugal. In this he was, no doubt, actuated by a passion still more stimulative than his usual lust of conquest. His mind could never be quiet as long as the sovereignty of a neighbouring, great, and glorious peninsula resided in the house of Bourbon. The reduction of that noble country under his own power appeared to be necessary to the security of the thrones he had already usurped, and even to his personal safety.

Spain, in ordinary language, is considered as consisting of one extensive state or kingdom; and so it is in its foreign relations, and sundry other points of the greatest importance. But under the crown of Spain are united many states or kingdoms, which have gradually coalesced into one monarchy; each kingdom (formerly so called) retaining still, together with many particular laws and usages, a peculiar and distinct character, and some of them separate local interests: circumstances which, no doubt, presented to such a mind as Bonaparte's, hopes of being able to call to his aid the destructive power of division and discord. The northern districts, containing the kingdom of Navarre, the three provinces of Biscay, and the principality of Asturias, enjoy peculiar privileges, being governed in some sort by themselves, and by far the greater part of their contribution appropriated to the expenses of their own municipal establishments. These provinces, consisting chiefly of prodigious tracts of mountains, produce a race of hardy, active, and industrious people, who, for want of sufficient employment in the cultivation of the ground, or in the iron mines with which their country abounds, have naturally devoted themselves to the sea-service in various branches; and from those tracts of sea-coast, the Spanish navy draws the most energetic portion of its mariners.

The other parts of Spain are very unequally distributed into those belonging to the crowns of Castile and Arragon. To Castile belong the kingdom of Galicia, the provinces of Burgos, Léon, Zamora, Salamanca, Estramadura, Palencia, Valladolid, Segovia, Avila, Toro, Toledo, La Mancha, Murcia, Guadalaxara, Cuenca, Loria, and Madrid: to these are added, the four ancient Moorish kingdoms, composing the provinces of Andalusia, namely, Seville, Cordova, Jaen, and Grenada. To the crown of Arragon belong the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia, the county of Catalonia, and the kingdom of the island of Majorca. The states under the crowns of Castile and Arragon had their several cortes or assemblies of representation of the different orders of inhabitants; but those of the two crowns were never united into one body; and, indeed, since the days of Charles V. who resigned the government in 1555, the cortes were seldom convened.

The government, however, though in appearance despotic, and independent of the will of the nation, was, as is the case in even the most arbitrary European states, tempered by a complicated system of councils, in which, if judgment was tardy, it was commonly just.

The great and important Peninsula of Spain (including Portugal, naturally a part of the same country, and at various periods subject to the same sovereign) is most advantageously situated between the Atlantic and the Mediterranean. It commands the narrow strait of Gibraltar, the only communication between these seas, and occupies in some respects the centre of the habitable globe. This Peninsula, a name by which the Spaniards frequently designate their country, extends, where broadest, from west to east, about 640 English miles : and from north to south about 540 miles. The population of the whole Peninsula has been computed at between thirteen and fourteen millions : of which Portugal is supposed to contain two millions. The remainder, distributed over Spain, will afford only about seventy-four persons for every square mile, while the inhabitants of England are computed to exceed 150, and those of France 170, on a similar extent of territory ; many parts of the interior being almost destitute of springs and rivers ; and others being exceedingly mountainous. Indeed, on the first glance at the map of Spain, it appears to be a country shaped, and in a very great measure consisting in belts of mountains, ramifying from one another, and leaving intervals of various breadths between them, yet all of them linked to the same mass or stock. The sea-coasts of Catalonia, Valentia, Murcia, Grenada, and Andalusia, present scenes of amazing fertility, active industry, and crowded population.

The hardy, industrious, and adventurous mountaineer of the north ; the sedate and solemn inhabitant of the broad and arid plains of the two Castiles and La Mancha ; the pensive and taciturne Estramaduran ; the volatile and talkative Andalusian ; the laborious cultivator of the shores of the Mediterranean—these different descriptions of the population of Spain, resemble each other in so few points as to appear to be of very different descent, and indeed the production of very different countries and climates. In one important particular, however, the national character of the Spaniards might be traced in every corner of the kingdom. Entire and respectful submission to the authority of the sovereign was every where predominant. For while the Catalanian was proud to think, that the king was not king, but only Count of Catalonia ; and the Biscayan, that he was only lord of his mountains ; they both agreed in yielding most implicit obedience to his mandates, when promulgated in the customary forms of each respective district. That the Castilian and the Arragoneze should glory in their submission to the royal authority, is not surprising, as from the union of the sovereigns of Castile and Arragon, sprang the family which in the course of time became masters of the whole country. Arragon and Castile had likewise embraced the interests of the house of Bourbon in the dispute with that of Austria in the beginning of the last century. That the Catalanians, however, should have evinced, in 1808, a decided attachment to the reigning family, against whom they had obstinately and long contended, and from whom they had received no favors, but many marks of dislike, having been disarmed, and experienced various other proofs of distrust from those in power—that the Catalanians should manifest, at this time, a decided and determined attachment to the interests of the house of Bourbon, can be attributed only to an inveterate aversion to their neighbours on the northern side of the Pyrenees, with whom, for ages, they had been in almost continued hostility, from whose inroads and devastations they had often severely suffered, and whose revolutionary doctrines, moral, political, and religious, as well as their actions, were calculated to inspire Spaniards with aversion and horror.

Another feature, strongly characterising all the provinces of Spain, and indeed all the subjects of his Catholic majesty in any quarter of the world, was an absolute devotion, not only to the doctrine, but to the policy of the see of Rome. In this absolute devotion to the church, the Spaniards, with perhaps the exception of the Portuguese alone, exceed all the nations of Europe. The church or secular clergy in Spain possessed immense revenues, even the third part, it has been computed, of the whole land. But it would be extremely erroneous to conclude that those revenues were appropriated to the sole enjoyment, application, or accumulation of the several incumbents. Of late years, it became the policy of government to grant pensions on the richest benefices, for the support of various public establishments ; so that even the metropolitan of Toledo, the most exalted dignitary of the kingdom, although nominally enjoying a revenue of perhaps 100,000*l.* sterling, could not, in reality, dispose of more than a fourth part of that sum. The opening of roads, the construction of bridges, the establishment of inns and schools, the reparation of churches and chapels, and various other works of public utility, which in Britain are carried on at the expense of the state, or more frequently of individuals and associations, in Spain are often imposed on those enjoying large ecclesiastical possessions ; and where such duties have not been imposed, the incumbents, from zeal to the public good, or even from a desire to imitate the conduct of their predecessors or contemporaries, have often charged themselves with that performance.

The attachment of the people to the church and its ministers was also warmly cherished by the exemplary deportment of the episcopal body, who, from the day of their appointment, immediately repaired to their respective dioceses, in which they uniformly resided, there devoting themselves entirely to the various duties of their station.

The abbeys and convents over Spain, appropriated to the reception of females, were some years ago calculated to contain about 34,000 persons, while those for the accommodation of monks and friars, of all descriptions, were inhabited by nearly double that number; of this last description of persons, by far the greater number might certainly be considered as lost to the prosperity of the kingdom. But the benedictine, Bernardine, and some others of monks, might, in many respects, be considered by the population around, as eminent benefactors to the country. Continually fixed to one spot, in the midst of their possessions, they were naturally led to cultivate and improve their common heritage; and being destitute of the power of accumulation, they regularly expended their income in the quarter from whence it was drawn.

On the other hand, the great nobles and proprietors of land, with a very few exceptions, abandoning the care of their vast domains to agents and intendants, drained the country and its cultivators, to supply the exigencies of an idle and often dissipated life in the capital and other great towns. This injurious dereliction of the country is, no doubt, to be attributed in a great measure to the introduction of French manners, and a frivolous taste; and, above all, to the jealousy entertained by the first Spanish kings of the house of Bourbon, of the old nobles of Spain, who, in the war of the succession, had very generally, and very naturally, manifested a predilection for all the house of Austria.

A great and opulent lord, residing constantly on his own domain, was an object of displeasure to the court; of discountenance, and even molestation.

The noble spirit of the Spanish grandees in general, sunk in luxury, indolence, and vice, suffered a gradual depression. They were neither invited, nor ambitious to share in the employments of the state, so that, with the exception of a few ancient names in the church, of the army, and still fewer in the navy, the great body of the Spanish nobility ceased to be of any political importance in the kingdom.

It is extremely remarkable, that it was not among the great landed proprietors, who had, in the common phraseology, the greatest stakes, that the patriotism of the Spaniards shone forth with the greatest splendour: but among the commercial class, whose property was in some measure moveable, and the clergy, who at best were only life-renters. The nobility, in general, did not seem to feel the amor patriæ, the attachment to natal soil, so strongly as the clergy of all ranks, who resided in their own dioceses, parishes, and monasteries, nor even as that of the poor peasants.

The deep-rooted aversion to the French was not confined to the province of Catalonia, but pervaded all the northern and middle provinces of the kingdom.

From the earliest periods, down to the beginning of the last century, the Spaniards and French were engaged almost without intermission in hostilities. Another reason for the peculiar dislike of the Spaniards to their northern neighbours, is found in the national character and deportment of the French, who not only affected or really felt some degree of contempt for the Spaniards, but commonly took very little pains to conceal or disguise their sentiments towards them. In this national dislike, persons of all nations, who entered Spain from France, were involved, until their real country was known.

As the Spaniards had their national aversions, so they had likewise their national attachments. It would, at first sight, be difficult to account for any partiality they should entertain for the British nation. But such a partiality they certainly did possess, and were eager to demonstrate. The two countries, it is true, were formerly closely connected by various ties, political and commercial; and those ties, notwithstanding the dissolution of the ancient intimacy, by the accession of the house of Bourbon to the throne of Spain, still retained a firm hold of the steady and honorable character of the Spaniards. As men are never more intimately united than by a community of sentiments or feelings, and as the Spaniards believed the English to have no greater respect for the French nation than they had themselves, this warm-hearted people looked on a Briton as in some measure a sharer in his own existence. The Spanish traders, in general, had an opinion that in all commercial transaction, no nation came so near as the British to their own, in probity, punctuality, and fairness of dealing.

On the subject of religion, the Spaniards sincerely lamented the defection of the English from their ancient professions of faith. But this sorrow was attended rather by a hope, that, at some future period, Britain might return to what they considered as the right way, than by any aversion to their company, or their opinions on other subjects: whereas the natives of Ireland, formerly more numerous in their service than of late years, who professed to be in communion with the church of Rome, were, in many instances, subject to the suspicion of a temporizing policy.

The frequent wars between Britain and Spain unquestionably kept alive a spirit of estrangement in the Spanish nation. But that great portion of the people who pretended not to inquire into the secret causes of political events, were in the habit of attributing those public enmities rather to the predominating influence of the French counsels in the administration of national affairs, than to the existence of any just cause of complaint immediately between Great Britain and Spain. The epoch and the manner, however, of the commencement of hostilities on the part of Britain, had materially affected the general feelings of the Spanish nation with regard to their ancient ally.

Although, in estimating the sum of happiness possessed by any nation, calculations ought not to be founded merely on the theoretic system of their public constitution, yet where such a constitution is as perfect as human wisdom can devise and virtue carry into effect, the people have, cæteris paribus, the greatest chance of happiness in every sense of the word. It may, therefore, appear surprising to a British subject, that a nation once so distinguished as the Spaniards in science and in arms, for so considerable a lapse of time as that between the abdication of Charles V. of Austria and Charles IV. of Bourbon, should have been contented with a system of government presenting so few positive advantages, and producing so many real evils to the various classes in the state. The Spanish nation, however, had been for more than two centuries in a state of gradual decay, so that the deterioration was scarcely perceptible in its progress; and it was only by comparing the situation of the country at different periods, that its decay could be ascertained. It is not by any single act, but by an accumulation of facts, examples, customs, precedents, and laws, that a nation loses its liberty. What is considered by the present generation, at the worst, only as a mist, is seen by succeeding ages as a dark and portentous cloud.

The personal character, too, of a sovereign or of a minister, has a very powerful influence in even the best organized constitutions on the happiness of a state. The general dispositions and conduct of some late sovereigns of Spain had, consequently, a strong tendency to attach a people, naturally honorable and loyal, and of great sensibility, to their government in general, and to incline them to attribute what hardships they endured to the malign influence of corrupt counselors, rather than to the dispositions or intentions of the prince. These observations, however, are applicable only to the mass of the Spanish people; for an improved system of things, both civil and religious, had been long and earnestly wished for by many of the ablest and most enlightened individuals in the state. Others there were also, who, infected with the philosophy of modern times, secretly longed and waited for a general dissolution of the administration in church and state, in order to raise, in its stead, an edifice more conformable to their conceptions of a perfect government.

When it is considered that all public discussion of matters, relating to either religion or government, was almost entirely prohibited throughout the Spanish dominions; and that men, desirous of information on these points, had no other resource than secretly to avail themselves of the writings of authors living under more liberal systems of government, it may be easily conceived, that an aversion, and a degree of hostility too, must naturally have been produced, in the minds of even good men, to an administration by which such restraints were imposed on the exercise of the human faculties, on subjects the most congenial and important to the nature of mankind. Such men may, for various reasons, carefully observe the rules of exterior submission; but their wishes for a change must, in the end, produce an alteration in their language, and also in their conduct. In such a case, how happy it is for the country of which the established constitution acknowledges the duty, and allows the means of improvement, and when reformation may supersede the necessity of revolution!

The dread tribunal of the inquisition in Spain had, for many years back, been gradually withdrawing from public notice. Its powers, however, though seldom exerted were not diminished. The unfortunate OLAVIDE, the founder of the establishments for peopling the Sierra Morena, sunk under the power of the holy inquisition, though as much, probably, for his political as his religious offences. In the beginning of the French revolution, when neither pains nor cost were spared, clandestinely to introduce and disseminate, throughout Spain, publications adapted to excite disorders in the state, the formidable weapons of the inquisition were actively and successfully wielded in defence of the established system of government; for any assault on the rights of the temporal sovereign of the kingdom was regarded as a direct attack on the paramount authority of the spiritual head. The alliance between church and state in Spain was extremely close; or, rather, the political and ecclesiastical authorities were, in a great measure, identified. The kings of Spain were the great champions of the church, and the most brilliant era in the history of the Spaniards is that, when they proceeded, by degrees, to take possession of the munificent donations of the pope, with the sword in one hand and the cross in the other. And, in fact, it was not less by the religious zeal of the missionaries than the heroic valor of the military order, that the vast transmarine empire of Spain was established.

The steady devotion of the Spaniards to the church is not, therefore, founded in a greater propensity to piety than is felt by other nations only, but in part, by a recollection of former times, when they were exalted to so high a pitch of glory by the sword of the Lord and of Gideon. The high-minded pride of the Spanish nation, finding no support in recent, turns to the contemplation of events long past; to the victories of Pavia, Lepanto, and St. Quintoin, to their contests with the Moors and with the Romans.

In the combined plan of treachery and force which Bonaparte determined to pursue for the attainment of his present object, his first care was to foment discord in the royal family of Spain. The Prince of Asturias had transmitted to his father a sketch of the administration of the Prince of the Peace, charging him with a notorious attachment and subserviency to France. Bonaparte, apprized of this, stimulated the minister to the proceedings at the Escorial, in the autumn of 1807; and then it was his policy to take the part of the oppressed prince against the ministerial oppressor. He set himself, by nourishing the ambition of the son, to excite the resentment of the father, and rendered them mutual objects of mistrust, jealousy, and hatred; to disarm the father from taking precautions against the son, while he still encouraged the son in his views of immediate succession; to seduce to his side all that was most respectable in Spain, or by infamous propositions and surmises, to subject them to popular suspicion; and, in a word, by striking a mortal blow at the head of government, and getting into his power, or under his influence, or debasing the great lords to whom the public eye might, at a great crisis, be naturally turned, to tear asunder all the bonds of the social compact, and plunge the defenceless nation into anarchy and confusion.

Bonaparte, during his affected journey to Italy, thought it now time to give an answer to letters he had received from the King of Spain, detailing the particulars of the mysterious arrest and release of the Prince of Asturias. In his answer he denied his knowledge of that affair, or that he had ever received any letter from the prince: though this answer did not accord with that afterwards transmitted by Bonaparte to Ferdinand, in which he formally declared that he had received it. He yielded his consent, however, to the king's proposal of a marriage between the heir-apparent and a French princess of Bonaparte's family, well foreseeing that this would afford a pretext for interfering in the private concerns of the royal family; and, at any rate, that it would withhold or withdraw their attention from ulterior measures for the fulfilment of his designs in the Peninsula. By this conduct, also, he hoped to gain the good-will of the Spanish nation in general, as it had a tendency to convince them of the sincerity of his friendship for persons to whom they were so firmly attached. It was further calculated to give credit to the insinuations of his emissaries in Spain, that Bonaparte was secretly inclined to favor the cause of the Prince of Asturias: while, through other channels, the minister, and favorite, Godoy, the Prince of the Peace, whose ambitious views must soon have been discovered by a person of Bonaparte's penetration, was privately encouraged to look forward to the protection of France, in the accomplishment of his nefarious projects.

By this mysterious conduct, Bonaparte threw the king, the queen, the Prince of Asturias, and the favorite, into extreme disorder. And while they were, all of them, under this distraction, the French troops were suffered to spread themselves over a great portion of the Spanish territory. So far did this infatuation prevail in the administration, that orders were issued for receiving and treating the French on a more liberal scale than even their own troops.

The French forces assembled on the borders of Spain remained but a short time inactive. Early in the year a corps entered Catalonia, and, on the 16th of February, obtained possession of the town and citadel of Barcelona, with the impregnable position of Monjuich. It had been industriously spread through Spain, that the French troops were destined to assist in defending the coast against any insult from the British army or navy. Advantage had been taken of the national feelings to lull the Spaniards into security, by asserting, that one great object of their powerful allies would be the reduction of Gibraltar, and its restoration to its ancient and natural masters. Whispers and surmises, too, were industriously circulated of an intended invasion of Algiers and Morocco.

The mask was, however, soon thrown aside, and the French army, which had advanced to Barcelona, pretended only to halt for a few days for refreshment, before they should proceed on their march to the southern provinces, and, availing themselves of the alliance between the two nations, of the unsuspecting confidence of the inhabitants, and even of the garrison of the place, seized without bloodshed and without difficulty, the citadel, Monjuich, and every other important post. The garrison of Monjuich, reported to have amounted to about 6,000 men, retired and made way for the French without a struggle; a fascination hardly credible; and, indeed, the whole conduct of the Spanish commanders at Barcelona remains involved in mystery and suspicion.

The fortress of St. Sebastian and Figueras were seized by the French in a similar way. At Pampeluna, however, they experienced a different reception. On the arrival of a French officer at the head of a body of troops from Bayonne, before Pampeluna, demanding admission and possession of the place, the governor, whose garrison had, for different reasons, been much reduced, refused to comply with this demand, until orders should arrive from his own government.—The French commander then brought

The French armies that had entered Spain, instead of proceeding to their pretended destination, remained inactive on the banks of the Ebro, many miles from Madrid. Messengers passing to and from that place indicated the existence of negotiations, but their object was unknown. The Spanish troops recalled from Portugal, were rapidly advancing towards the capital. The court seemed in the greatest anxiety and uncertainty, the orders of one day being uniformly countermanded by those of the following. The administration of public affairs seemed to be arrested in its course.

Many important posts in Spain, as well as the whole of Portugal, being now in the possession of the French, Bonaparte transmitted to the King of Spain a complaint, that no further steps had been taken in the affair of the marriage of the heir-apparent with his relation. To this Charles replied, that retaining the same sentiments, he was desirous that the marriage might take place immediately. Some further proceedings were necessary to the maturation of Bonaparte's project, and not being willing to commit these to writing, he thought he could not find a fitter instrument than Don Eugenio Izquierdo, whom he had detained in Paris, in a state of great dejection and terror, artfully impressed upon him, that he might thereby be induced the more effectually to execute his commission, by inspiring the royal parents and the favorite with the same feelings. Izquierdo was ordered to repair to Spain: which he did in a very mysterious and precipitate manner. According to his verbal statements he did not bring any proposal with him in writing. On his arrival, under these circumstances, at Aranjuez, one of the royal residences, situate on the banks of the Tagus, twenty-three miles to the southward of Madrid, the favorite conducted him to the presence of the royal parents, and their conferences were conducted with so much secrecy, that it was impossible for any one to discover the object of his mission. But soon after his departure from the Spanish capital, their majesties began to shew a disposition to abandon both the metropolis and the Peninsula, and to emigrate to Mexico.

The recent example of the determinations taken by the royal family of Portugal (which, as some conjectured, was not uninfluenced by secret communications from France) induced Bonaparte to form a hope that the example of the court of Lisbon, in the present perplexing and alarming posture of affairs, might be followed by that of Spain. But scarcely had the first reports gone abroad of the intentions of the royal family of Spain to abandon the place of their residence, a resolution unequivocally indicated by the preparations which were going on, when discontent and fear were exhibited in the most lively colours in the features of all the inhabitants of the capital, and of all ranks and classes of persons. This alone was sufficient to induce their majesties to refute the rumour, and to assure the people that they would not abandon them. Nevertheless, such was the general distrust, such the magnitude of the evils which must have ensued, and such and so many the symptoms of a fixed determination to emigrate, that every one was on the alert, and all seemed to be impressed with the necessity of preventing a measure fraught with so many mischiefs. The danger increased, and with this the fears of the people. A popular commotion burst forth at Aranjuez, on the 17th and 19th of March, like a sudden explosion; the people being actuated by a sort of instinct of self-preservation. The favorite, who, without the title of king, had exercised all the functions of royalty, and who favored the scheme of emigration, in the hope of withdrawing himself, and some portion, at least, of his enormous treasures from the vengeance of an oppressed and outraged people, was thrown into prison. Scarcely had this tempestuous scene taken place, when the royal parents, finding themselves deprived of the support of their favorite, the Prince of Peace, took the unexpected resolution, which, according to Cevallos, they had for some time entertained, of abdicating their throne. According to a French newspaper, (and at this time no newspaper was published in France not correspondent to the ideas and views of Bonaparte) one party in Spain accused the Prince of Peace of entering into a project with the queen herself, with whom he was universally believed to be a very particular and most intimate favorite, for the ruin of her son, the heir-apparent, under the pretence of his having engaged in a plot for the dethronement of his father. The Prince of Asturias, it was added, had been drawn into this conspiracy by the suggestions of his princess, his own cousin, a daughter of the king of the Two Sicilies, by a sister of the ill-fated Maria Antoinette of France. This princess, feeling the degraded situation in which her husband was held through the influence of the favorite Godoy over the sovereign, took, it was said, little pains to suppress her sentiments on the subject.—Her aversion to the French nation could not be a matter of surprise, when we reflect on the indignities and miseries brought by them on her parents, and many other near relatives at Paris, at Milan, and at Florence. The queen could, besides, discover in the Princess of Asturias, only a rising rival and a future mistress, of whose sentiments respecting her own conduct, public and private, she probably was not ignorant. Whatever might have been the cause, the queen and the princess had been for some time on no very amicable terms; so that when this young princess was snatched away by death, in her early years, persons were not wanting to surmise that she had fallen a sacrifice to the arts of the queen, the favorite, and the French partizans at Madrid.

During the popular alarm of March 16, the king issued a proclamation, thanking his subjects for the marks they had shewn of attachment to his person, and explained the objects of the French troops, which had entered his dominions with the most friendly purposes, to assist in defending the country against the common enemy. The assembling of his guards, it was stated, was solely for the purpose of protecting his person and family, and not for accompanying him on a journey, which none but evil-minded persons could suppose to have been projected. The king closed this very extraordinary publication, with directing the people to conduct themselves as they had hitherto done towards the troops of his great and good ally.

On the following day, March 17th, when the Spanish guards were to leave Madrid, the inhabitants crowded round them, beseeching them not to abandon their native country, for the purpose of securing the flight of a prince who sacrificed his subjects to private considerations. "Do you think," said they, "we have no more spirit than the people of Lisbon?"

Some of the ministers themselves, who opposed the king's retreat, distributed circular notices in the neighbouring villages, informing the inhabitants of what was going forward, and of the danger to which the country would consequently be exposed.

On the 18th of March, the people poured along the road to Aranjuez. Relays for the king's carriages had been provided on the way to Seville. The village of Aranjuez was crowded with troops; and the baggage of the court lay already packed up in the apartments of the palace. The preceding night had been busily spent in preparation. The residence of the Prince of the Peace was protected by his proper guards, (for to such a point of dignity he had been exalted) with a peculiar countersign, while those of the palace had another. At four o'clock in the morning of the 19th, the people rushed in crowds to the favorite's hotel, but they were driven back by his guards, who, in their turn, were driven back by the king's body guards, that had ranged themselves on the side of the people. Godoy's doors were forced; the furniture was broken; the apartments were laid waste; the princess, his spouse, daughter of Don Antonio, and niece to the King of Spain, appeared on the stairs, and was conveyed, by the people, with all the respect due to her birth and rank, to the king's palace. The favorite himself had disappeared, and his brother, Don Diego Godoy, commandant of the king's body-guards, was arrested by his own troops.

Their majesties, who had not retired to rest during the night, were, early in the morning, visited by the French ambassador, and soon after appeared a proclamation, in which the unfortunate sovereign was made to say, that having resolved to take upon himself the command of his forces by land and sea, he had thought it proper to relieve Godoy of the duties of generalissimo, and permit him to retire to whatever place he might choose.

When this was known in Madrid, the people attacked the houses of Godoy, and of certain ministers of state attached to his party, and destroyed the furniture without opposition, on the part of either the magistrates or the two Swiss regiments in the Spanish service, then quartered in the town. The Prince of the Peace was at last discovered in a garret, where he had been concealed for six-and-thirty hours, and committed to the closest custody in the common jail.

In the midst of these disorders the king, on the 19th of March, at Aranjuez, published a declaration, signed, as usual, by himself, stating, that on account of his constant infirmities, and of the necessity he felt of withdrawing himself from the burthen of public affairs to a private life, in a climate better adapted than that of Madrid to the state of his health, he had, after the most deliberate consideration, resolved to abdicate the crown in favor of his well-beloved son and heir, the Prince of Asturias. It was likewise directed, that this decree of his free and spontaneous abdication should be instantly and punctually obeyed by all his subjects. Cevallos laboured to shew that this abdication was, in truth, free and unconstrained; but this has very reasonably been made a question.

The first act of the new king, Ferdinand VII. was to publish a manifesto, declaring his own innocence and that of his ministers, and stating the nature of the papers and cyphers found in his apartment at the Escorial, in the month of October last. Among his first acts, also, was one confiscating all the property, of every description, belonging to the Prince of the Peace.

At the same time, he appointed the Duke of Infantado, a wealthy and popular nobleman, of the first class, and particularly attached to the interest of the new sovereign, and of England, to the important station of the president of the great council of Castile, the first tribunal of the kingdom. To him, also, he committed the command of the Spanish life-guards. Many salaries and pensions, which had long remained unpaid, were instantly discharged out of the funds of the late favorite.

Bonaparte, ignorant of this sudden event, and, perhaps, never supposing that the Spaniards were capable of such resolution, had ordered his brother-in-law, styled by him Prince Murat, Grand Duke of Berg, to advance with his army towards Madrid, under the idea that the royal family were at this time on the coast ready to embark; and, that, far from meeting the slightest obstacle on the part of the people, they would receive him with open arms as their deliverer and guardian angel. He conceived that the nation was in the highest degree dissatisfied with their government, not reflecting that they were only dissatisfied with the abuses that had crept into the administration of it.

The instant that the Grand Duke of Berg was apprized of the occurrences at Aranjuez, he advanced with his whole army to occupy the capital of the kingdom: intending, no doubt, to profit by the occasion, and to take such steps as should seem best calculated to realize the plan of making himself master of Spain.

Meanwhile the mysterious project of Bonaparte, the proximity of his troops, and the ignorance in which Ferdinand VII. was of the real object of Bonaparte's approach, as was given out, to Madrid, induced this prince to adopt such measures as appeared best calculated to conciliate his goodwill. Not satisfied with his having communicated his accession to the throne in the most friendly and affectionate terms, the king, Ferdinand, appointed a deputation of three grandees of Spain to proceed to Bayonne, and in his name to compliment his imperial majesty. He also appointed another grandee of Spain to pay a similar compliment to the Grand Duke of Berg, who had already arrived in the vicinity of Madrid.

One of the contrivances to which the French agent had immediate recourse, was, to assure the king, and to spread the rumour in all quarters, that his imperial majesty's arrival in Madrid might be expected every moment. Under this impression, the necessary orders were given for preparing apartments in the palace, suitable to the dignity of so august a guest. And the king wrote again to the emperor how agreeable it would be to him to be personally acquainted with his majesty, and to assure him, with his own lips, of his ardent desire to strengthen more and more the alliance which subsisted between the two sovereigns.

The Grand Duke of Berg had, in the meantime, entered Madrid at the head of his troops, March 23, and begun, without a moment's delay, to sow the seeds of discord. He spoke in a mysterious manner of the abdication of the crown, executed amidst the tumults of Aranjuez, and gave it to be understood, that until the emperor acknowledged Ferdinand VII. it was impossible for him to take any step that should appear like an acknowledgment, and that he was under a necessity of treating only with the royal father. This pretext did not fail to produce the effect which the grand duke intended. The royal parents, the moment they were informed of this circumstance, availed themselves of it to save the favorite, who remained in confinement; and in whose favor Murat professed to take an interest, for the sole purpose of flattering their majesties, mortifying Ferdinand, and leaving fresh matter of discord between the parents and the son.

"Neither the king nor myself would be troublesome to the grand duke, who has so much to do; but we have no other friend, no other support than him and the emperor; in whom all four of us, the king, our intimate friend, who is also a friend of the grand duke, the poor Prince of the Peace, my daughter Louisa, and myself, place our hopes. The letter I received from Louisa last evening, containing an account of what the grand duke had said to her, has penetrated and filled us all with the liveliest feelings of gratitude and consolation, and hopes of every thing from these two sacred and incomparable persons, the grand duke and the emperor. But we would not that the duke should remain ignorant of any thing we know; although no one says any thing to us, and although no answer be given to our demands of necessities. But nothing of this kind gives us any concern. The only thing in which we are interested, is the welfare of our sole and innocent friend, the Prince of the Peace, who, in his person, amidst the most barbarous treatment, even before this conspiracy took place, always called, with the greatest emotion, the grand duke his friend. If I were so happy as to have him here, and the grand duke were near, we should have nothing to fear. He wished for the grand duke's arrival, pleasing himself with the hope, that his highness would accept his house to lodge in. He had some trinkets to present him. In short, he thought of nothing else than of that happy moment when he should appear in the presence of the grand duke and the emperor. We are under perpetual apprehensions lest they should kill or poison him, if they should suspect a design to save him. Is it not possible to take some measures for preventing this? The grand duke might march his troops without saying for what purpose, enter the place where the poor Prince of the Peace is confined, and without leaving a moment's time for any one to fire a pistol, or to do any thing else to him, remove his guards, (who would think it glorious, and have a pleasure in taking his life) and substitute his own troops, who should be under his own immediate orders, in their place. For, if he be suffered to remain in the hands of those base traitors, and under the orders of my son, the grand duke may be assured that he will be killed. Yes, so long as he is in those sanguinary hands, the head body-guards of my son, we cannot but tremble for his life. For though both the grand duke and the emperor are desirous to save him, they will not give them time. For heaven's sake, we implore of the grand duke to take measures for the accomplishment of what we request; for if any time be lost, his life is in danger. He would be safer in the paws of blood-thirsty lions and tygers. My son was yesterday after dinner closeted with Infan-tado Escocquitz, that wicked priest, and St. Charles, the most malignant of the whole. They remained shut up together from half-an-hour after one to an half-an-hour after three o'clock. The gentleman who goes with my son Charles, is a cousin of St. Charles's; he is a man of parts, and not ill-informed: but he is a vile American; and, like the same St. Charles, extremely hostile to us: though they all profess friendship for the king my husband, and claim the patronage of the Prince of the Peace, to whom they say they are related. All the others that go (to Bayonne) with my son Charles; are of the same faction, extremely well qualified to do all possible mischief, and to set forth the most horrible falsehoods in the light of truth. I entreat the grand duke to pardon my wretched composition; for I am very apt to forget some French words and idioms, having been accustomed to speak nothing but Spanish for forty-two years. I came here to be married when I was only thirteen years and a half old; and although I speak French, it is not with fluency. But the grand duke will comprehend my meaning, and know how to correct the defects of my style."

There were five other notes sent to the Grand Duke of Berg, written in the hand of Queen Louisa, in which the Queen of Spain expressed the same anxious concern for the Prince of Peace, and spoke with as much freedom of the Prince of Asturias. There were two letters on the same subject, (the deplorable situation of the Prince of Peace) addressed to the Grand Duke of Berg by Charles IV. and the Queen of Etruria.

In this state of things, the new king made his public entry into Madrid, March 25, without any other parade than the most numerous concourse of the capital and its environs, the strongest expressions of love and loyalty, and acclamations which sprung from the joy and enthusiasm of his subjects—a scene, said Cevallos, truly grand and impressive, in which the young king was seen like a father in the midst of his children, entering his capital, as the regenerator and guardian of the monarchy. Of this scene the Grand Duke of Berg was a witness: but far from abandoning his plan, he resolved to persevere in it with greater ardour. The experiment upon the royal parents produced the desired effect. But whilst Ferdinand, the idol of the nation, was present, it was impossible to carry the plan into execution. It was therefore necessary to make every effort to remove this prince from Madrid. To accomplish this object, the grand duke was extremely assiduous in spreading reports of the arrival of a fresh courier from Paris, and that the emperor might be expected speedily to arrive in the Spanish capital. He set himself, in the first place, to induce the infant Don Carlos to set out to receive his Imperial Majesty Napoleon, on the supposition that his royal highness must meet him before he should have proceeded two days on his journey. His majesty, Ferdinand, acceded to the proposal. The grand duke had no sooner succeeded in procuring the departure of Don Carlos, than he manifested the most anxious desire that the king should do the same, leaving no means untried to persuade his majesty to take this step, assuring him that it would be attended by the happiest consequences to the king and the whole kingdom.

At the same time that the Grand Duke of Berg, the French ambassador, and all the other agents of France, were proceeding in this course, they were, on the other hand, busily employed with the royal parents to procure from them a formal protest against the abdication of the crown. His majesty, Ferdinand VII. being incessantly urged to go to meet the French emperor, painfully hesitated between the necessity of performing an act of courtesy, which he was assured would be attended with such advantageous results, and his reluctance to abandon his loyal and beloved people in such critical circumstances.

Cevallos declared, that in this embarrassing situation, his constant opinion, as the king's minister, was, that his majesty should not leave his capital until he should have received certain information that the emperor had actually arrived in Spain, and was on his way and near to Madrid; and that even then he should only proceed to a distance so short as not to render it necessary to sleep one night out of his capital. His majesty persisted for some days in the resolution of not quitting Madrid, until he should receive certain advice of Napoleon's approach; and he would have probably continued in that determination, had not the arrival of General Savary added greater weight to the reiterated solicitations of the grand duke, and the Ambassador Beauharnois. General Savary was announced as the envoy from the emperor, and in that capacity he demanded an audience from the king, which was immediately granted. Savary professed that he was sent by the emperor merely to compliment his majesty, and to know whether his sentiments with respect to France were conformable to those of the king his father; in which case the emperor would forego all considerations of what had passed, in no degree interfere in the internal concerns of the kingdom, and immediately recognize his majesty as King of Spain and the Indies. The most satisfactory answer was given to General Savary, and the conversation was continued in terms so flattering, that nothing more could have been desired. The audience terminated with an assurance, on the part of Savary, that the emperor had already left Paris, that he was near Bayonne, and on his way to Madrid.

Scarcely had General Savary left the audience-chamber, when he began to make the most urgent applications to the king to meet the emperor, assuring him that this attention would be very grateful and flattering to his imperial majesty. And he affirmed so repeatedly, and in such positive terms, that the emperor's arrival might be expected every moment, that it was impossible, (Cevallos observed,) not to give credit to his assertions. The king at length yielded. The day appointed for his departure arrived. General Savary, affecting the most zealous and assiduous attention to his majesty, solicited the honor of accompanying him on his journey, which, at the farthest, according to the information which he had just received of the emperor's approach, could not extend beyond Burgos.

The king, during his absence, supposed to be only for a few days, left at Madrid a supreme junta of government, (an assembly or board of commissioners,) consisting of the secretaries of state, usually five in number, the president of which was his uncle, the infant Don Antonio.—General Savary, in a separate carriage, followed the king to Burgos. But the emperor not having arrived there, the king, urged by the earnest and pressing entreaties of General Savary, proceeded to Vittoria. The general, convinced that his majesty had resolved to proceed no farther, continued his journey to Bayonne, with the intention, no doubt, of acquainting the emperor of all that had passed, and of procuring a letter from him, which should determine the king to separate himself from his people. At Vittoria, his majesty received information that Napoleon had arrived at Bourdeaux, and was on his way to Bayonne, where, in fact, he arrived with his spouse, on the 15th of April. While the French troops were making suspicious movements in the neighbourhood of Vittoria, General Savary appeared in that city, with the following letter to Ferdinand, from the Emperor of the French, dated at Bayonne, April 16.

“ My Brother!—I have received the letter of your royal highness: in the papers which you have received from the king, your royal highness's father, you must have found a proof of the interest which I have always felt for you. You will permit me, under the present circumstances, to speak to you with truth; and I wished, by my journey to Madrid, to draw over my illustrious friend to some necessary ameliorations of his states, and also to give a certain satisfaction to the public feelings. The removal of the Prince of the Peace appeared to me to be necessary for the prosperity of his majesty, and that of his subjects. The affairs of the North had retarded my journey. The events at Aranjuez took place. I pass no decision on what had previously fallen out, nor upon the conduct of the Prince of the Peace; but I know well that it is dangerous for kings to accustom their people to shed blood, or to seek to redress themselves. I pray God, that your royal highness may never feel this by your own experience. It is not the interest of Spain to injure a prince who has married a princess of the blood-royal, and who for a long time directed the affairs of the kingdom. He no longer has any friends; your royal highness will possess them no longer than while you shall be fortunate. The people willingly revenge themselves for that homage which they pay us. How also can the process be drawn up against the Prince of the Peace, without involving in it the queen and the king your father? This process would give nourishment to hatred and factious passions, the issue of which would be fatal to your crown. Your royal highness has no other right thereto than that which you derive from your mother. If this process degrade her, your royal highness destroys your own right. He who has lent an ear to weak and disloyal counsels, has no right to pass sentence on the Prince of the Peace. His misdeeds, if he can be reproached with them, go to destroy the rights of the crown. I have frequently expressed a desire, that the Prince of the Peace should be removed from affairs; the friendship of King Charles has often induced me to remain silent, and to turn away my eyes from the weakness of his conduct. Unhappy mortals that we are! Weakness and error, these are our mottoes; but all may be arranged; namely, that the Prince of the Peace should be banished from Spain, and I should invite him to a place of retirement in France. As to the abdication of King Charles the Fourth, that has taken place at a moment when my troops were traversing Spain; and in the eyes of Europe, and of posterity, I should seem to have sent so many troops solely for the purpose of pushing from his throne my ally, and friend. As a neighbour sovereign, it is fit that I should know this abdication, before I acknowledged it. I say it to your royal highness, to the Spaniards, and to the whole world, if the abdication of King Charles has proceeded from his own will, if he was not driven to it by the insurrection and uproar at Aranjuez, I make no scruple to accede to it, and to acknowledge your royal highness as King of Spain. The circumspection which I have observed for this month past, must be a security to you for the support which you shall find in me, should ever party differences disturb you, in your turn, upon the throne.

"When King Charles made us acquainted with the events of last October, I was very much affected by them; and I think that by my efforts the affair of the Escorial received a happy issue. Your royal highness was much to blame—I have no need of any other proof of this, than the letter which you wrote to me, and which I shall always desire to consider as not having come to me. Your royal highness must distrust all popular commotions and insurrections. A few of my soldiers may be murdered, but the subjugation of Spain shall be the consequence of it.

"I see with pain, that some persons at Madrid have disseminated certain letters of the Captain-general of Catalonia, and have done every thing to excite disturbances among the people. Your royal highness perfectly comprehends my meaning. You perceive that I have touched slightly upon many points, which it would not be proper to enlarge upon.

"You may be assured that I will conduct myself in every thing towards you, in the same way as to your royal father. You may rely upon my desire to arrange every thing, and of finding an opportunity of giving you proof of my perfect regard and esteem.

"Herewith accept," &c.

To the contents of this letter, General Savary added so many and such vehement protestations of the interest which the emperor took in the welfare of his majesty and of Spain, that he even went so far as to say, "I will suffer my head to be cut off, if, within a quarter of an hour after your majesty's arrival at Bayonne, the emperor shall not have recognized you as King of Spain and the Indies. To support his own consistency, he will probably begin by giving you the title of highness, but in five minutes he will give you that of majesty, and in three days every thing will be settled, and your majesty may return to Spain immediately." The king, after some hesitation, determined to proceed to Bayonne.

Scarcely had the King of Spain set foot on the French territory, when he remarked, that no one came to receive him, until on his arrival at St. Jean de Luz, the mayor, attended by the municipality, made his appearance. The carriage stopped, and the mayor addressed his majesty in the most lively expressions of joy, at having the honor of being the first to receive a king, who was the friend and ally of France. Soon after he was met by the deputation of three grandses, who had been sent off by Ferdinand before to meet the French emperor; and their representation, with respect to the intentions of Napoleon, were not of the most flattering nature. He was now, however, too near Bayonne to think of changing his course; wherefore he continued his journey. There came out to meet the king, the Prince of Neufchâtel, and Duroc, marshal of the palace, with a detachment of the guard of honor, which the citizens of Bayonne had formed to attend his majesty Napoleon, and they invited his majesty to enter Bayonne, where a place had been prepared for his residence; which he did on the 20th of April.

The residence prepared for the king appeared to all, and was, in reality, but little suited to the guest who was to occupy it. This remarkable and expressive neglect formed a striking contrast with the studied magnificence which the King of Spain had prepared for the reception of his ally at Madrid. While the king was taken up with doubts concerning the meaning of a reception he so little expected, he was informed that the emperor was on his way to pay him a visit. His imperial majesty arrived, accompanied by a number of his generals. The king went down to the street-door to receive him, and both monarchs embraced each other with every token of friendship and affection. The Emperor of the French staid but a short time with his majesty, and they embraced each other again at parting. Soon after, Marshal Duroc came to invite the king to dine with the emperor, whose carriages were coming to convey the king to the castle of Marrac, about the distance of a mile and an half from Bayonne, where his imperial majesty resided, which accordingly took place. Napoleon came as far as the steps of the coach to receive his majesty; and having embraced him again, led him by the hand to the apartment provided for him.

ABOUT the middle of March an occurrence took place at Barcelona, which, if the hostile designs of the French government against Spain could possibly have appeared unequivocal before, rendered them more apparent. General Dubesme, commander-in-chief of the French army of observation of the Eastern Pyrennees, had been for some time busily employed in throwing great quantities of ammunition and provisions into the forts of Barcelona and Monjuich. The Count of Espellata, captain-general of Catalonia, in a letter dated at Barcelona, the 18th of March, thus remonstrated with the general on this suspicious and alarming movement.

"The troops that occupied the citadel and the fortress of Monjuich, might have considered all the houses of Barcelona as so many magazines, and the provisions they contained as their own. There was no enemy to excite apprehension; nor any thing to be expected in which the inhabitants of the town were not as much interested as the troops in garrison. Your excellency occupied the fortresses in the name of the emperor and king as an ally; and it was only on the faith of this that the Spanish government consented to its occupancy. It was under the same impression, that the town opened to you and your people its treasures, and resources of every kind, which you have received in the bosom of our families. The city gave you an honorable reception, and shared with you the provisions destined for their own use. Military law prescribes the mode of provisioning garrisons when engaged in actual hostilities, or besieged, or when the country is threatened with famine. In such cases the general is under a necessity of taking measures of precaution for the subsistence of his troops, by the formation of magazines. But where circumstances of this kind do not exist, such measures are calculated only to excite suspicion and mistrust. Neither my conduct, nor the constant moderation of my troops, nor the favorable reception accorded to the French army, is calculated to give any ground of alarm.

"The town is provided with necessaries of every sort, as you will see by the official statements signed by the intendant; and, even if we should fall short of some articles, your excellency has given me the strongest assurance that preparations are at this moment going on in the ports of France for supplying this place with provisions free from all duties. When his majesty the emperor and king, whose great name inspires us with confidence, at the same time that our fortresses are occupied by his troops, shall be informed of our pliability and honorable principles, it will not be with pleasure that he will be told, that this city, in return for its deference and conduct, has been alarmed by terrible menaces and preparations. Your excellency will be pleased to learn from his imperial majesty, what he thinks of your design before you carry it into execution, accompanying your request with this explanation of my sentiments on the subject; as I also, on my part, shall lay the whole of this matter before the king my master, without whose orders I cannot accord to your excellency what the forts occupied by the Spanish troops have not themselves.

"If, before receiving orders from the emperor, your excellency should see any reason for living with precaution, and under the influence of fear in fortresses to be considered, at present, as forming part of the city, then indeed it may be proper to have recourse to the measures you propose. But as, at present, there was no necessity for any such measure, I wish to impress your mind with a conviction, that to establish magazines, and form considerable depôts of provisions in the forts cannot serve any good purpose; that such an intention is remarkable, calculated to rouse attention, and offensive; and that it may not perhaps be in your excellency's power, nor mine, to remedy the consequences which such a fermentation must excite among the inhabitants."

This letter of Count Espellata, copies of which were handed about in Madrid, and over all Spain, met with general sympathy and applause, and contributed very much to raise and heighten the national sentiment of resentment and indignation against the French and the French party.

The state of affairs at Barcelona must have been known to the Spanish court a considerable time before the departure of Ferdinand from his capital to meet Bonaparte. This journey excited in all the villages and towns through which his majesty passed, the greatest discontent and liveliest indignation; which were not appeased by the proclamations that preceded his progress, declaring that he had the most positive and satisfactory assurances, that nothing but the most profound respect would be shewn to his person; without which assurances he would never have accepted the Emperor of the French's invitation, and that within four or five days, with the assistance of his good brother and ally, the affairs of Spain would be settled to his own satisfaction, and also to that of his subjects.

At Vittoria, when the people learnt, even from the authority of the king, that Bonaparte was suffered to interfere in those affairs, there was a general fermentation among the inhabitants, who, April 19, crowded about the royal residence, in the most tumultuous manner, giving vent to their sentiments without restraint.

A new proclamation was issued, and the Duke of Infantado endeavoured to impress the assertions contained in it, in harangues to the people. He assured them, that the intention of the new king was, to represent to the French emperor, the antipathy of the Spanish people to the French troops that had been sent among them, and to demand their immediate recal. The tumult was somewhat assuaged; but voices were heard here and there, muttering, "That both the king and the Duke of Infantado might do with Napoleon what they pleased; that Spaniards would never be slaves: and that the nation would maintain its independence without them."

From the moment that Murat set his foot on the Spanish territory, he did all in his power to impress the Spaniards with a conviction, that he had come among them for their good, by bringing about certain reforms in the government, giving it to be understood withal, that he was on the side of the Prince of Asturias, and in opposition to the Prince of the Peace, who was universally detested; nor did he fail to throw out hints and allusions to the influence of the queen in the great affairs of the nation; thereby to ingratiate himself with the people: but, true to his purpose of division and distraction, he was no sooner informed of what had passed at Aranjuez, on the 19th of March, than he made a shew of taking a very warm interest in the fate of Don Manuel Godoy, with whom, though personally unacquainted, he had kept up a confidential and intimate correspondence.

Whilst Ferdinand halted at Vittoria, he was informed by the supreme junta, that the Grand Duke of Berg had made a formal, and even an imperious demand of the release of Godoy. This application Ferdinand, who had solemnly promised to bring Don Manuel to judgment according to the laws, directed the junta to resist. Bonaparte had himself, by letter, made a similar application to Ferdinand; who, in reply, represented the invincible necessity he was under of bringing Godoy to trial. But as his imperial majesty was pleased to take an interest in the life of Don Manuel Godoy, he gave him his word, that if the prisoner should, after mature examination of the charges laid against him, be condemned to death, that punishment should be remitted, in consideration of his majesty's intercession.

When the French emperor received this answer from Ferdinand, he flew into a great passion, and, with his accustomed falsity, immediately wrote to the Grand Duke of Berg, that the Prince of Asturias had placed the prisoner at his disposal, and ordered him to demand the release of Godoy, in the most energetic manner. The grand duke, who was naturally violent and impetuous, sent a very haughty note to the junta, in which he reminded them, that the Emperor of the French, at the same time that the authority of the Prince of Asturias was stated as a ground of procedure to them, acknowledged no other King of Spain than Charles IV. He demanded anew the person of the Prince of the Peace to be sent to France. To this note Murat added many verbal threats of force, which, being reported, so intimidated them, that they ordered the release of Godoy, who was immediately conveyed to Bayonne.

The junta, to cover their own weakness, gave out, in two gazettes extraordinary, that Don Manuel had been released by order of Ferdinand VII. They attempted, by disguising and garbling, to justify such an interpretation of his letter; though nothing could be plainer than that it was the king's intention not to screen Godoy from trial, but from the last punishment in case of condemnation.

The joy that was excited by the imprisonment of the Prince of Peace, with his principal officers, in all the provinces of Spain, is not to be described. At Salamanca, and several other towns, the bells of the churches were rung; and at Salamanca six hundred monks, and as many licentiates, danced in the market-place; young women, married women, and old men, mixed with the monks in this demonstration of their joyful transports. The Spanish newspapers, which had begun to assume a tone of great freedom, styled Don Manuel the prince of injustice, the generalissimo of infamy, the grand-admiral of treason, and the ruin of the nation.

Although the history of all absolute monarchies presents many instances of sudden and surprising elevations to great power and wealth, and as sudden and unexpected falls, there is perhaps none so striking as that of Don Manuel Godoy. He was accounted by far the wealthiest and most powerful subject in Europe. Indeed he had all the power, and in a great measure all the wealth of the Spanish monarchy, at his command. While several of the old imposts had come to be alienated from the crown, and were appropriated by certain great families, through the improvident and profligate favor of the court, the people were oppressed with new and arbitrary taxes, burthensome in themselves, and rendered more so by the mode of their collection. But the odium of the common people against the prime minister and the favorite would never have wrought his fall, if there had not been a very general combination against him among the nobility, whom he so greatly eclipsed in splendour, patronage, and favor, and to whom a predominant favorite at court is a greater nuisance, perhaps, than to the nobles of any other country in Europe.

Don Manuel Godoy, in his retreat, was accompanied by an escort of two hundred horsemen, which appeared necessary for his protection from the fury of the people. He arrived at Bayonne, April 26. A castle in the environs of Bayonne was appointed for his residence; and he was in all respects treated by Bonaparte as a person of distinction and consequence.

The determined interference of Bonaparte for the liberation of the Prince of Peace, was owing to the resolution of the king and queen not to quit Spain for France, though called thither by Bonaparte, unless the favorite should be permitted to do so also, and to proceed on his journey before them.

King Charles IV. and his Queen Louisa arrived on the 27th of April at Burgos, and on the 28th at Vittoria. A detachment of the body-guards, to the number of one hundred, who had accompanied the Prince of Asturias to Bayonne, happening to be in this town, placed themselves, according to custom, in the palace to be occupied by their majesties. But when the old king set his eyes on them, with a degree of energy that surprised every one, he ordered them to be gone—"You betrayed your trust at Aranjuez; I want none of your services, and I will have none."—The guards were obliged to retire.

On the 29th of April, their majesties remained all night at Tolosa; on the 30th they came, about noon, to Irun, where they received letters from Bonaparte, and two hours after entered the walls of Bayonne, where they were treated with all public respect and honor.

When the roaring of cannon announced the arrival of the old King and Queen of Spain, Ferdinand, with his brother, Don Carlos, went to meet them. All the Spaniards that were at Bayonne also waited on their majesties, and went through the ceremony of kneeling and kissing hands. It was a scene of constraint and awkwardness on both sides; the king seemed as much dissatisfied with them as he had been with his body-guards at Vittoria. He did not speak a word to any one but Count Pignatelli, of Fuentes, an unprincipled courtier, whom Bonaparte had appointed to insinuate himself into the confidence of the Prince of Asturias, for the purpose of watching and betraying him.

When the ceremony of kissing hands was over, their old majesties, being fatigued, retired to their apartments; the Prince of Asturias was going to follow them, but the king stopped him, saying, "Prince, have you not yet sufficiently outraged my grey hairs?" The prince and the Spaniards who had accompanied him to Bayonne, at these words were thunder-struck, and withdrew in great perturbation. At five o'clock, P. M. their majesties were visited by the Emperor Napoleon, who remained with them a long time. The conversation turned on the injuries that had been done to the king and queen, the perils in which they had been involved, the ingratitude of men on whom they had lavished favors; and, above all, on the ingratitude and rebellion, as they said, of their son. The officers of King Charles's household were appointed by Bonaparte, all of them Frenchmen.

On the 1st of May, the King and Queen of Spain dined at the castle of Marrac with Napoleon and his spouse Josephine. May 2, at four o'clock, P. M. Josephine went to pay a visit to the king and queen, and staid a long time with their majesties.

The newspapers printed at Bayonne, under the immediate inspection of Talleyrand and Bonaparte himself, and which came every day under the eye of the Prince of Asturias, took the side of the dethroned king and the Prince of Peace. The Bayonne gazette of the 25th of April, the day of Ferdinand's arrival, contained various statements in contradiction of the reports that had been spread of the prince's having immense treasures in foreign funds, extenuated the instances of his mal-administration, adverted to many benefits that resulted from his ministry, and above all, entered into elaborate arguments to shew that the abdication of Charles IV. was not voluntary but compulsory. In this manner Bonaparte endeavoured to prepare the mind of Ferdinand and his party for the catastrophe that awaited him. At the same time it was the common talk at the court of Bayonne, and re-echoed from thence by the numerous emissaries of Bonaparte, in every province in Spain, that a strong hand alone could save the monarchy.

The Prince of Asturias, as he was still styled by the French, or Ferdinand VII. according to the general voice of the Spanish nation, had no sooner returned from dining at the castle of Mar-rac to his residence, than General Savary came to inform him, that the Emperor of the French and King of Italy had irrevocably determined that the Bourbon family should no longer reign in Spain; that it should be succeeded by his; and, therefore, that his imperial majesty required Ferdinand, in his own name, and that of all his family, to renounce the crown of Spain and the Indies in favor of the dynasty of Bonaparte. That such a proposition should be made, and that the bearer of such a proposition should be the identical Savary, who, until that moment, had given such solemn and repeated assurances to the Spanish prince, of the honorable and friendly sentiments of Bonaparte towards him, struck the new king and the Spanish chiefs, who had accompanied him, with a degree of surprise and consternation not to be described, and opened their eyes to the horrors of their situation.

Bonaparte, having now thrown off the mask, proceeded without delay to carry his project into effect. On the following day he summoned to his palace Cevallos, who, as already observed, had been first secretary of state to King Charles, and now occupied the same station with Ferdinand, and was much in his confidence. In the palace Cevallos was received by M. de Champagne, Bonaparte's minister for foreign affairs. Cevallos began the conference with complaints of the perfidious artifices practised on his royal master to inveigle him into France, and added, that he had been instructed to declare, in the most formal manner, that he neither would nor could renounce his right to the crown of Spain, in favor of any individual or family whatever, to the prejudice either of himself, or of the other branches of his house; and that no person could be called to the throne, but by the voice of the nation itself, in virtue of the national right it possessed to select a new family in the event of the extinction of the family then on the throne.

The French minister, in return, insisted on the necessity of the required renunciation, chiefly on the ground that the abdication of King Charles had not been spontaneous. Cevallos protested against the opinion, that Bonaparte had any right to interfere in the internal arrangements of Spain, and cited the example of the French government itself, which, in the beginning of the revolution, had positively rejected, as inadmissible, the request tendered by the King of Spain in favor of his unfortunate cousin, Louis XVI. Having stated various circumstances in proof that the late king, in his abdication, had acted entirely from his own free choice, Cevallos was told, that while the house of Bourbon reigned in Spain, France never could be secure, in the case of war again breaking out in the north of Europe.

In opposition to this argument, Cevallos reasoned with Champagne as follows:—Ever since the restoration of peace between the two countries, Spain had adhered to her engagements with France with unshaken fidelity. The political conduct of Charles IV. since the treaty of Basle, afforded a recent proof that sovereigns had little regard to family interests, when these were in opposition to the interests of their dominions; that the friendship between France and Spain was founded in local and political considerations; that the topographical situation of the two kingdoms was of itself sufficient to demonstrate, how important it was for Spain to preserve a good understanding with France, the only state on the continent of Europe with which she had direct and very extensive relations. The only circumstance by which the fidelity could be staggered, would be an attempt on the part of France to assail the independence of Spain, or the honor of her sovereign. Such an attempt might re-open an intercourse with England, which had already endeavoured to effect a reconciliation, necessarily to be followed by measures essentially prejudicial to France. What confidence could Europe place in treaties with Bonaparte, were it discovered that he had broken through the sacred engagements contracted by him but six months before, with Charles IV. in the secret treaty of Fontainebleau?

The conference between the French and BOOK VIII. Spanish ministers was interrupted by a command from Bonaparte, who had secretly heard their discourse, to attend him, in his cabinet. There Cevallos, was treated by the French emperor as a traitor to his former master Charles, because he was now in the service of Ferdinand; and reproached in the most insulting manner, for having maintained, in a former official conference with General Mouthion, that however necessary the recognition of Ferdinand's title to the throne of Spain might be to the preservation of amity between the two countries, still that his title was to be invalidated by the withholding of any such recognition.

Finding, however, Cevallos inflexible in the principles he professed, Bonaparte put an end to the interview with these characteristic expressions; "I have a system of policy of my own; you ought to adopt more liberal ideas; to be less rigid on the point of honor; and not to sacrifice the prosperity of Spain for the interests of the Bourbon family."

Despairing of success in a negotiation with Cevallos, Bonaparte required Ferdinand to entrust his concerns with some other minister. That no difficulty might arise on this score, Don Pedro Labrador, who had been minister at the court of Florence, was selected to conduct the negotiation on the part of Ferdinand, and instructed to declare, that his master neither would nor could consent to the renunciation of his rights, or those of his family, to the throne of their ancestors. Labrador's demands of the production of the French ministers full powers to treat with him, and for an authenticated statement of the proposals of Bonaparte, were evaded by Champagny, as matters of merely official form. Champagny added an insinuation, that Labrador might, by falling in with the emperor's views, secure the prosperity of Spain, and at the same time promote his own private advantage. Labrador required that Ferdinand should be instantly permitted to return to Spain. But he was told, that matters could be arranged only by the two sovereigns, either by letters or in a personal interview.

This answer, added to the other circumstances, left no doubt in the mind of King Ferdinand, that he was actually under arrest. However, in order to establish beyond a doubt the certainty of this fact, Cevallos, by his majesty's order, sent a note to the French minister for foreign affairs, telling him, that the king was determined to return to Madrid, to tranquillize the agitation of his beloved subjects; and to provide for the transaction of the important business of the kingdom; assuring M. Champagny, at the same time, that he himself would continue, in order to treat with his imperial majesty, on affairs reciprocally advantageous.

Bonaparte finding Ferdinand inflexible, had recourse to other expedients for effecting his object. It was with a view to this, that the old king and queen were invited to repair to Bayonne, for the purpose of a final arrangement of affairs.

Scarcely had Charles reached Bayonne, when he was employed to demand, that his son should resign the crown so lately assumed, signifying, at the same time, his resolution not to remount the throne himself, but to renounce all his rights, and those of his family, in favor of France. Ferdinand VII. overawed, a prisoner, and controlled by circumstances, on the 1st of May transmitted in writing a conditional renunciation of the crown in favor of his august father. In that paper Ferdinand observed, that though his father had personally declared his abdication to be voluntary, it now appeared, that it was his secret intention to resume the crown when it should become advisable. It now also appeared, that it was not his design either to remount the throne himself, or even to return to his dominions; at the same time, that the rightful heir was directed to renounce his claims to the succession.

Notwithstanding the inexplicable contrariety in Charles's conduct, Ferdinand consented to resign all present pretensions to the throne; but upon certain conditions, calculated to prevent the alienation of the sovereignty to any foreign power. He proposed that Charles should return to Madrid, whither he would attend him as a dutiful son; that the Cortes, or, at least, the great council of the kingdom, should be assembled; that his present resignation, with his motives thereto, should be duly and regularly recorded; that Charles should dismiss from his presence the persons who had so justly incurred the detestation of the nation; that if Charles, as it was understood, declined to resume the reins of government, Ferdinand would undertake the administration, either in the name of his father, and as his lieutenant, or in his own name.

On the following day, May 2, the old king, in a long answer, evidently dictated by the great usurper, declared his abdication to have been compulsory, and attributed his present distressful situation to the inveterate hatred of Ferdinand against France, of which evidence in his own letters had been communicated by the emperor. Charles concluded with asserting his conviction, that the disorders of Spain were to be remedied only by Bonaparte, whom, from long experience, the aged monarch said he knew to be incapable of forming any design hostile to the honor and interests of the royal family of Spain.

Ferdinand's reply to this communication, dated the 4th of May, together with many powerful representations to his father, on the future situation of the kingdom, contains many strong arguments for believing the abdication of the 19th of March to have been voluntary, although the consequences to be apprehended from the popular commotions might have had a commanding influence on Charles's mind.

On the same day, May 4, when this reply was sent by Ferdinand to King Charles, (whether before or after it was received cannot be ascertained, and is perfectly immaterial) he announced to the council of Castile, his abdication of all his claims on the Spanish kingdoms, in favor of his friend and ally, the Emperor of the French, by a treaty which had been signed and ratified, and which stipulated for the integrity and independence of the Spanish kingdoms, and the preservation of the holy catholic religion, not only as the predominant, but as the sole and exclusive religion in Spain. He had thought proper to send this letter, that they might conform themselves thereto, publish its contents, and make every exertion in favor of Napoleon; "Display," said King Charles, "the utmost frankness and friendship towards the French; and, above all, direct your care to preserve the country from insurrections and tumults."

But before this letter of abdication should be delivered, he had dispatched a proclamation, dated on the same day, the purpose of which was, to prepare the public mind, in some degree, for what was so soon to follow; in conformity with the usual policy of Bonaparte, who, on all occasions, was not less attentive to moral influence than to physical force. Charles, evidently adopting the sentiments, and very style of Bonaparte, told his "Dear Subjects," that perfidious men sought to mislead them, to arm the Spaniards against the French, and the French against the Spaniards; but the devastation of Spain, and calamities of every kind, would be the consequence. In this critical juncture, he had concerted with his ally, the Emperor of the French, measures for their welfare. All those who spoke against France thirsted for their blood. They were either the enemies of the Spanish nation, or the agents of England, who sought, by their intrigues, to sever the mother-country from her colonies; to effect a separation of her provinces; or to involve the country for a long course of years in trouble and disaster. "Spaniards," said he, "be guided by my experience, and yield obedience to the authority which I derive from God, and my ancestors. Follow my example, and be assured, under the present circumstances, there is neither prosperity nor safety for the Spaniards, but in the friendship of the grand emperor our ally."

The negotiation between the father and the son, for the purpose of procuring the unconditional and absolute renunciation of all right on the part of Ferdinand to the Spanish throne, did not keep pace with the ardor of Bonaparte; who, therefore, adopted measures for bringing it to a conclusion in his own peculiar way.

At four in the afternoon of the 5th of May, his imperial majesty went to visit the old King and Queen of Spain. At this interview there were present, besides their majesties, the Infant Don Carlos, Godoy, the grandees of Spain, who had accompanied the new king in his journey to Bayonne, and the Spanish minister Don Pedro Cevallos. After a conference, which was continued above an hour, Ferdinand was called in by his father, "To hear," said Cevallos, "in the presence of the emperor, expressions so disgusting and humiliating that I dare not record them." The scene to which Cevallos alluded was this. The queen, in a transport of passion, addressing Ferdinand, said, "Traitor, you have for years meditated the death of the king your father; but thanks to the vigilance, the zeal, and the loyalty of the Prince of the Peace, you have not been able to effect your purpose; neither you, nor any of the infamous traitors who have co-operated with you, for the accomplishment of your designs. I tell you to your face, that you are my son, but not the son of the king. And yet, without having any other right to the crown than those of your mother, you have sought to tear it from us by force. But I agree and demand, that the Emperor Napoleon shall be umpire between us: Napoleon, to whom we cede and transfer our rights, to the exclusion of our own family. I call on him to punish you and your associates, as so many traitors, and abandon to him the whole Spanish nation."

This scene of the queen bastardizing her own legitimate son in the presence of the king, his legitimate father; and proclaiming her own infamy before her husband, is something so new, surprising, and singular, that it would not have gained universal and undoubted credit as it had done, if it had not been attested by so many witnesses. It was supposed by some, on no improbable grounds, to have been not merely an effusion of passion, but preconcerted between her majesty and Bonaparte.

Certain it is, that on the side of the French court there was the utmost subtlety and blackest perfidy; on that of the Spanish court, if not treachery, a stupidity bordering on idiotism.

There seemed to be no end to the queen's reproaches and rage, when Napoleon interrupted her, by saying, "No! I give to Ferdinand the crown of Naples, and to Charles that of Etruria, with one of my nieces in marriage to each of them. Let them declare if they be willing to accept this offer."

After a short silence, Don Carlos replied, "Emperor, I was not born to be a king, but an infant of Spain." Ferdinand was silent. Bonaparte, after a short pause, said, "Prince, il faut opter entre la cession et la mort."—Cession or death; and six hours were allowed him for coming to a determination. King Charles seconding the threat of Bonaparte, ordered his son to make an absolute resignation of the crown, under pain of being treated, with all his household, as an usurper of the throne, and a conspirator against the life of his father. To this proposition, Ferdinand being desirous not to involve in his misfortunes the number of persons comprehended in the threat of Charles IV. assented. The next day, in a letter to his father, after stating the circumstances of constraint in which he was placed, he made the resignation which was commanded. After this, Ferdinand was deprived of his coach of state, and sword of honor. He had no other attendant than the commander of the party that watched him; a Jew, belonging to the militia or national guards of Bayonne.

On the same day, (May 5,) a treaty of abdication was agreed to, and signed by the Prince of Peace, on the part of King Charles IV. and Marshal Duroc on that of Bonaparte. The motives by which Charles was actuated in this extraordinary transaction were stated in the preamble to have been to save Spain from the agitation of faction and war, both internal and external; to preserve, together with the colonies, the unity of the monarchy; and to join the means of France with those of Spain, for the purpose of obtaining a maritime peace. In the first article, Charles ceded to his majesty, the Emperor Napoleon, all his rights to the throne of Spain and the Indies; all things had come to such a pass, that he alone could re-establish social order. But this cession was made on the two following conditions. 1st, That the integrity of the kingdom should be maintained; that the prince whom his imperial majesty should think fit to appoint to the throne of Spain should be independent, and that the limits of Spain should not undergo any alteration. 2dly, That the Catholic, Apostolical, and Roman, should be the only religion of Spain, as heretofore, and that no toleration should be granted to any sect of the reformed religion, much less to infidelity. This act or treaty of abdication and cession, as it was called, contained a number of articles, providing for the establishment of the king and queen, and infants of Spain, within the French territory, and also for settling the rank they were to hold, which was to be the same with that which they possessed in Spain. By the act of cession, of the Prince of Asturias, signed at Bayonne, May 10, the Emperor of the French secured to him the title of royal highness, promised to cede to him the domain of Navarre in Normandy, and grant him besides, an annual revenue in money, the title of royal highness, the engagement of their respective commanders in Spain, and yearly pensions to Don Antonio, the uncle of Ferdinand, Don Carlos, and his nephew, Don Francisco, provided they should accede to the treaty.

In the meantime, there was, as might be expected, an action and re-action between what was going on at Bayonne, and what came to pass at Madrid. The public mind in Spain had never been in a state of perfect tranquillity since the middle of March, when it was suspected that Charles IV. intended to remove to Seville, with all his family. The deposition of the Prince of the Peace, the abdication of Charles, and the accession of his son Ferdinand, events which took place on the same day, produced a general satisfaction throughout the nation. But multiplied reports of the insolence of the French, and particularly the letter of the Count de Espellata, the Governor-general of Catalonia, stating the hostile proceedings of Duhesme at Barcelona; the arrival of French troops at Madrid; the surrender to Murat of the sword of Francis I.; the departure of the king for Burgos; the deliverance of Godoy to the French; and, finally, the determination of Ferdinand to pass the frontier, or to put himself into the hands of the French at Bayonne. All these circumstances raised a fermentation, which every moment threatened some terrible explosion, and it was not without difficulty that the junta of government, at the head of which was Don Antonio, were able to calm the alarms of the people, so far as to restrain them from insulting the French and treating them with violence.

A courier extraordinary arrived every evening at Madrid, with news of the proceedings at Bayonne. This news was not published in the gazette, but circulated under the form of letters from particular persons in the suite of the king. These bulletins were at first satisfactory, as they were full of nothing but the honors done to Ferdinand, and the friendly reception he met with at Bayonne from Bonaparte. By and by it was surmised that affairs at the castle of Marrac wore but a gloomy aspect; and, soon after, it was perfectly known that it was intended by the ruler of France to compel Ferdinand to resign his crown.

The courier expected on Sunday, the 30th of April, did not arrive; and the mail looked for hourly was still due on the evening of the 1st of May, when several thousands of the inhabitants of the capital assembled at the port of the Sun, and other streets near the post-office, on the lookout for the arrival of the post. The French garrison of Madrid rested all night on their arms, and on Monday, the 2d of May, the sun rose on many an unfortunate inhabitant, who was never to behold the dawn of another day.

This was the day fixed for the departure of the Queen of Etruria, daughter of King Charles, and her son, Don Francisco, for Bayonne, to join the rest of the royal family: for it was determined by Bonaparte, that not a branch or scion of that family should remain in Spain. Great numbers of the people crowded to the place that was in front of the palace, to see her going away; and among these, many wives and children, to bid adieu to their husbands, and their fathers, belonging to the family and the escort of the queen, and to bewail their unhappy lot, in being left behind, without any provision being made for their future subsistence. As the first carriage drew up to the gate, a report was circulated by several individuals among the people, that Don Antonio, president of the junta or provisional government, was also going to abandon them: and this mistake produced a tumult. The populace cut the traces of his carriage, and forced it back into the court of the palace. But, on satisfactory assurances that Don Antonio was not going to quit Madrid, they permitted the horses again to be put to the coach, which drove without obstruction to the palace-gate.

In the midst of this fray, an aid-de-camp, sent by Murat, to mark and give an account of what was going forward, made his appearance; the people shewed an inclination to insult this officer and treat him rudely, but he was extricated by some Spanish officers who were present, and suffered to return to his chief. After this, the carriages with the Queen of Etruria, and her brother, were permitted to set out. The infant Don Francisco manifested unequivocal tears of reluctance to leave the palace. He was observed even to weep bitterly, which affected the people prodigiously, and raised their indignation and resentment to the highest pitch. At this instant, the same aid-de-camp returned with a detachment of French soldiers, and immediately there commenced a scene of carnage and horror. It is not fully ascertained whether the populace or the French troops were the first aggressors. But the French were the first to let fly volleys of musketry, and many innocent spectators were killed, and others wounded. A beautiful child, eight years old, fell dead at a window, on the first discharge, which was made about eleven o'clock in the forenoon. The news spread over the whole city with the rapidity of lightning, and, in less than an hour, every individual of the lower classes, who possessed the means, appeared on the ground in arms.

At first the Spaniards had the best of it in the greater part of the city, although the Spanish troops had no share in the engagement, having been confined by their officers to their barracks. A great number of the French were killed, and their arms supplied such of the Spaniards as had none of their own. But as soon as the dispositions directed by Murat began to be carried into effect, the advantage was decidedly on the side of the French. All the French troops in Madrid were set in motion. Each column had one or more pieces of flying-artillery, with which they scoured the streets as they moved onward, and which were afterwards placed at the spots from whence they would do the greatest execution. The French poured volleys of musket-shot into the streets as they crossed or passed by the ends of them, aiming particularly at the windows and balconies. For the Spaniards, when they were driven from the streets, retired to their houses, from which they fired on the French columns. In many places, the French burst into the houses by force, and put to the sword, men, women, and children.

The place where the Spaniards made the most glorious defence was the store-house of artillery of Monteleone House, which, besides ammunition, contained arms for 10,000 men. Thither Murat sent a detachment to take possession of the artillery and ammunition, but he found it occupied by a small number of the inhabitants of Madrid and Spanish artillery-men, under the command of two brave artillery-officers, of the names of Doaize and Velayde. A twenty-four pounder, charged with grape-shot, placed at the gate of the store-house, in front of a long and narrow street, and duly pointed and levelled, made such havoc among the French column as it advanced by this street, that the commander was obliged to send to Murat for a reinforcement. Two other columns were dispatched with all speed to his succour. The French columns attacked this small garrison on both flanks from the windows and tops of the adjoining houses, and repeatedly summoned it to surrender, but the brave and resolute commanders refused to listen to any proposition of this kind, and their constancy remained unshaken to the last moment of their existence. Velayde was killed by a musket-shot. Doaize, after his thigh-bone was broken by a cannon-ball, continued to give his orders as he supported himself leaning with his elbow on the ground, with the greatest composure, till he received three other wounds, the last of which put an end to his glorious career. The command of the little arsenal now devolved on a corporal of artillery, who, sensible that nothing good was to be expected from further resistance, offered to capitulate. This offer the French general readily accepted. But while the articles were drawn up, a Spanish officer, the major of the warlike store-house, appeared on horseback, waving a white handkerchief, and proclaiming peace; on which the French were suffered to take possession of the place.

The loss sustained by the French in this point of attack was not exactly ascertained. It was reckoned to be very considerable, as twenty-six round of grape-shot were fired on the first column as it advanced through the long and narrow street just mentioned. In about two hours, the firing in every part of the town ceased; an effect produced by the personal interposition of the members of the council of Castile, and the other tribunals, who flew from one street to another on horseback, accompanied by several Spanish noblemen, with some French generals, and escorted by parties of cavalry, consisting of Spanish bodyguards and troopers belonging to the French imperial guards, mixed together.

The inhabitants of Madrid now flattered themselves that the carnage was at an end. But in the afternoon, Murat issued general orders to his army for the immediate formation of a military tribunal, of which General Grouchy was appointed president. Before this tribunal all persons were brought who had been made prisoners in the early part of the day, or found in the street with any kind of arms about them, or any implements whatever, that might possibly have been used, or by any construction considered as a weapon: those who were found with muskets, swords, penknives, and even scissors, were all of them considered as equally guilty, and ordered to be instantly shot; and the sentence was executed without a moment's delay. Several other persons were condemned to be shot on the day after the next.

The whole of the French troops employed against Madrid, on the horrible 2d of May, was computed not to have exceeded 10,000 at most. And it was supposed that if the Spanish troops in France had been suffered to join the people, not one of those 10,000 would have escaped. But it was fortunate, no doubt, for the Spanish capital, that this was not the case; for besides those 10,000 there were 50,000 more French troops encamped or in cantonments in the territory round Madrid, who would have immediately been set in motion: the result of which would have been the sack and destruction of Madrid.

It was said, in various periodical publications, that Murat and his principal officers studiously sought for an occasion of quarrel and hostilities, with a view to forfeitures and confiscations; and even that such means of gratifying the army were looked to by Bonaparte. It will be recollected, however, that Bonaparte had recourse to every method he could devise for conciliating the favor of the Spaniards.—It may, however, be affirmed with certainty, that it was the inhuman policy of Murat, which he well knew would be approved of by his master, to crush, if possible, the rising spirit of Spain in the bud, by a dreadful example.

The whole city of Madrid, by order of the junta, was disarmed.

By a royal edict, dated at Bayonne, May 4, the Grand Duke of Berg, whom Charles called his cousin, was appointed lieutenant-general, or viceroy of all Spain. And the council of Castile, and the captains-generals, and governors of provinces, were directed to obey his orders, which was intimated to the junta of government and of war. This decree may be considered not only as a preparatory measure, but an actual transference of all power, military and civil, to the French. As the grand duke was commander-in-chief of the troops belonging to his ally, the Emperor of the French, Charles judged it necessary, he said, to make him Lieutenant-general of Spain, in order to give the whole force within his kingdom, for the preservation of peace and property, the "same direction:" plainly insinuating, that without such an arrangement, the forces of the different nations might receive opposite directions. It was also decreed by the royal edict, that the Grand Duke of Berg, in quality of governor-general, should be president of the junta of government. But in this the junta had been as forward as his majesty: for, on the same day, May 4, the junta having declared that there was not a moment to be lost for preventing the evils to be threatened by disrespect to the constituted authorities, made a tender of the precedence of that council to the Grand Duke of Berg, which was accepted. Don Antonio, as well as every other branch of the royal family, was called to Bayonne.

The Grand Duke of Berg, May 6, issued a proclamation to his army, in which he said, that the "2d of May had forced them to draw the sword; that they had acquitted themselves to his satisfaction, and that he would not fail to report their praise-worthy conduct to the emperor; but order and tranquillity were restored; the guilty had been punished; the men who had been misled, acknowledged their errors; in short, a veil was to cover all that had passed, and that confidence ought now to return. He exhorted his soldiers to return to their old relations of friendship with the inhabitants of the capital. The conduct of the Spanish troops was worthy of eulogy. He bade the inhabitants of Madrid to banish from their minds all uneasiness and apprehension, and to see nothing in the soldiers of the grand Napoleon, the protector of Spain, but friendly troops, and faithful allies. The inhabitants, of all orders and degrees, might wear their cloaks according to their usual fashion. They would not, on that account, be any longer arrested, or otherwise molested.

He also published another proclamation, addressed to "the brave Spaniards," to the same effect, but of greater length. He set out with saying, that the "2d of May would be a day of sorrow to him, as it was to them. The common enemy to him and them, after behaving in such a manner as might have wearied out his patience, had finished their provoking conduct with exciting the people of Madrid and of the adjacent villages to excesses, that had reduced him to employ the irresistible force under his command.—With what horrid joy would not the enemies of France and Spain think of the day when the generous French were obliged to hurt the misted Spaniards? They hoped to obtain other triumphs not less horrible in other parts of the kingdom. But their hopes would be disappointed by his own frankness and the sound judgment of the Spaniards. Charles IV. and his son were concerting at that moment at Bayonne, with the Emperor Napoleon, the best measures for settling the affairs, and fixing the fate of Spain. But the emperor did not think that he ought to delay until the decision of that important question, to make known the sentiments that glowed in his breast in favor of a magnanimous nation, whom he wished to preserve from the crisis of a political revolution, and to establish such political institutions as were most analogous to their character. He had it in charge to declare, in the name of his imperial majesty, that the integrity of the Spanish monarchy should be preserved inviolate, and that it should not be dismembered of the smallest portion of its territory, no, not so much as of a single village; nor should it be subjected to those contributions which are authorized by the laws of war in conquered countries: which laws could never be thought applicable to an ally. The interests of the army which he commanded, were the interests of all such as had titles, privileges, or property to preserve. The nobility, proprietors of estates, merchants, and manufacturers, were called on to exert all their influence for the suppression of sedition; the ministers of religion, who knew the secrets of consciences, and possessed so great authority to undeceive the people: and the civil and military authorities, to recollect their responsibility, and to crush insurrections in the cradle. These authorities, if French blood should be shed anew, would be responsible to the Emperor Napoleon, whose anger or clemency had never been moved in vain. But he promised himself better things, hoping that the ministers of religion, magistrates, the grandees, and other nobles of Spain, and, in short, all classes, would make it their study to avert those troubles that might obstruct the amelioration intended. To all the generals and other officers employed in the different provinces of the monarchy, the line of conduct observed on the melancholy occasion alluded to, by the household troops, the garrison of Madrid, and the military in the service of the court, presented an excellent model for imitation."

On the same day a circular letter was addressed by the council of supreme and general inquisition, to all the courts of the kingdom.

This venerable body becoming a tool in the hands of Murat, without hesitation or reserve imputed what the Spanish nation called the massacre of the 2d of May, to the people of Madrid. "The melancholy consequences," said they, "of the disgraceful tumults in this capital, on the 2d instant, by the violence of the people towards the troops of the Emperor of the French, have rendered the most active vigilance necessary on the part of all the magistracies and all the respectable bodies of the nation, in order to prevent the renewal of such excesses, and to preserve tranquillity in every community actuated by a due attention to its own interests, no less than by the laws of hospitality towards friendly officers and soldiers who injure no person, and who, up to this moment, have given the strongest proofs of good order and discipline, by punishing those who have been guilty of excesses, or who have ill-treated any Spaniard in his person or property." They proceeded, in the usual strain of the French on the same subject, to state their suspicion of evil intentions, disguised under the mask of patriotism. They represented the consequences of being governed by the blind impulsion of ignorance, and the dreadful consequences of tumultuous proceedings, which only served to throw the country into a state of convulsion, by tearing asunder those bonds of association on which the peace of the community depended, by destroying the feelings of humanity, and annihilating all confidence in the government, to which alone it belonged to give an uniform direction and impulse to the sentiment of patriotism. These most important truths could not be impressed by any upon the minds and hearts of the people with more beneficial effect, than by the ministers of the religion of Jesus Christ, which breathed nothing but peace and brotherly love among men; and subjection, honor, and obedience, to all who were in authority. And as the holy college ought to be, and always had been, the first to give an example to the ministers of peace; they conceived that it accorded with their office and their duty to address that letter to the subordinate courts of the holy inquisition, that, on perusing its contents, they likewise should co-operate in the preservation of public tranquillity. And they were required to notify the same to all the subordinate officers of their respective courts, and also to the commissioners of districts, that all and every one of them should, with all possible zeal, vigilance, and prudence, co-operate for the attainment of so important an object. This doctrine of passive obedience to whatever power happened to be uppermost at the time, accorded perfectly with that of Bonaparte, who, turning the tables on the assertors of the jus divinum of hereditary kings, maintained that he was commissioned by God, in the course of providence, to reform the world by new political institutions, as plainly appeared by his possessing "both the power and the inclination to surmount all obstacles." Such was the language of Bonaparte's proclamation to the people of Spain.

The council of Castile, too, by publishing and proclaiming, sanctioned by the authority of their name all the decrees of Bonaparte, and the Grand Duke of Berg, his lieutenant.

The proclamation of Murat to the Spaniards, May 6, in which he told them that the fate of Spain was under the deliberation of their own princes, in concert with the great Emperor Napoleon, within the precincts of France, was followed up by another, May 19, for convening the notables, who were called on to send deputies to a junta to be assembled at Bayonne, for the purpose of settling some plan that might secure the tranquillity and happiness of Spain. And on the 25th of May a proclamation was issued, in which Bonaparte insinuated to the Spaniards, that he had received a commission from heaven to reform their government, and to make them again what they had been before, a great, glorious, and happy nation. "Your princes have ceded to me their rights to the crown of the Spains.—Your nation is old; my mission is to restore its youth."

The public mind, it was presumed, was now sufficiently prepared for the reception of an imperial decree, which was communicated to the council of Castile, May 29, informing the council of the measures which the emperor, by virtue of his rights to the crown of Spain, which had been ceded to him, had taken for fixing the basis of the new government of the kingdom, of which the Grand Duke of Berg was to continue in the meantime to be viceroy; and the council of Castile were required to affix the said imperial decree on the usual places, that no man might pretend ignorance of the same. The decree ordered, 1. That the assembly of the notables, which had already been summoned by the lieutenant-general of the kingdom, should be held on the 15th of June, at Bayonne. The deputies were charged with the sentiments, desires, and complaints of those they represented; and also to fix the basis of the new government for the kingdom. 2. Napoleon's cousin, the Grand Duke of Berg, was continued to fulfil the functions of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. 3. The ministers, the council of state, the council of Castile, and all civil, ecclesiastical, and military authorities, were as far as requisite confirmed. Justice was to be administered under the same forms, and in the same manner as usual. This decree was published by the council of Castile, as they were ordered and directed.

The object of Bonaparte, in convoking this assembly, is obvious. Blinded as he was by the extravagance of his ambition, he could yet discern how easily those acts of renunciation, on which he had founded his pretensions to the crown of Spain, might be evaded.

He named, to constitute this assembly, about 150 Spaniards of different classes, conditions, and corporations; but only about ninety were convened. A part of these, representing some cities, tribunals, or other public bodies, brought with them instructions in the nature of powers given them by those whom they represented, but altogether insufficient to answer the purpose intended. The ministers of the council were without any powers or instructions whatever; a precaution adopted by this tribunal in conformity to the judgment of its commissioners, in order to avoid all involuntary compromises. Most of the deputies had no other powers than merely to take their departure, and many of them did not belong to any public body, or acknowledged class of the community. Bonaparte fully expected, from the acquiescence of these individuals, a mask for concealing his usurpation, but he was utterly deceived. Instead of finding weak men convenient for the designs of his mercenary ambition, he was met by ministers incorruptible; grandees worthy of their rank, and representatives who were faithful defenders of the interests and honor of their country. They all, with one accord, informed him, that the powers they held were greatly restricted; that they were not the legitimate representatives of Spain, and that they could not compromise her rights.—Among the deputies chosen by the notables to represent them in the junta at Bayonne, was Don Pedro Quevedo y Quitano, Bishop of Orense. The bishop excused himself from accepting this trust, in a letter to the Grand Duke of Berg, the president, and the other members of the supreme junta of government, which was published in all the Spanish newspapers, and afforded to Bonaparte a foretaste of what might be expected from the literary genius of the Spaniards, awakened by the greatest and most animating occasion that could be presented to any nation. It was fraught throughout with the purest morality and most accurate reasoning, covered with a veil of exquisitely fine, and what may indeed be called a kind of sublime irony. He did not question, but assumed an air of believing, that the great Emperor of the French was animated with an ardent zeal to exalt Spain to the highest pitch of prosperity and glory. "Being seventy-three years of age, and under infirmities, and not able in so short a time to acquire the knowledge necessary to come to a decision on the points to be discussed, he sent the present letter.

"That those renunciations, on which all the authority of the emperor and king, with regard to Spain, depended, might be valid and clear, and not an object of suspicion to the whole nation, they ought to be ratified by the kings and infants of Spain, not under constraint and terror, but in a state of perfect freedom. And nothing could contribute so much to the glory of the great Emperor Napoleon, who had interested himself so much in the affairs of Spain, as to send back its august monarchs and all the royal family, that having assembled the general cortes, they might consult, deliberate freely, and concert with their vassals and subjects what might be expedient for the welfare of the kingdom.—Who had appointed his serene highness the Grand Duke of Berg, Governor of Spain? Was not the appointment made in France? By a king pious indeed, and worthy of all respect, but not only under an ascendant influence, but under constraint and coercion? Was it not a strange and unnatural chimera to name, for the lord-lieutenant of his kingdom, a general who commanded an army that menaced and compelled him immediately to resign his crown?"

In conclusion he said, "the nation saw itself without a king, and did not know what hand to turn. The renunciations of its kings, and the nomination of a governor of the kingdom, were deeds done in France, and under the eye of an emperor who had persuaded himself that he could effect the felicity of Spain, by giving it a new dynasty, deriving its origin from a family so fortunate as to believe itself incapable of producing any other princes than such as should possess equal or greater talents for government than the invincible and victorious, the legislator, and the philosopher, the great Emperor Napoleon. He requested, with all due respect, that what he considered as well-grounded fears, might be brought under the consideration of the supreme junta of government, and even laid before the great Napoleon, to be weighed by the natural rectitude of his disposition and purity of his heart, free from ambition, and far removed from all guile and political artifice. And, the bishop hoped, that the emperor, after matters should be thus candidly considered, would admit that the safety of Spain could not consist in slavery, and that he would not think of effecting her cure by putting her in chains, seeing she was neither in a state of lunacy, nor furiously mad. These were sentiments which he was not afraid to avow to the junta of government, and even to the emperor himself. This expression of them was demanded by his love for his country, and the royal family, and by his character of counsellor to his sovereign in the quality of a bishop of Spain: nor did he consider the sentiments he had expressed as useless, if not necessary to the true glory and felicity of the illustrious hero who was the admiration of all Europe, and to whom he had the pleasure of taking the present opportunity to pay the tribute of his humble, obedient, and submissive respects."— Orense, May 29, 1808.

The Bishop of St. Andero's letter on the same subject, and on the same occasion, though quite in another style, was as much admired and as widely circulated. To Bonaparte, who had invited him by letter, to attend at Bayonne, the bishop replied, "I cannot make it convenient to attend, and if I could, I would not."

The junta at Bayonne held their twelfth meeting on the 7th of July, the day appointed for the acceptance of the new constitution. In the chamber where they sat, were erected a magnificent throne, and a richly-decorated altar, the service of which was performed by the Archbishop of Burgos. Joseph Bonaparte, to whom Napoleon had transferred the crown of Spain, being seated on the throne, delivered a speech to the "gentlemen deputies," in which he told them, that he was desirous of presenting himself in the midst of them, previously to their separation from each other.—"Assembled," said Joseph, "in consequence of one of the extraordinary events to which all nations in their turn, and at particular junctures, are subject; and in pursuance of the dispositions of the Emperor Napoleon, our illustrious brother.—Your sentiments have been those of his age. The result of these sentiments will be consolidated in the constitutional act which will be forthwith read to you. It will preserve Spain from many tedious broils, which were easily to be foreseen from the disquietude with which the nation had been long agitated." He proceeded to touch on the great standing topic, the intrigues of the enemies of the continent, who hoped to sever Spain from her colonies; but, "if the Spaniards were disposed to make the same sacrifices with him, then should Spain be speedily tranquil and happy at home, and just and powerful abroad."—The act of constitution was read over in a loud voice, and the members of the junta, on the question being put, unanimously declared their acceptance of it.

The president of the junta delivered a short address, in answer to the speech of King Joseph; after which, the several members took the following oath:—"I swear obedience to the king, the constitution, and the laws." The junta then attended his majesty's levee, to pay him their respects on the occasion.

The Viceroy of Spain, Murat, was present at the inauguration of King Joseph. He was called by Bonaparte, and arrived at Bayonne on the 6th of July. It was deemed expedient by Bonaparte, before the departure of Joseph from the capital, to have some conversation with the lieutenant-general, concerning the present state of Spain and disposition of the Spaniards. It was judged political wisdom that Joseph should attach a number of the Spanish nobility to his interests, by appointing them to offices of dignity, (as was conceived) trust, and emolument. On the 1st of July, there was a nomination of eight ministers, viz. Don Louis Mariano de Urquijo, secretary of state, Don Pedro Cevallos, minister for foreign relations; Don Joseph de Aranza, minister for the Indies; Admiral Don Joseph Massaredo, minister of marine; Don Gonzalo O'Farrel, minister of war; Don Gaspar Melchior de Jovellanos, minister of the interior; the Count Cabarrus, minister of finances; and Don Sebastian Pinuela, minister of justice.—Two captains of the body-guards, viz. the Duke of Park, a Grandee of Spain, and the Duke of St. Germain, also a grandee of Spain.—Two colonels of the guards, viz. the Duke of Infantado, colonel of the regiment of Spanish-guards, and the Prince of Castel-Franco, colonel of the Walloon-guards, grand officers of the crown. The Marquis of Ariza, great chamberlain; the Duke of Hajar, grand master of the ceremonies; and Count Fernando Nunez, grand huntsman. Chamberlains; the Count Santa Collona, the Duke of Ossuna, Count Castel Florida, and the Duke of Sotomayor, all grandees of Spain.

Immediately after the abdications, the royal family of Spain was hurried into the interior of France. When they had proceeded as far as Bourdeaux, May 12, the Prince of Asturias, and the infants Don Antonio and Don Carlos, subscribed a long proclamation addressed to the Spaniards, in which they were made to repeat their former renunciations of all their rights of succession to the Spanish crown, and to detail the most prominent circumstances in the state of the nation, as well as their own situation under which they had come to that resolution. The unhappy princes were obliged, in that elaborate address to their countrymen, to state in the strongest colours the calamities to be apprehended from the enmity, but the mighty advantages to be expected from the friendship of France, and even, what was a cruel mockery and insult to the princes—to hold forth their dereliction as the greatest possible proof of their affection for the Spanish nation. "Their highnesses conceived that they afforded the most undoubted proof of their generosity and affection towards this nation, by sacrificing to the utmost extent of their power, their individual and personal interests for its benefit, and by that present instrument to assent, as they had already assented by a particular treaty, to the renunciation of all their rights to the throne. They accordingly released the Spaniards from all their duties relating thereto, and exhorted them to consult the common interests of their country by conducting themselves in a peaceable manner, and by looking for their happiness in the power and wise arrangements of the Emperor Napoleon. The Spaniards might be assured that by their zeal in conforming their conduct to those arrangements, they would give their prince and the two infants the strongest proof of their loyalty; in like manner as their royal highnesses had given them the greatest instance of their paternal affection, in renouncing all their rights, and sacrificing their own interests, for the happiness of the Spaniards, the sole object of their wishes."

The King and Queen of Spain arrived on the 20th of May, at Fontainebleau, where he was immediately accommodated with a complete equipage for the chase. From thence they removed on the 22d to Compiegne. The Prince of the Peace resided now and then, when he did not attend the king and queen, in a villa in the environs of Paris. The Queen of Etruria, and her son, were placed under proper care at a house in the village of St. Mendez, near Paris. The unfortunate Ferdinand, with his uncle and brother, arrived, May 19, at Vallency, a small town in the province of Berry, where they were lodged in a castle belonging to Talleyrand. The princes sought consolation in a strict observance of the ordinances of the catholic religion. They attended mass twice every day, and enjoyed, for hours together, the soothing strains of sacred music. The incomes promised by treaty to the royal family of Spain, were not more regularly paid than pensions commonly are to princes in confinement or exile: which reduced the princes to great inconvenience.

King Joseph set foot on the territory of Spain on the 9th of July, escorted by a guard of 4,000 Italian troops, and followed by upwards of an hundred coaches, carrying his suite, and the members of the Bayonne junta. This guard gradually increasing, amounted, by the time Joseph arrived at Madrid, to ten thousand; but his true guard was an army of eighteen thousand men, under Marshal Bessieres, properly posted for that purpose. Napoleon accompanied him as far as Trun, twelve miles distant from the frontier. In all the towns and villages through which Joseph passed in his way to the capital, a sullen silence prevailed. Few of the men went out of their houses, or interrupted their ordinary employments; and some of the women appeared at the windows and balconies, crying out viva Fernando VII. On the 20th of July, King Joseph made his public entry into Madrid.—On the same day Bonaparte, with Josephine, set out from Bayonne, and arrived at St. Cloud on the 16th of August.

Bonaparte had hitherto, in all his interferences and aggressions on independent states and kingdoms, given, in declarations of war, his reasons for his conduct; which, though they did not justify, explained his views, and were a kind of homage to the sentiments of men and nations.

For his conduct to the Spanish nation, which was base and treacherous beyond all example, he made no apology to Europe; but afterwards, when he found he was opposed, both by the pen and the sword, with a keenness he little expected, he published a kind of justification of his conduct towards Spain, which appeared in the form of a report from the ministers of external relations and of war, presented to the conservative senate on the 5th of September, and published in the Moniteur, September 7. It was dated at Bayonne, April 24, though probably not composed till sometime afterwards. The substance of it was, "that France was under an obligation to put an end to the internal dissensions and anarchy that prevailed in Spain, in order to compel the English government to spare the effusion of human blood. This was for the interest and happiness of Spain, France, the continent of Europe, and all the world.—Of all the states of Europe there was not one between whose condition and fate, and that of France, there was so close and necessary connection as that of Spain. Spain must be either a useful friend to France, or a dangerous enemy."

"The greatness of Louis XIV. did not begin till, having conquered Spain, he formed an alliance with the family then reigning there, by which means the Spanish crown came to be placed on the head of his grandson. This provident act of policy was productive of no less a benefit to the two countries than a century of peace after three centuries of war. The bond that united the two nations was broken asunder by the French revolution. After the third coalition, Spain, at the same time that she was most profuse in her protestations of friendship to France, gave secret assurances of aid to the confederates, as appeared from certain papers communicated to the parliament of England."

"It was demanded by the interests of Spain, as well as those of France, that a strong hand should re-establish order in the Spanish government that had fallen into such disgrace, and that was hastening so quickly to its final overthrow and ruin; that a prince who was the friend of France by inclination and by interest, that had nothing to apprehend, and could never be an object of mistrust to France, should consecrate the whole resources of Spain to its internal prosperity, to the re-establishment of its marine, and to the success of that cause which connected Spain with the continent. The work of Louis XIV. was to be recommenced. What policy advised, justice sanctioned."

The reporter, after setting himself to establish this point by a review of circumstances adduced to prove the lurking hostility of Spain to France, and its predilection for England, and that it was actually in a state of war with his imperial majesty, said, "But, independently of these considerations, existing circumstances do not permit your majesty to abstain from intervention in the affairs of that kingdom. The King of Spain had been hurled from his throne; your majesty was called to judge between the father and the son. What part could your majesty take? Could your majesty sacrifice the cause of sovereigns, and suffer an outrage to the majesty of the throne? Or suffer a prince to sit on the throne of Spain who was unable to disentangle himself from the yoke of the English any longer than your majesty should maintain a powerful army in Spain? If, on the other hand, your majesty should determine to restore Charles IV. to the throne, this could not be done without overcoming very great resistance, and without a deluge of French blood. In short, could your majesty abandon the Spanish nation to its fate in the midst of extreme agitation, and while the English were busy in fomenting trouble and anarchy? Ought your majesty to give up this new prey to be devoured by England? God forbid—I have represented the circumstances that oblige your majesty to come to a great determination. It is recommended by political wisdom, authorized by justice, and by the distractions of Spain, imperiously demanded. Your majesty ought to provide for the security of your empire, and to save Spain from the influence of England."

The minister for foreign relations, in another report made to the emperor, Paris, September 1, to be communicated to the senate, said, "If in the dispositions which your majesty has made, the security of France has been your principal object, the interests of Spain have not been neglected. In uniting the two states by the most intimate alliance, the prosperity and the glory of both have been equally consulted; your majesty interposed as a mediator for the salvation of Spain, torn to pieces by intestine broils. You pointed out to the Spaniards on the one hand the anarchy with which they were threatened, and on the other hand England ready to take advantage of their disorder in order to appropriate to herself whatever might suit her convenience.—Shall England be permitted to say, 'Spain is one of my provinces,' and to domineer at the ports of France? If the French fight for the liberty of the seas, they must begin with tearing Spain from the tyrant of the seas. If they fight for peace, they must drive from Spain the enemies of peace.—In this contest all Europe prays for success to France." Thus far Bonaparte carried on his design by intrigue and fraud; by which means he considered it as accomplished. But the Spaniards, not only in the provinces of Spain, but in the colonies, started up simultaneously, as if moved up by one indignant soul, into an attitude of defence and defiance, and declared eternal war against their perfidious and insolent oppressor: an event which astonished all Europe, and no one more than the tyrant who had treated them with so much contempt.

At the very time when all Bonaparte's arrangements, relating to the settlement of Spain, were completed, and waited only for the sanction of the junta he had called to Bayonne, the insurrection broke out in all the provinces not immediately under the control of his arms. The intelligence of this excited great emotions in the breasts of the Spaniards at Bayonne, and at the castle of Marrac. As to Bonaparte, the insurrection did not seem to have given him at first much alarm. The sham national assembly was held at Bayonne; the new constitution laid before it; and King Joseph sent to Madrid, as if nothing had happened. Even after it had begun to wear a serious aspect, Bonaparte affected to regard it with indifference and contempt, and was at great pains, by means of his journals, to publish that indifference to the world; apprehending, not without reason, that a serious and effectual resistance of his usurpations in Spain might awaken resistance in other quarters.

Bonaparte saw, when too late, the impolicy of his impetuous haste. He might have gained his end by means, though more leisurely, more secure. He had gained a complete ascendancy over the mind and conduct of Ferdinand; as proved by every act of this prince when raised to the throne, and particularly by his journey to Bayonne. The power and influence of Bonaparte, in his character of ally and mediator, with so many French troops in Spain, which might be reinforced on various pretences, was unlimited. It was in his power to occupy Cadiz, Carthage, Ferrol, St. Andero, and other ports, and thus to cut off all regular and sure communication with England. By bestowing as a gift, on Ferdinand, the throne of his ancestors, he might have degraded him in the eyes of his subjects, compelled him to become, like his father, the miserable instrument of French rapacity, and ultimately like him to abdicate the throne for the safety of his person. In a word, he might have pursued any conduct but that which mortally wounded the pride of every Spaniard, and which every Spaniard considered as a personal insult. It must, however, be admitted, that the explosion of indignant patriotism, which burst forth at the same moment in all the provinces of Spain, was more than Bonaparte, or any one, could have expected. It seemed to have astonished even the Spaniards themselves.

The junta of Seville looked upon it to be, "as it were, the inspiration of heaven, and little short of miraculous." And this, by the bye, may serve, in some degree, as an apology for the Duke of Infantado, and the other Spanish nobles, who accompanied Ferdinand to Bayonne. They might have thought that all attempts to oppose Bonaparte would be of no avail, and tend only to involve the country in calamity and ruin.

The public mind was in a state of fermentation ever since the horrid 2d of May, and commotions and tumults had arisen in divers places; but it was not until the gazette of Madrid, May 20, had proclaimed throughout the land the abdication of the Spanish crown by Ferdinand VII. in favor of the Emperor of the French, that there was a great and general explosion. The publication of the gazette was quickly followed up by the anniversary of St. Ferdinand, the tutelar saint of the prince, May 27, which awakened all the sensibility of an ardent, devout, and honorable nation. It was on that day that the insurrection broke out in most places.

The history of Spain, for what remains of this year, after the close of the month of May, naturally divides itself into three periods:—First, that previous to the formation of the central juntas; secondly, that during the government of the central juntas; and, thirdly, that under the supreme central junta.

The events of the first of these periods, which was but very short, or rather merely transient, were, as usual, in similar cases, for the most part, the effects of popular passion. Don Miquel de Saavedra, captain-general of the province of Valentia, where the insurrection first started, who attempted to oppose the views of the insurgents, was put to death. The insurgents then demanded, that all the goods belonging to the French should be declared to be forfeited, and their persons secured in the citadel. A few days thereafter they dragged the crew of a French ship, which had been pursued by an English frigate, and sought refuge on the Spanish coast, to prison, and, on the 14th of June, in a fresh paroxysm of rage, massacred them. At Cuença, the corregidor and the intendant were thrown into chains, and carried off by a party of peasants. The Governor of Carthagená was murdered. General Truxillo, Governor of Malaga, was murdered at Grenada. His body was dragged through the streets, cut in pieces, and afterwards burnt. The French consul at Malaga, Mornard, and some French merchants of that place, were secured on the 4th of June from the fury of the people, in the Moorish castle of Cíbralforo. A great quantity of arms and ammunition taken from an English privateer in 1800, had been lodged in a warehouse in the suburbs, to be sold. On the 20th of June a report prevailed, that this magazine had been purchased by the French consul, for the use of the French army. The people of Malaga marched to the castle, and notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the deputy-governor, and resistance of the guard, burst into the castle, pierced their victim with a thousand daggers, and burned his dead body on a bonfire made of the furniture and some wrecks of the consul's house. The dépôt was broken open, and all that it contained destroyed. This was done in spite of every effort on the part of the municipal government of Malaga to prevent it.

The tumult was at last quelled by a singular expedient. The dean and chapter fell on the contrivance of a procession, to thank God for their deliverance from the oppressor. The multitude immediately joined the procession, and tranquillity was restored. The Governor of St. Lucas, Barameda, was massacred. At Jean, the peasants murdered the corregidor, and plundered the town.

Similar scenes were exhibited in Estramadura and the Castiles. At Badajoz, the insurrection broke out, May the 30th, and was in an instant matured. The palace of the governor was assaulted. The insurgents demanded arms, to be enrolled, and formed into a regular body. The government, with the bishop, appeared at the balcony, exhorting the multitude to retire; but in vain. They overpowered the guard of the palace, rushed in, seized the governor, and dragged him as far as the Palm-gate, where, with knives and sticks, they destroyed him.

At Cadiz, May the 29th, the people rose against the Lieutenant-general Solano, Marquis Del Socorro, captain-general of the province of Andalusia, and Governor of the city of Cadiz. The marquis, with the Spanish troops under his command, had been recalled for the purpose of covering the flight of Charles V. from Aranjuez to Seville. At Madrid, he formed an intimate and confidential connection with Murat, and General O'Farrel, an Irishman in the Spanish service, but drawn over to the side of the French. From the moment that a design was conceived to resist the progress of the French in Spain, every eye was turned to Andalusia, admirably adapted, by its situation, for co-operation with the English, and possessing the harbour of Cadiz, and the foundaries of Seville. Cadiz was divided, though unequally, by a French party and the Spanish patriots. The former consisted of French merchants and French clerks in the counting-houses, with Le Roy, the French consul, at their head; and Admiral Rosilly, with the other officers of the French fleet, which had been moored in the harbour of Cadiz ever since the battle of Trafalgar. The latter was composed of almost all the Spaniards, the English merchants, and some of other nations.

While the patriots, with their allies, entered into a correspondence and concert with Sir Hugh Dalrymple, Governor of Gibraltar, the English

Admiral Purvis, and General Castaros, commander of the Spanish camp at St. Roch, for the purpose of acting against the common enemy according to circumstances, the French party kept up a correspondence with Madrid. Solano came in post-haste to Cadiz, and thundered forth proclamations against all who should have any correspondence with the English forces, while a strong detachment from the main army of the French at Madrid was on its march to Cadiz. An immense number of people, conducted by Spanish officers and certain merchants of Cadiz, assembled around the governor's palace, at Chulana, a village in the vicinity of Cadiz, demanding, with loud cries, "arms and ammunition." Solano appeared at the balcony, and in a long speech tried to persuade the people that the power of the Emperor of the French was altogether irresistible, and that, if they should attempt resistance to his will by force, they would only precipitate their own destruction. They heard him with patience a long time; but interrupted him at last, by repeating their cry of "arms and ammunition. Long live Ferdinand VII." Arms were brought from the barracks, and a cannon from the bulwarks. The gates of the palace were instantly forced: the governor's guard was disarmed: Solano himself, attempting to make his escape by the tops of the houses, was seized and dragged into the street. Even in this extremity he proclaimed the power and the vengeance of Bonaparte, and declared, "that he was ready to die in the cause of the Grand Napoleon." A person who was near him, on hearing these words, dashed his brains out at one blow with a club.

Some excesses were committed in the provinces of Leon and Asturias. At Corunna, in Galicia, General Filangieri, an Italian in the Spanish service, because he endeavoured to mitigate, by persuasion, the fury of the peasantry, though he had declared on the side of the insurgents, would have been shot, if an artillery-officer had not stepped before him, and given him time to take refuge in the convent of St. Domingo.—On the 1st of June, the people demanded that all the French residing at Corunna should be arrested. About thirty or forty French, of different ranks and conditions, were taken to the common gaol, but their property was not seized. Straggling parties of the French, in many places, were cut off by the peasants, led on by monks.

But the reign of mere democracy was of short duration. The zeal and efforts of unconnected individuals were quickly brought into unity of design and action, by the establishment of provincial juntas. Even before the establishment of these, the popular resentment was in many instances calmed by the magistrates, and the authority of good and respectable men, among both the laity and clergy. There is no instance of a popular insurrection so widely extended, and provoked by such outrages and insults, that was attended with so few calamities as that of Spain. The horrid excesses just enumerated are but as a drop in the bucket, when compared with the torrents of innocent blood shed in the first ebullitions of the French revolution. The excesses of Spain were as much underneath the enormities of France, as the grievances of which she had to complain were above any that the French were subjected to under the mild and beneficent reign of Louis XVI.

What remained to the Spaniards of their ancient constitution of government, congenial with popular liberty, presented means of collecting the public sentiments, and forming a concert of will and power, without having recourse to innovations, for the most part dangerous, and always accompanied with confusion. The municipal government of the towns of Spain, though complicated, wore, in general, an air of popular representation. Wherever there were 2000 householders, four deputies and a syndic were named by the people, and formed part of the town-council.—On the 27th of May, there was a convention at Seville of the magistrates, the constituted authorities, and the most respectable of the inhabitants of all classes. This convention, by common consent, elected a supreme provincial junta.

The supreme council of Seville, laying hold of some statutes in their constitution which authorized their rejecting the orders of the supreme council of Madrid, when that capital should be in the hands of foreign troops, assumed an independent authority in the name of Ferdinand VII. whom they proclaimed king, and declared war against France. Supreme juntas were also formed in the same manner, in all the other provinces not under the immediate pressure of the French. But it was necessary, as much as possible, to give the separate forces of all the provinces the same direction; otherwise, instead of harmonious co-operation, they might counteract each other, and throw all things into confusion. The lead in the affairs of the nation was therefore taken by the supreme junta of Seville; which, with a happy audacity assumed, and for a time exercised, all the functions of sovereign authority. Without entangling themselves in any disputes that might arise from the anticipation of contingent events, and diversity of opinion, concerning political reforms, they declared "that their only object was, that Spain might preserve its integrity and independence for its lord and king, Ferdinand VII. on whose safe return, he, with the supreme government, would determine what might be his royal will, either by commanding a general assembly of the Cortes, or by such other means as his prudence might suggest for facilitating the reform of abuses and the general happiness of the kingdom, securing it on foundations firm and subject to no change. For the present, all the provinces of Spain ought to confine themselves to this general expression, hereditary succession, according to the fundamental laws of the monarchy."

The junta of Seville was exceedingly anxious to counteract the machinations of the emissaries of Bonaparte, and other evil-minded persons, who endeavoured to propagate a belief that Andalusia affected a superiority over the other provinces. Any such thought, they declared, and repeated their declaration, had been far from them. Although the general good of the nation had been their guide, and as it were the soul of all their actions, certain circumstances peculiar to Andalusia evinced the propriety of the conduct adopted by the junta of Seville. Veteran troops were more numerous in that province than in other parts, and thus an army could be formed in a shorter time. It possessed the only foundry of cannon in the kingdom, and arms and ammunition in a certain degree of abundance. The superior opulence, and other peculiar circumstances, offered resources which other provinces wanted. The famous English fortress of Gibraltar was situate in Andalusia. That fortress, and the English squadron cruising near the mouth of the Straits, were now happily to be reckoned among the resources of Andalusia.

Various provinces acquiesced in the authority assumed by the junta of Seville, nor was it ever opposed by any of them: though particular juntas were established in the respective provinces for maintaining order, and calling forth their resources in support of the common cause. It was a fine, as well as wonderful spectacle, to behold so great a number of provinces, at the same moment, without consulting each other, not only agreeing in opinion on the great and leading political points, but as to the manner in which they ought to act, forming the same wishes, taking the same measures, and establishing the same form of government; this being the most suitable and convenient for the government of each province.

Every thing done by the Spaniards at this period wore the twofold character of heroism and wisdom. Abandoned to themselves, they had to provide against internal disunion and anarchy, as well as external aggression. They were well aware that the enemy would attempt to create divisions, by creating a diversity of opinions and pretensions. All classes, therefore, were obedient to the authority of the juntas, without so much as hinting, for the present, at any other changes than what their unprecedented and most critical situation imperiously demanded. The different juntas were animated by one spirit of national indignation, and ready to adopt whatever measures appeared to be the result of the greatest wisdom. All topics that might entangle them in disputes, that might lead to coldness and mistrust, or the appearance of it, between one provincial junta and another, or towards any description of men, were carefully avoided. The council of Castile had sanctioned all the edicts of Murat, or rather his master, Bonaparte; but allowance was made for the state of coercion in which they were. It was observed to them, indeed, in different addresses, that it might have become men of virtue to have fled from Madrid to some of the armed bodies of their countrymen. But when, on the restraint being removed, they threw all their weight into the scale of the patriots, they were hailed and respected as the true friends of their country, and all was forgotten. Similar indulgence was extended to such of the Spanish junta at Bayonne, and nobles that had accompanied Ferdinand to that place of confinement, as deserted the cause of Joseph as soon as it was in their power, and joined their countrymen in arms. In truth, the extreme imprudence with which so great a number of persons of the first rank in Spain committed themselves into the hands of such a character as Bonaparte, could not be altogether excused. But it was not in their power, when once in his hands, to extricate themselves, or to oppose any effectual resistance to the will of the tyrant. And the best way to counteract his wishes, perhaps, was, to assume an appearance of acceding to them. By flattering him on the immensity of his power, and holding forth the facility with which he might accomplish his projects, they led him into a snare, and prepared the way for his discomfiture. When we reflect on the paucity of the force sent into Spain, in comparison of that which had been led forth by Bonaparte himself, against Austria, Russia, and Prussia, it appears probable that the nobles and deputies at Bayonne did not discourage, but, on the contrary, encourage an idea which seemed all along to have been entertained by the tyrant, that whatever might be the success of the numerous emissaries employed to corrupt the persons supposed to have the most influence with the people, the very terror of his arms would be sufficient to retain the Spanish nation in awe and subjection; and that the Spaniards, like a flock of timid sheep, would readily obey any one he should appoint to the throne. Persons of a suspicious disposition might have their doubts about the purity and intention of both the Bayonne junta and the grandees that accompanied Ferdinand thither. But, what was good policy, there was no public expression of such a sentiment: and, on the whole, it occurred to the charitably-disposed, and the candid part of the nation, that there are circumstances in which the weakness of human nature may naturally look for excuse in necessity, and when even virtue herself, without a blush, may have recourse to simulation and dissimulation.

By this temperate and wise conduct all were united in one fraternity. Noblemen and gentlemen, the clergy of all conditions, manufacturers, artizans, and laborers, all presented themselves voluntarily to be enrolled in the public service. There was yet another class of volunteers, of which there was frequent mention, not only in the papers of the day, published in various forms by the Spaniards, but in the French bulletins, namely, the literary class; the class of students and professors in the university, which was very numerous. There were not less than twenty-four colleges in Spain, and several of them crowded with numbers of students. These having exchanged their books for arms, formed companies, some of whom were called the company of Brutus, others the company of Cato, the company of the people, and by similar allusions to the great cause of freedom. On their standards was inscribed liberty or death! The courage of this literary class was noticed in the French, as well as the Spanish accounts of occurrences.

The companies formed of the monks and armed peasants bore the names of saints. Many of the standards displayed the device of the French eagle, torn to pieces by the lion of Spain. Among the higher clergy, there were many who entered at once into the military spirit. The Bishop of St. Andero wore always a cutlass at his side.

Though it was not among the highest rank that the patriotic ardour was the greatest, there were not a few exceptions. Among these, it is due to most distinguished talents and virtues, to mention the Condé de Montejo, who spent his whole time, with very short intervals for sleep and other refreshment, in animating, instructing, and directing his countrymen, by writing, and by traversing Spain in different directions, for the purpose of conversing with the different juntas, and the individuals of the greatest authority in the different provinces. An host of admirable writers sprung up in Spain, where their existence was not imagined. The Spaniard, silent by disposition, and concentrating his ideas, acquires both precision of thought and propriety of expression; a laconic, antithetical, and pointed brevity. How different this from the loquacity, the verbosity of the French.

The Spanish proclamations and state papers, at this period, displayed consummate eloquence, involving the closest reasoning, in a continued stream of passion. Never before was Bonaparte treated in such a style! no polite circumlocutions and reserves—no diplomatic courtesies—no professions of high consideration—no management or caution, indicating doubt or fear. The patriots poured on the inhuman and perfidious monster undisguised reproach, unqualified abhorrence, and menaces of revenge.

Every incentive that could be drawn from the religious character of the Spaniards, was employed to rouse the people to arms. A proclamation from his holiness the Pope, Pius VII. to the Spanish catholics, together with a civil catechism, or brief compendium of the obligations of a good Spaniard, was industriously circulated in every province; town, village, and hamlet. Sermons were preached by the bishops in favor of the good cause, and extracts from them printed and published. It should be observed, that parochial schools being established throughout all Spain, the lowest of the people, though restrained by the inquisition from indiscriminate reading, could both read and write. The juntas, in their proclamations to the people, talked very gravely of the patronage and protection to be expected from their Lady of the Pillar. Nor were pious frauds disdained. At Valladolid, Saragossa, Valencia, and Seville, miracles were solemnly proclaimed, and by those to whom such proclamations were addressed, seriously believed.

At the same time that the juntas used all means for exciting and forming the whole mass of the male population of a reasonable age to arms, and calling forth all the resources of the peninsula, they recommended their cause, and had recourse to the favor, aid, and co-operation of all nations inimical to usurpation, and friends to the rights of independent states and kingdoms. The supreme junta of Asturias invited the Poles, Italians, and Portuguese, bearing arms in the ranks of the French, to come to their mountains, and join the standard of freedom.

The junta of Seville, May 29, invited the co-operation of the French nation; and all the provinces subject to it—"Come to us, and you shall find valor, generosity, and true honor."—The same junta, May 30, concluded an address to the Portuguese nation in these words: "Your country is not in danger—the danger is past. Hasten to arms for its deliverance and restoration. Share in the glory of setting an example to nations groaning under oppression." Missioners were sent, and a secret correspondence and understanding entered into, or, as was affirmed by the Austrians at the time, only attempted to be entered into with the court of Vienna.

But it was to the English nation and the Spanish colonies that the Spanish patriots looked for the most cordial, prompt, and efficient assistance: nor were their hopes deceived.

After the tragical end of Solano, the lieutenant-general of Andalusia and government of Cadiz were conferred by the supreme junta of Seville, that at this time exercised all the powers of government, on Don Thomas Morla. Morla was a person of great talents, as well as a decided and vigorous character. With equal wisdom, promptitude, and firmness, he had saved Cadiz and Spain from the ravages of the plague in 1804, by shutting up all the churches of Cadiz and its vicinity, in opposition to the remonstrances of both the monks and the greater part of the secular clergy, who considered this as an act of sacrilege, and against the advice of the Spanish physicians too, who maintained that it was useless. He had been long odious to the nobility on account of the severity of his manners, and his attachment to the Prince of Peace. But, as his great rival and adversary, General O'Farrel, had gone over to the side of the French, his subsequent declarations of irreconcilable hatred to that party were believed to be sincere.

In the mean time, in consequence of the concert already mentioned between General Castanos and the patriots of Cadiz on the one part, and the commanders of the British forces at Gibraltar and the Mediterranean on the other; Lord Collingwood arrived with ships to take the command of the English fleet off Cadiz, and General Spencer with five or six English regiments from Gibraltar, and the two Swiss regiments of Meuron and Wattenville. Lord Collingwood offered his services for the reduction of the French fleet: but Morla very properly determined, that this should be, exclusively, an achievement of the Spaniards. The French ships lay in the canal of the arsenal in such a position, that they were out of the reach of the cannon of the castles as well as of the Spanish squadron of Cadiz. But gun-boats, bomb-vessels, and tremendous batteries, constructed on the isle of Leon and near fort Louis, soon reduced Admiral Rosilly to surrender (June 14,) the French fleet, after offering in vain terms of capitulation. The French fleet consisted of five ships of the line, of seventy-four guns, one frigate, and four thousand seamen and mariners.

Advice having been received, that a small detachment of French had assembled at Tavira, to enter Spain by the river Guadiana, General Spencer, with the small detachment under his command, at the entreaty of General Morla, immediately set sail for the Guadiana, and landed his troops at Agamonte. Three ships had already been sent to the mouth of the Guadiana by Admiral Purvis. In consequence of these movements, the French retired in all directions on Lisbon, with the exception of some weak detachments, left to occupy the small forts and other positions on that side of Portugal. The Portuguese, animated by the presence of the English, and the example, as well as addresses of the Spaniards, every where rose against the French. Deputations were sent from every part of Portugal to Admiral Sir Charles Cotton, commanding the naval forces of Britain in that quarter, soliciting succours. The admiral, with due frankness, immediately replied:

"Agreeably to your desires, I send you ships, troops, arms, and ammunition; and have given orders for hoisting the flag of his royal highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, around which the whole Portuguese nation ought instantly to rally, and take up arms in a cause at once so just and glorious. To secure success, unanimity is necessary. Unite yourselves with your brave friends and neighbours, the Spaniards. Suffer not yourselves to be either intimidated by threats or seduced by promises. From the experience of some months, you must have learnt how to estimate the friendship of the French. It is to the fidelity and the succours of the English, seconded by your own energies, that you are to owe the restoration of your prince, and the independence of your country."—On-board the Hibernia, off the Tagus, July 4, 1808.

It is scarcely necessary to mention, that the noble efforts of the Spaniards were immediately followed by peace, harmony, and friendship between that nation and Great Britain, her allies. Proclamations of peace and amity with England and her ally Sweden, were published by the juntas; and, as for England, whatever power was at war with the common enemy of Europe, was at peace with England. It never occurred, as was declared by Mr. Canning, to the English ministers, to consider the English as in a state of hostility to Spain. Preliminaries of a new and perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, between the two nations of Spain and Portugal, were signed at Oporto, in the name of Ferdinand VII. and the Prince Regent of Portugal, July 14. The Bishop of Oporto, president of the junta of government of that city, which, Lisbon as well as Madrid being in the hands of the French, seemed to have taken a pattern from Seville, signed the treaty in the name of the prince.—The Portuguese provinces of Algarve and Alentejo placed themselves under the guidance and protection of the junta of Seville. So also did the Canary isles, to which the junta had transmitted the earliest possible intelligence of the turn that affairs had taken in the Peninsula. They also determined to dispatch envoys and commissioners to the transmarine establishments of Spain in the Americas and West Indies, and in Asia, inviting them to unite with their brethren in Old Spain, for preserving the integrity and independency of the monarchy for their lord and king, Ferdinand VII. For accomplishing this end, they applied to Lord Collingwood for a passport for a frigate and four advice-boats; and also for a corvette to carry out a number of officers, whose presence was necessary in the American colonies. They preferred an English to a Spanish ship for conveying the officers, because it would be a proof of peace and alliance between Spain and Great Britain. Their demand was immediately complied with, and all the vessels, after a short and pleasant voyage, reached their destination. Vessels had been sent before with a number of proclamations by King Joseph; but the greater part of them fell into the hands of English ships of war: the crews of one or two that reached the coast of Spanish America, were imprisoned by the colonists, and the proclamations of Joseph burnt by the hands of the executioner. Application was also made, June 12, to Lord Collingwood, by the government of Cadiz, for a frigate to conduct commissioners, appointed by the supreme junta of Seville, to England, in order to treat with his majesty's ministers, on matters of great interest and importance to both countries. As the admiral who commanded in the port of Cadiz was one of the deputies, Lord Collingwood thought it proper, that his departure should be delayed till the surrender of the French ships in the harbour: within two or three days after which, the deputies set sail in the Revenge frigate for England, where they arrived in safety on the 24th of July. Long before their arrival deputies had appeared in London, from the principality of Asturias, bearing the first certain intelligence of the insurrection in Spain, and soliciting the aid of the British government; a circumstance that, not unnaturally, led the periodical journalists to state that the standard of liberty in Spain was first raised in Asturias. The insurrection was almost simultaneous. But, if it were of any importance to ascertain the priority of a few days, it might be observed, that the insurrection first broke out in Valentia.

On the 9th of June, six Spanish gentlemen, having at their head the Viscount de Materosa and Don Diego de la Vega, arrived in London, and they were followed by a succession of deputies, or envoys from other provinces, both Spanish and Portuguese. Peace was proclaimed with Spain in the London Gazette of the 5th of July. The Spanish prisoners in England, to the number of several thousands, were set free, clothed, and sent home to join their brethren in arms. The British arsenals, fleets, and squadrons, and treasures: all that Spain could demand, or England afford, was without hesitation or the smallest delay liberally granted. The ministry were neither remiss nor parsimonious, where to be alert and profuse was to be universally popular, from the king on the throne to the beggar on the highways and streets. In the cause of the Peninsula the people of Great Britain and Ireland seemed ready to rise in a mass, as well as the natives of that noble country. They hailed the dawn of liberty, and stood in admiration of the Spaniards. The emigrants from France, prone to grasp at appearances infinitely less promising, expressed their sensibility, in extravagant and poetical language, but, at the same time, nothing more than what they felt: "The Spaniards," they said, "were worthy to contend for the cause of liberty, law, monarchy, honor, and God.—Spain raises the standard of liberty, and all nature revives.—The spirit of party is mute; the most inveterate hatreds extinct; enthusiasm has banished the spirit of opposition; the walls of Westminster-hall are astonished at seeing, for the first time, a perfect unity of sentiments, words, and actions."

The first supply to the Spanish patriots, which was sent within a few days after the arrival of the Asturian deputies, consisted in three hundred thousand pounds sterling, in dollars; five thousand muskets; thirty thousand pikes, and an immense quantity of powder and balls. Mate-rosa's secretary was sent home, together with three British officers of rank, with these succours, with assurances that others should be sent from time to time, as well as troops, and whatever the patriots might need. A promise which was faithfully fulfilled.

The deputies were splendidly entertained by the city of London, the bank, and other public bodies, as well as by individuals of great distinction. Subscriptions were opened in London, Liverpool, Bristol, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dublin, Cork, Waterford, and many other places, for supporting the cause of Spain, and several military corps, militia and volunteers, offered their services. The supreme junta of Asturias did not fail, in a gazette, dated Oviedo, June 80, to publish, with expressions of the most profound gratitude, the generosity of the English nation. The same sentiments, on various occasions, were expressed with the same warmth by the other juntas.

In the beginning of June four of the fourteen provinces into which Spain is divided were in the hands of the French; viz. Navarre, Biscay, and the two Castiles; they were likewise in possession of Barcelona. At this time there were three marshals of France in the heart of Spain, Murat, Moncey, and Bessieres; who, probably, brought with them three distinct corps of the grand army, or nine divisions, forming, in all, from seventy to seventy-five thousand men: to which we may add the corps of the army under Marshal Ney, on the frontier of the Eastern Pyrennees, and occupying the fortresses of Barcelona and Montjuich. This corps of Ney's was computed at 10,000 men. Adding to these 20,000 French in Portugal under Junot, and 15,000 auxiliaries, Hanoverians, Swiss, and Spaniards, we have an aggregate of 120,000 men. Of these, 50,000 were either stationed in Madrid, or encamped in the vicinity, under the orders of Murat and Marshal Moncey. From this great body at or near the capital, detachments were sent to take possession of Cadiz and of Valentia. One of these detachments proceeded towards its destination under the orders of the general of division Dupont: the other marched to Valentia, under Marshal Moncey himself. Marshal Bessieres, whose principal force was posted at Vittoria and Pampeluna, for guarding the two roads to Madrid, and securing the communication between that capital and Bayonne, had it in charge to push detachments to the right and left, for bridling as great an extent of country as possible.

The reduction of the city of Valentia, would have been an important step towards that of the whole province, and also open a way for combining the operations of Marshal Moncey and General Duhesme in Catalonia. That of Cadiz, besides the importance of its harbour-ships, and naval arsenal, would have terminated a military line of posts from Bayonne by Vittoria, Burgos, Madrid, Cordova, and Seville, that would completely have divided the Peninsula from north to south, and cut off all co-operation between the eastern and western divisions.

Marshal Bessieres, who commanded the northern army of the French, was opposed by General Cuesta, who was at the head of the forces of the four western provinces of Galicia, Asturias, Estramadura, Leon, and certain unsubdued, or as they were called by the French, refractory districts of Biscay. General Castanos was commander-in-chief of the four kingdoms of Andalusia, with the provinces of Grenada and Valentia, which had united themselves with Andalusia. Admiral Cisneros was Captain-general of Murcia; Don Joseph Palafox of Arragon, and Count Espellata of Catalonia. The garrisons of St. Roch and Ceuta joined their brethren in arms, under the general command of Castanos; those of Majorca and Minorca, the patriots of Catalonia.

The army under Dupont, when it left Madrid, towards the close of May, amounted to 15,000 men; but in its progress, it was gradually diminished by sickness, by desertion, and by the necessity of sending out from time to time, parties for bringing in forage and provisions, the greater part of which were destroyed or taken by parties of armed peasants. Having crossed the mountains of Morena, while the insurrection was yet without any thing of consistency or form, he descended into the plains of Andalusia, and on the 7th of June advanced to Cordova, of which he took possession, without much opposition from the few Spanish troops quartered there, joined by a number of peasants. For three days the city of Cordova was given up to pillage. The churches, after being swept of their sacred vessels and ornaments, were converted into stables. On the 13th, parties of French were advanced beyond Cordova. On the 16th, the French commander being informed that General Castanos was marching against him, at the head of 21,000 regular troops, infantry, 25,000 cavalry, and a numerous artillery, besides a great number of insurgents who volunteered their service, retreated from Cordova to Andujar; where he took up a strong position with the Guadalquivir in front, and added to the natural strength of the place, deep entrenchments. General Castanos being unwilling to waste any part of his force by attacking the enemy in his entrenched camp, determined to cut off his supplies, by coming between him and another division of Dupont's army, posted under the immediate orders of General Wedel. General Dupont, in this straitened and perilous situation, dispatched messenger after messenger to Madrid, calling loudly for reinforcements. A division of 8,000 men was sent, under the orders of General Belliard, famous for his exploits in Upper Egypt, by the Sierra Morena. Dupont, in order to facilitate a junction with the expected reinforcements, quitted his position at Andujar, and fell back on Baylen. But Castanos posted divisions and detachments of his army in so judicious a manner as not only to cut off all communication between the corps under General Wedel and General Dupont, but also between this last corps, which was the most numerous, and Madrid.

The deplorable situation to which Dupont was reduced, is thus described in an intercepted letter from him to General Belliard.—“We have not a moment to lose for quitting a position in which we cannot subsist. The soldier being under arms the whole day, cannot now, as heretofore, reap the corn and make bread: for all the peasants have abandoned both their hamlets and their harvests. For heaven's sake, send us prompt reinforcements; in one word, a body of troops forming one compact mass, of which the component parts shall be as near to each other as ever it is possible. If we suffer the enemy to keep the field, all the southern provinces and the other troops of the line will hasten to take part with the rebels. A decisive blow in Andalusia would contribute greatly to the subjugation of all Spain. Send me, without a moment's delay, medicines and linen for the wounded: for the enemy has intercepted, for the space of a month, all our ammunition-waggons, and the provisions sent for us from Toledo.”

A detachment of 500 men, sent out from the French camp at Andujar, to seek and meet Belliard, was cut off to a man by the smugglers of the mountains, who had formed themselves into a body, 4,000 strong, and sworn to grant no quarter. The same body, and other parties of Spaniards, harassed the detachment of Belliard, in the defiles of Morena, night and day. Instead of BOOK VIII. forming a junction with Dupont, he was seen to return to Madrid with half the numbers with which he had set out. When a general is hemmed in, into any desperate situation, his only chance of extrication is, to make a bold attack on the enemy.—On the 20th of July, about three o'clock in the morning, the army under Dupont attacked the Spaniards. There was a division of 9,000 strong, under the command of Lieutenant-general Reding, a Swiss; there was another division of the Spanish army, of 5,000, under General de Coupigny; a third, under General de Pena, of 6,000; and a fourth, under General Jones, of 5,000; in all, 25,000: of these 25,000 the half were peasants. The force of Dupont did not exceed 8,000. The brunt of the battle fell on the divisions of the Generals Reding and Coupigny.

The first shock of the French was so furious, that the foremost companies of the Spaniards suffered prodigiously. But the Spaniards maintained their ground, and, supported by their artillery, attacked and drove the French before them at all points. Yet the French kept up the conflict, constantly renewing their assaults without any other interruption than what was unavoidably occasioned by momentary retreats, for the formation of fresh columns, till half an hour past mid-day. At different times they broke through the lines of defence, with the boldness peculiar to troops accustomed to conquer, and sometimes advanced even to the Spanish batteries. The last attack was led on by Dupont himself, who with the other generals placed himself at the head of the columns, under the fire of the Spanish artillery, which, on that day, was admirably well served, as was admitted by the French, who owned that they had forty pieces of cannon dismantled.

At two o'clock P. M. the advanced-guard of the division under General Pena arrived at the scene of action, and began to play on the enemy with his artillery; when a flag of truce appeared, desiring to treat for a capitulation. An armistice ensued of course. But during this, the division under the command of General Pena was attacked by the French division, 6,000 strong, under General Wedel, who came up while Dupont was engaged with the Generals Reding and Coupigny, from Carolina. The battalion of Cordova was surprized and taken, with two field-pieces.

The number of the French killed and wounded in the battle of Baylen, amounted, it was computed, to 3,000; that of the Spaniards, to 1,200. The negotiation between Dupont and the Spanish commander-in-chief, General Castanos, did not last long. Dupont was told at once that he must surrender at discretion: which he agreed to. General Wedel's division was comprehended in the capitulation as well as that of Dupont, forming together a body of 14,000. It was agreed that General Wedel's division should be sent home by sea to Rochfort.

Marshal Moncey was not more successful in Valentia than General Dupont in Andalusia, though he escaped capture, and made good his retreat, though with a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, to Madrid. The kingdom of Valentia is well fortified by nature by means of the rivers Gabriel, and Xucar, and by a chain of steep and rugged mountains. The passes through these were guarded by some troops of the line, and a considerable body of Valentian insurgents. These guards were attacked by Moncey, on the 21st of June, and routed.—Having crossed the mountains, he marched straight on Valentia.

On the 26th, he was attacked at Bunolos, by General Caro, a nephew of the illustrious General Romanas, and suffered pretty severely, in both cavalry and infantry. He was attacked again by General Caro, between Quarte and Mislata, when he also sustained considerable loss. Nevertheless, though thus harassed, he continued his march, and on the 28th opened a heavy fire on Valentia, of both artillery and musketry, which was continued without ceasing from mid-day to the evening. The Valentians returned his fire with some pieces of artillery planted at the gates of the city, and by showers of musketry from the tops of houses. On the other hand, he had to maintain a conflict with General Caro, who had followed the French close at their heels, for the defence of Valentia. An impetuous charge with the bayonet made such havoc among the ranks of the French, that they retired, in about eight hours, at even, to their camp, between Quarte and Mislata, which was fortified by strong entrenchments and formidable batteries. From thence he continued his retreat on Madrid, harassed for some days by General Caro, as he had been on his march through the plain of Valentia. Of 15,000 men, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, that marched with Moncey from Madrid, 10,000 returned, and 150 waggons carrying the wounded. Fifteen hundred were made prisoners, and sent to Carthage. General Dupont, on his arrival in France, was tried by a court-martial, condemned to death, and immediately shot by torch-light.

The campaign of Arragon was still more glorious to the Spanish patriots than those of Andalusia and Valentia. Arragon, situated between Madrid and the frontier of France, was obliged to fight with one reinforcement of fresh troops after another. In every engagement before the walls of Saragossa, Palafox was victorious. The inhabitants of Saragossa equalled—it was not possible to exceed, the patriotic heroism of the Numantians and Saguntines. Every mode of defence and attack that human imagination could devise, was adopted, and whatever human courage could dare, was performed.

Saragossa, the capital of the kingdom of Arragon, is situate on the right bank of the Ebro, with a suburb on the left bank, connected with it by a stone bridge. Though the mountains that bound the valley of the Ebro are distant, yet Saragossa is commanded by some high ground, called the Torrero, about a mile to the south-west. The walls of Saragossa appear to have been constructed merely to facilitate the means of levying the taxes on every article brought into the town for sale. The gates, nine in number, are of the most simple construction; and the line between them is, in some places, preserved by the mud wall of a garden; in others, by buildings, or by the remains of an old Moorish wall, which has a slight parapet, but without any platform, even for musketry. The houses are three stories in height: the streets very narrow and crooked, excepting one or two market-places, and the street called the Corso, situate nearly in the centre of the town. The population is estimated at about 60,000 souls.

On the 25th of May, the inhabitants of this defenceless city, and the peasantry of the surrounding country, rose to repel the aggressions of the French, and to frustrate the design of changing the dynasty on the Spanish throne, announced in the manifesto of Murat, May 20. The Captain-general of Arragon, Guiliamah, had betrayed an inclination to submit to the enemy. He was, on this account, seized, and thrown into prison, and the government unanimously conferred on Don Joseph Palafox, the youngest of three brothers of one of the most distinguished families in Arragon. This nobleman, at the commencement of the revolution, had been selected from the officers of the guards, to be second in command to the Marquis de Castellar, to whose custody the Prince of the Peace was confined after his arrest at Aranjuez. Though he had been in the Spanish guards all his life, he had never seen actual service. His time had been principally passed in the dissipation of Madrid, where he was not a little distinguished by the splendor and fashion of his appearance.

Palafox was one of those noblemen who accompanied King Ferdinand to Bayonne, and he had recently escaped from thence in the disguise of a peasant, to his country-seat near Saragossa.

At the commencement of his command, the neighbouring provinces of Navarre and Catalonia were in possession of the French. The passes of the Pyrenees, leading directly into Arragon, were open, and Murat, with the main body of the French forces, were stationed at Madrid. Thus surrounded by his enemy, General Palafox mustered the regular troops quartered at Saragossa, amounting to 220 men; and he found the public treasury of the province could not furnish him with more than 2,000 reals, a sum, in English money, equal to twenty pounds sixteen shillings and eight-pence. Animated, however, by the patriotism and the confidence reposed in him by his countrymen, he did not despair of the cause of his country. On the 31st of May, he published a proclamation, encouraging the Arragonese in their noble ardor, and declaring war against France. "Providence has preserved in Arragon a great quantity of muskets, ammunition, and artillery. The unmerited honor you have conferred on me, constrains me to draw aside the veil that covers the most detestable villany. My life, which can have no value in my sight but in as far as it may be subservient to your happiness and the prosperity of my dear country—my life is the least sacrifice I can make in return for those proofs of confidence and attachment with which you have honored me. Be assured, Arragonians,—doubt it not, that my heart is not made for harbouring a thought of crimes, nor associating with those who commit or protect them. Some of those persons in whom the Spanish nation placed confidence, some in whose hands are placed the powers of government, are among the foremost to labour for your ruin, by all the means that baseness can suggest; and to form traitorous connections with the enemy of their country. I will not, however, divulge their names. Perhaps some of the chiefs to whom I allude, now that they are acquainted with your fixed determination, that of your neighbours the Valentians, and of all the provinces of Spain, have changed their mind, embraced the cause of justice, and used their endeavours for shaking off that yoke which they wished to impose on you, by means the most base and infamous. Fear not, Arragonians! the troops of the enemy now in Spain cannot withstand our efforts. Let us defend the most just of causes, and we shall be invincible."

The declaration of war with which the proclamation concluded, was reduced to eight articles. The first made the Emperor of the French, all the individuals of his family, and all his generals, and officers, personally responsible for the safety of the king and that of his brother, and his uncle. By the second it was declared, that in case of any violence falling on those precious heads, the nation would exercise its right of election in favor of the Archdukes Charles, as the nephew of Charles III. in case of the Prince of Sicily, the infant Don Pedro, and other heirs, should be precluded by any circumstances of situation from the succession. This clause was disapproved by most of the other juntas, and particularly the junta of Seville. It was deemed more expedient, that the Spanish nation should avoid for the present all anticipations of contingent cases, and confine itself to measures indispensably necessary in the present juncture.

Early in the month of June, and before any

BOOK VIII. force could be organized for the defence of Arragon, a detachment of French of 8,000 infantry, and 900 cavalry, under the orders of the general of division Le Fevre, began to march from Pampeluna, against Saragossa. After a succession of skirmishes with the Arragonese, at Tudela, Mallen Gaul, and Alagon, the French advanced, June 14, within a very short distance of Saragossa, where they took up a position in the valley on the opposite side of the town to that side which was situate on the Ebro. This position was covered by rising ground planted with olive-trees. Having occupied this post, they deferred their general attack on the city till the next day: but a small detachment of cavalry that penetrated into the town, on the 14th of June, paid dearly for their rashness.

The Arragonese had hastily planted some cannon before the gates of their city, and also in some favorable positions without the town, particularly on a rising ground called the Torrero, and on the height near it. On the 15th of June, the French sent a detachment against the out-posts on the canal of Arragon, while their main body attempted to storm the city by the gate called Portillo. The Arragonese, attacked almost at the moment, both in out-posts and at the gates of their town, fought without order, but with extreme fury. They did not stop to load their muskets a second time, but as if regardless of their lives, rushed on the French columns as they advanced, with the bayonet and other hand weapons. Their artillery was served by any persons who chanced to be near it. Every one alternately commanded and obeyed; but all were animated by the same spirit: and their efforts, after a most severe conflict, were finally crowned with success. A party of the enemy that entered the town, were instantly put to death; and Le Fevre, convinced that it would be in vain to persevere in his attack, withdrew his troops to a position out of the reach of the Arragonese cannon. During this retreat, the Arragonese took 400 cavalry and twenty-seven baggage-waggons.

As soon as the French were thus repulsed, General Palafox set out from Saragossa, in order to collect reinforcements and provide resources for a siege, and also to place the rest of the kingdom in a state of defence, in case of the reduction of the capital. He found from twelve to fourteen hundred soldiers, who had escaped from Madrid, and he united with them a small division of militia stationed in Calatayud. With this force, in compliance with the earnest desires of his soldiers, he determined to attack the French. He marched immediately to Epila, with the intention to have advanced from thence to the village of La Muela; by which manœuvre he hoped to place the French between his little army and the city of Saragossa. This attempt, however, was frustrated, by a sudden attack on the part of the enemy in the night at Epila, when the Spaniards, after an obstinate but fruitless resistance, were at length compelled to yield to superior numbers and discipline. The wrecks of this small force retired from the scene of action to Calatayud, and afterwards with great difficulty threw themselves into Saragossa.

Meanwhile the French received reinforcements of troops and artillery from Pampeluna, and began to occupy the several military positions in the plain that surrounds Saragossa. But they were not allowed to carry on these operations unmolested. In a short time, however, the French had invested nearly one half of the town; and, on the 28th of June, they took possession of the Torrero. The battery on the neighbouring height also, which had been entrusted to an artillery officer, and 500 men, fell into their hands. The officer was declared a traitor to his country, for not having defended this important post as he ought to have done, and on his return into Saragossa, was immediately hanged. After the surrender of the Torrero the city could not communicate with the country on any other side than that of the Ebro.

During these operations of the enemy the Arragonese were busily employed in placing their town in the best possible state of defence that their slender resources would admit of. They tore down the awnings from their windows, and formed them into sacks, which they filled with sand, and piled up before every gate, in the form of a battery, digging round each of them a deep trench. They broke holes in the mud-walls, and intermediate buildings, for musketry, and here and there, where the position was commanding, placed cannon. The houses in the environs of the city were pulled down or burnt. Gardens and olive-grounds were cheerfully rooted up by the proprietors themselves, wherever they impeded the defence of the city, or covered the approach of the enemy. The exertions of the men were animated by women of every description, who formed themselves into parties for the relief of the wounded; and for carrying water and provisions to the batteries of the gates, while their children were employed in conveying cartridges made by the monks. Scarcely a day passed without a sanguinary contest between detachments of the French and Arragonese in the neighbouring olive woods. In the last two days of the month of June, 400 soldiers of the regiment of Estramadura, small parties from other corps, and a few artillerymen, contrived to reinforce Saragossa. To the artillerymen were added 200 of the militia of Logrono, who, roused by the presence of an enemy, soon learned the ordinary duties of the corps to which they belonged. Two pieces of cannon were procured from Lerida. The enemy drew his resources from Pampeluna, while the Arragonese, now completely surrounded, had not one single fortress to which they could have recourse, either for ammunition or for cannon.

About the last day of June, a powder-magazine in the heart of the city blew up, and in a moment nearly a whole street was reduced to a heap of ruins. The inhabitants had scarcely recovered from their consternation at this dreadful loss when the French, who had received mortars, howitzers, and cannon, opened a destructive fire upon the city. The sand-bag battery before the gate called Portillo, against which the attack of the enemy was principally directed, was gallantly defended. It was several times destroyed, and as often reconstructed under the fire of the enemy. Here an act of heroism was performed by a female, to which there is scarcely any thing equal in history. Augustina of Saragossa, about twenty-two years of age, a handsome young woman, of the lower class of the people, whilst performing her duty of carrying refreshment to the gates, arrived at the battery of the Portillo, at the very moment when the fire of the French had absolutely destroyed every person that was stationed on it. The citizens and soldiers, for the moment, hesitated to re-man the guns. Augustina, rushing forward over the wounded and slain, snatched a match from the hand of a dead artilleryman, and fired off a twenty-six pounder. Then, jumping upon the gun, she made a solemn vow never to quit it alive during the siege, and her fellow-citizens, stimulated by this daring act of intrepidity to fresh exertions, instantly rushed into the battery, and again opened a tremendous fire on the enemy. Attack was made after attack; Saragossa was more and more closely invested. Above the city the Ebro was fordable, and below it the French, in spite of the efforts of the Arragonese, had constructed a bridge. Having by these means transported their cavalry to the opposite bank of the river, they destroyed the mills which supplied the town with flour, levied contributions in the different villages, and thus cut off the only communication by which the besieged could receive any supplies either of provisions or ammunition. In this critical situation, the active and intelligent Captain-general of Arragon established, in various parts of the city, corn-mills worked by horses, and ordered the monks to be employed, under skilful directors, in manufacturing gunpowder. All the sulphur the place afforded was put into immediate requisition. The earth of the streets was carefully washed, in order to furnish saltpetre; and charcoal was made of the stalks of hemp, which in that part of Spain grows to a very unusual size.

On this simple foundation there was formed, afterwards, a regular manufactory of gunpowder at Saragossa, yielding thirteen arrobas of Castile, or 325 lbs. per day.

Towards the end of July, the large population of Saragossa was but scantily supplied with food, and had but little or no hope of succour. By the unremitted exertions of forty-six days, their spirits were exhausted, and their bodily strength impaired. A desperate effort was made to recover the important post of the Torrero, in vain: after which, the Arragonese, despairing of being able to make any sortie with effect, resolved to conquer or to perish within the walls of their city. During a bombardment on the 2d and 3d of August, a foundling hospital, which contained the sick and wounded, who from time to time had been conveyed there during the siege, unfortunately caught fire, and was rapidly consumed. All attention to private property was instantly abandoned. Every body was seen hastening to the relief of the sick and helpless children: in which act of humanity none were more conspicuous than the women, who persisted in their humane exertions, equally undaunted by the shot and shells of the enemy, and the flames of the building before them. On the 4th of August the French opened a tremendous battery on the quarter of the city called Santa Engracia. In an instant the mudwalls opposite to their batteries vanished; and the splendid convent of Santa Engracia was on fire and tottering in ruins. The French columns immediately rushed through this entrance into the city, took the batteries before the adjacent gates in reverse, and after a most sanguinary conflict, penetrating to the street Corso, nearly in the centre of the town, were in possession before the day closed of one half of Saragossa. The French general then demanded a capitulation in the following note—

“Head-quarters, Santa Engracia.”

“The Capitulation.”

The answer immediately returned was:—

“Head-quarters, Saragossa.”

“War to the Knife.”

“PALAFIX.”

In close combat the knife in the hands of the Spaniards is a very formidable weapon.

One side of the street Corso was now occupied by the French, in the centre of which General Verdier was seen giving his orders from the Franciscan convent. The Arragonese maintained their positions on the opposite side, throwing up batteries at the openings of the streets within a few paces of similar batteries of the French. The intervening space was soon heaped up with dead, either thrown from the windows of the houses in which they had been slain, or killed in the conflicts below. From this enormous accumulation of the dead, there was the utmost reason to apprehend a pestilence. To an Arragonese it was almost certain death to appear in the middle of the street. The expedient for preventing mortal contagion that occurred to General Palafox was, to push forward French prisoners, with a rope attached to them, amidst the dead and dying, to remove the bodies of their countrymen, and bring them for burial: an office in the execution of which, as it was beneficial to both parties, they were not in general annoyed. Something too is, no doubt, to be set down to the account of the sympathy of the French, with their unfortunate countrymen. By this means the evils arising from the horrible corruption of such masses of dead bodies, were in some degree diminished.

The principal season for attack in this singular species of warfare, from the opposite sides of the same street, of only a moderate breadth, was the night. The French and the Arragonese, under the cover of darkness, frequently dashed against each others batteries across the street. The struggle, begun at the batteries, was often carried into the houses beyond them.

On the 5th of August, when the French were expected to renew their efforts to obtain complete possession of the city, the Arragonese found their ammunition beginning to fail. The only cry that assailed the ears of the gallant general, as he rose amongst the people was, that if ammunition failed, they were ready to attack the enemy with only their knives. At this awful crisis, just before the fall of night, a convoy of provisions and ammunition, with a reinforcement of 3,000 men, composed of Spanish guards, Swiss, and volunteers of Arragon, unexpectedly made their entrance into the city, under the command of Don Francisco Palafox, the brother of the captain-general.

A council of war, held August 8, came to the following ever memorable resolutions: "That those quarters of the city in which the Arragonese yet maintained them, should continue to be defended with the same firmness that had hitherto been so conspicuous.—Should the enemy at last prevail, the people were to retire by the bridge over the Ebro, into the suburbs, and having destroyed the bridge, to defend the suburbs till they PERISHED." This resolution of the general and his officers, was received by the people with the loudest acclamations. The most sanguinary conflict had been continued from street to street, from house to house, and from room to room, for eleven days; when (the enraged populace always gaining ground by degrees on the disciplined troops of the French) the space occupied by the French was reduced to about one-eighth part of the city.

The spirit displayed by the men was seconded in the most admirable manner by the women of Saragossa. The Countess Burita, a lady of great rank in that country, formed a corps of women for the relief of the wounded, and for the purpose of carrying provisions and wine to the soldiers. Many persons, of the most unquestionable veracity in Saragossa, declared, that they had frequently seen this young, delicate, and beautiful woman coolly attending to the duties she had prescribed to herself, in the midst of the most tremendous fire of shot and shells; nor were they able to perceive, from the first moment that she entered on this glorious course, that the idea of personal danger could produce upon her the slightest effect, or bend her from her benevolent and patriotic purpose. The loss of women and boys during the siege was very great, and fully proportionate to that of the men. In fact, they were always the most forward; and the difficulty was to teach them a prudent and proper sense of their danger.

During the night of the 13th of August, the fire of the French was particularly destructive; and when their batteries ceased, flames were seen to burst out in many parts of the buildings in their possession. On the morning of the 14th, to the great surprize of the Arragonese, their columns were seen at a distance retreating over the plain on the road to Pampeluna. The retreating French were followed into Navarre by General Palafox, with a force composed of Arragonese and Valentians, who had begun their march for the relief of Saragossa, when the siege was raised.

The spirit of patriotism was also displayed, with great glory, and not altogether without success, in the neighbouring province of Catalonia. Duhesme, the French Governor of Catalonia, had been directed to reduce Gerona, at the same time that Lefebvre was sent against Saragossa.

Gerona, in this campaign, gave an earnest of that valor and patriotism which was found afterwards to equal those of Saragossa. Duhesme, after spending upwards of a fortnight in the siege of Gerona, into which he threw in one night four hundred bombs and grenades, was forced, by the vigorous sallies of the Geronese, and the movements of other Catalonians, who threatened to attack him in flank and rear, to retreat to Barcelona, leaving before Gerona some pieces of artillery, and a considerable quantity of provisions and ammunition. In his retreat he sustained a great loss both of men and baggage: in men, according to the Spanish accounts of the day, 3,000. For by this time the standard of liberty had been raised in every part of Catalonia; at Mauresa, Bruck, Mattaro, Martorell, Molinos del Rey, and other places. A great number of united Catalonian peasantry had fortified themselves with cannon, which they had found on the coast, on the river Llobregat.

Fresh reinforcements of peasants having poured down from the mountains into the plains, made themselves masters of Montgat, cut off the road between Montgat and another small fort at Moncado, which they beset, securing themselves with entrenchments. The number of the patriots in arms, still rallying after defeat, and increased by the junction of one party after another, was on the whole rather increased than diminished; inasmuch that they made an attempt to cut off the communications of Figueras, and, by forming a cordon, to invest and cut off the supplies of Barcelona: against which they opened some batteries; but they were driven back, and a communication was preserved between the French garrisons in the fortresses and the country. Another body of peasantry, besides that which had already fortified themselves on the Llobregat, had recently formed themselves behind that river; which, by the melting of the snows, that had been for some days falling in the mountains, had swelled considerably. They had erected, at Molinos del Rey, a battery of three guns, which ranged the bridge that had been broken down in several places. All the fords of the river were beset down to the mouth of it. Two flying field-pieces hovered on the line of the insurgents.

On the 30th of June, in the morning, the French, under the orders of General Goullès, and Brigadier-general Bessières, marched from Barcelona, against the main strength of the insurgents, which rested on the right bank of the Llobregat. Proceeding to the mouth of the river, they forced the passage, and pushing up the right bank, took several Catalanian posts in the rear. Undisciplined, without a commander of any authority, or none that could inspire confidence; and surprised, perhaps withal, by this manœuvre, though it might have been expected, the peasants submitted to the French without much resistance. At the same time General Leckie, with a division of French, 1,500 strong, assailed and took possession of the bridge of Molinos del Rey, with the three pieces that guarded the passage-way; but not without a well-fought battle, in which the loss of the French was computed to be equal to that of the Spaniards. On the side of Figueras, General Reible proceeded thither from Bellegarde against the insurgents, on the 5th of July. The insurgents being worsted in a smart action, and dispersed, he threw provisions into the place, and a reinforcement into the garrison.

General Duhesme, in revenge for his repulse from Gerona, burnt many houses in the towns and villages by which he passed, took many prisoners, some of whom he killed in cold blood, and laid waste the whole plain or district within the jurisdiction of the city of Barcelona; all the cultivated fields, villages, convents, and churches.

During these operations the junta of Catalonia had established themselves at Lerida, for the convenience of communication with Arragon and Valentia.

When General Duhesme returned to Barcelona, he found his two forts in great want of both powder and provisions. During his absence about a month from Barcelona, it had been cut off from a free intercourse with the neighbouring country: and a vessel loaded with powder for their use, and another with salted pork, had been taken by the English. Duhesme, who had already acquired the cognomen of the cruel, pointed the cannon of the citadel against the unfortunate inhabitants, threatening them with death if they did not furnish him with 12,000 rations of provisions daily, and an excessive number of pipes of wine and brandy. Under the pretence of charges or suspicions of an intention to rebel against the Emperor Napoleon, he was in the habit of carrying away, from time to time, the most respectable persons in Barcelona, separating husbands from their wives, and parents from their children, for the purpose of extorting ransoms for their liberation.

In the meantime the affairs of the patriots in the north of Spain wore but an unfavorable aspect, and a battle was fought at Medina del Rio Seco, in the province of Leon, which turned the tide of fortune, and might have exceedingly damped, if not altogether quashed the insurrection, if this advantage on the side of the French had not been counterbalanced by the events in the south and the east just related.

Marshal Bessières, at the same time that he sent a force against Saragossa, pushed forward columns for the reduction of Logrono, Segovia, Valladolid, and St. Andero. All these objects were easily accomplished. The raw and undisciplined levies of patriots did not long sustain a conflict with the impetuous and well-directed exertions of the veteran and victorious French; but consulted their safety by flight, for the most part throwing down their arms. On the 7th of June, General Frere, having arrived with his column within a quarter of a mile of Segovia, sent an officer to the magistrates demanding a parley.

The insurgents, 5,000 strong, with thirty cannons, would not suffer the messenger to approach, but fired on him with cannon. On this the place was taken by force; the resistance here was not inconsiderable; a great number of wounded and others fell into the hands of the French, with all their cannon. The city of Segovia, after the defeat and flight of the armed peasants, made its submissions in the manner required by the French general. When General La Salle, June

BOOK VIII. was approaching Palentia, a deputation, with the bishop at their head, brought the submission of the town. The town and province of Palentia were disarmed. On the 12th of June, General La Salle advanced to Duennas, where he formed a junction with General Merle, and from whence he continued his march to Valladolid where the spirit of insurrection had grown very strong, and which was a great rendezvous of the patriots. General Cuesta, with 7,000 men and six pieces of artillery, had taken post at Cabezon, a small town on the Pisuerga, about nine miles to the north of Valladolid. General Sabathier was ordered to force the position, which had been reconnoitred, of the insurgents, whilst General Merle was directed to cut off his retreat to Valladolid. The firing, according to the French accounts, lasted but half an hour, when the insurgents were completely beaten, scattered in every direction on the field-of-battle, leaving their artillery, 4,000 muskets, and about 1,000 killed.

The gazette of Madrid, that is, the French gazette, stated, that 5 or 600 French beat 14 or 15,000 rebels. The gazette of Oviedo, on the contrary, said, that the number of the French and Spaniards in this engagement was nearly equal; but that the French had the advantage of a more numerous artillery, while the patriots had only four cannon; yet that, in spite of this disadvantage on the part of the Spaniards, the French had left 700 dead on the field-of-battle, from whence they carried off their wounded.

The Bishop of Valladolid, with the principal clergy of the city, came to meet General La Salle, supplicating forgiveness to the city and its inhabitants, which was readily granted. The city and province of Valladolid were disarmed. Ten members of the council of Placentia, Segovia, and Valladolid, were deputed to go to his Catholic majesty (Joseph Bonaparte) at Bayonne, there to supplicate his forgiveness, in the act of tendering their own fealty, and that of their fellow-citizens.

General Merle proceeded to the mountains of St. Andero: on the morning of the 21st of June, he fell upon the insurgent patriots, headed by the bishop, drove them from all their positions, and took from them two eighteen-pounders, which, loaded with grape-shot, they had fired only twice. In other parts of the mountainous district, parties of the insurgents were driven from post to post into St. Andero, by General Ducos. On the 23d, the Generals Merle and Ducos entered St. Andero, on different sides of the town. The peasants every where returned to their homes. The city of St. Andero having made its submission, like Segovia, Palentia, and Valladolid, was obliged to swear fealty to the usurper. Thus quietness was restored for the present to Navarre, Guipuscoa, and Biscay.

A great number of patriots had been assembling, for some time, at Benevento, under the standard of General Cuesta. In this number were comprehended all the Spanish prisoners who had been sent back to Spain by the British government. With this force, General Cuesta marched on to Valladolid, with the design of cutting off the communication between the French in the northern provinces of Spain, and those in Madrid. It was his plan, having reduced Valladolid, to advance to Burgos. The force under Cuesta was stated by the French gazette to have amounted to not less than 35,000. Marshal Bessieres, aware of the design of the Spaniards, and sensible of the importance of maintaining the post at Valladolid, advanced to meet them with a force, amounting in all to 12,000, of which 2,000 were cavalry, with a proportionate train of artillery. On the 14th of July, at break of day, he came in sight of the enemy, who occupied a large extent of ground on the heights of Medina del Rio Seco. Bessieres attacked them on the right. At the same time General Monton, at the head of another division, made himself master of the town of Medina del Rio Seco, with fixed bayonets. All the positions of the Spaniards were carried; they fled in great confusion; and they lost all their artillery, consisting of forty pieces of cannon. Six thousand were made prisoners, according to the French accounts, and more than 12,000 left on the field-of-battle. All their baggage and military stores fell into the hands of the French. The Spaniards fled first to Benevento, from whence, after a short halt, they continued their retreat to Labenara, Leon, and Astorga. They were pursued by Marshal Bessieres, who, at Benevento, July 19, found an immense quantity of arms and ammunition. Here he received a letter of submission from the inhabitants of Zamora, and on the following day, the 20th, he entered that town, from whence he proceeded to Majorga. At Majorga he received a deputation from Leon; which city he entered on the 26th. The bishop came two miles to meet him, and the council, appearing before the gates of the city, presented the keys, in token of submission.

According to certain accounts in the Spanish newspapers of the day, the Spanish army did not exceed 14 or 15,000 infantry, and 800 cavalry. The Spaniards, it was stated, were in the first onset so fortunate as to beat back the French, and take and spike four pieces of cannon. But the field-of-battle being in a vast plain, the patriots, who were carried by their impetuosity out of their ranks, without a sufficient number of horsemen to make head against the French cavalry, and unaccustomed to any such prompt evolutions as might have supplied that deficiency, were obliged to leave the field-of-battle to the French, with thirteen of their cannon: though it was said they retreated in good order, and afterwards rallied.

The kind of order observed, is sufficiently illustrated by the rapidity of their retreat, and the distance to which they retreated. On the other hand that their disasters were not so great as had been given out by the French, and that reinforcements were advancing to join General Cuesta, rendered extremely probable by the retreat or flight of King Joseph Bonaparte, on the 27th of July, from Madrid.

After intelligence was received of the surrender of Dupont at Baylen, and the discovery that so many of the ministers of Joseph had made their escape from Madrid, the French immediately began to fortify the Reteiro. Duhesme had been repulsed from Gerona; Arragossa still held out; armies from Valencia and Andalusia menaced the capital. The army of the western provinces, under General Cuesta, though routed and dispersed by the battle of Medina del Rio Seco, manifested a determination to rally. The French, therefore, in the evening of the 29th of July, began to evacuate Madrid. King Joseph, with the last companies of the troops, left Madrid on the twenty-ninth, and took the route of Segovia, from whence he proceeded to Burgos, the rendezvous of the whole of his army at and in the vicinity of Madrid. The French carried along with them all the artillery and ammunition for which they could find means of conveying; spiking the cannon, and destroying the ammunition they were obliged to leave behind them.—They plundered the public treasury, and carried off all the jewels belonging to the crown, and all the plate, and whatever was most valuable in the palaces belonging to Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII. or to any of the branches of the royal family. On which it was merrily observed, and became a common saying among the Spaniards, that, “Because Joseph could not put the crown on his head, he had put it in his pocket.”

The French army was accompanied or followed by such of the Spaniards as had accepted offices under the government of King Joseph, and most of the French established in various situations in Madrid.

Conduct of Bonaparte.—False Reports.—The Marquis de la Romana recovered to the Service of his Country by a Swedish Clergyman.—Liberation of the Spanish Troops in the North of Germany.—The Flight of King Joseph—Reported to be for the Benefit of his Health.—Military Preparations of Austria.—Alarm of Bonaparte.—His printed Address to his Soldiers.—Insurrection in Portugal.—British Expedition there under the Orders of Sir Arthur Wellesley.—Action of Lourinha.—Action of Roleia.—Battle of Vimeira.—Convention of Cintra.—Meeting of the Emperors Alexander and Napoleon at Erfurth.—Artful Policy of the Latter.—Offer of a Negotiation, on the Part of France and Russia, for Peace with England, rejected.—Establishments of a Central Junta in Spain.—A Series of Engagements.—Successive Defeats of the Spaniards.—Battle of Tudela.—Surrender of Madrid through Treachery.—Brief Retrospect of the Affairs of the Northern Powers.

It has been already intimated that the insurrection in Spain was treated by Bonaparte with affected contempt. He was at uncommon pains to conceal the real state of affairs both from the French and the Germans. He gave out, in his newspapers, that all that was most respectable in the Spanish nation was devoted, and that even zealously, to the new dynasty and order of affairs in Spain, and that it was only the mere rabble of day-labourers, peasants, and low tradesmen, under the direction of the monks, whoin he represented as fanatical and ignorant to a degree much beyond the blind superstition of the monks in France and Italy, among whom were sometimes found men of learning and talents. The monks of Spain he (that is, his literary emissaries, in conformity to his will and obedience to his directions) described as clownish and uncouth in their personal appearance, and bearing an exact likeness to so many butchers. All this was only an acknowledgment of what he apprehended from the zeal and exertions of that religious body. While he laboured to persuade the French, and particularly the Spaniards at a distance from BOOK VIII. home, that the most respectable part of the Spanish nation was sincerely attached to King Joseph, he used means also for impressing the inhabitants of Spain with the belief that their countrymen, that had been drawn into the French service, were also devoted to him. It was published in the Paris newspapers, August 12, as an article from Hamburgh, that the Spanish troops, under the Marquis of Romana, had come forward of their own accord, and with great zeal, to swear allegiance, and had proffered a detachment, from their corps of picked men, to form a guard of honor for King Joseph.

The Marquis de la Romana was kept in profound ignorance of the glorious events that had taken place in his country, and various attempts had been made, on the part of the British government, to communicate the tidings to him, and to devise means for his escape with the troops under his command, without effect.—At length a Swedish clergyman was found, in whose honor, good sense, and enterprising disposition, the firmest confidence could be placed. This gentleman, disguised as a low and travelling tradesman, went by the way of Heligoland, and having overcome many obstacles with the utmost patience, prudence, and fortitude, at length arrived at the place where the marquis and his troops were stationed. Having ascertained the person of the marquis, he was obliged to watch incessantly for an opportunity of addressing him, without exciting the suspicion of the numerous spies by whom he was surrounded. The venerable agent at last was obliged, as if by accident, to jostle the marquis in the street, in order to attract his attention. Having done so, he apologized, as if ignorant of the person whom he addressed, and concluded with offering to sell him some excellent coffee. The marquis treated this offer with contempt, and signified that he supposed he was speaking to a smuggler. The minister of the gospel, however, persevered in recommending his coffee, and, in the course of the conversation, found means to intimate that he was not a smuggler but a gentleman.—“We'll soon see that,” said the marquis, and then asked him if he could speak Latin. The minister answered in the affirmative, and a conversation ensued, apparently about coffee, as the gestures of both were calculated to deceive all who might observe them. The marquis was then duly informed of every thing that had occurred in Spain, of the assistance the British government had rendered, and of the readiness of his Britannic majesty to adopt any measure that might be thought practicable for effecting the rescue of himself and his troops, that they might join their heroic countrymen in resisting the base attempts of France to enslave them.

As soon as this gallant corps heard of the forced abdication and captivity of the royal family, and particularly of the patriotic struggle in Spain, they burned with ardor to join the ranks of their countrymen. Though surrounded by hostile battalions, they planted their colours in the centre of a circle which they formed, and swore, on their knees, to be faithful to their country.

By a well-combined plan, concerted between Keats, the British admiral in the Baltic, and Romana, 10,000 of the Spanish troops stationed in Funen, Langland, Zealand, and Jutland, emancipated themselves from the French yoke, and, under the protection of the British fleet, were conveyed, with their stores, arms, and artillery, to Spain, where they landed at Corunna on the 30th of September. The Marquis of Romana himself returned home by the way of London, where he arrived on the 16th of September, for the purpose of having a conference with the British ministry, and British military officers. But one Spanish regiment, near 2,000 strong, in Jutland, was too distant, and too critically situated, to effect its escape. And two in Zealand, after firing on the French General Frision, who commanded them, and killing one of his aid-de-camps by his side, were disarmed. While Frision was in the act of haranguing these troops, for the purpose of engaging them to declare for King Joseph, one of the soldiers, burning with indignation, and regardless of consequences, stepped forth from the ranks, and fired a pistol at him, which, missing the general, killed the aid-de-camp.

When the real state of affairs in Spain became manifest to all Europe, by the flight of King Joseph from Madrid, and the concentration of the French forces on the defiles of Biscay, and on the Ebro, Bonaparte's sarcasms against the insurgents, and his misrepresentations of facts, were interrupted for a long time, as well as his military operations. Not a word was said of Spain. Even the Moniteur was silent. The world entertained great curiosity to know what face would be put on the flight of Joseph, and the inactivity of the French in Spain. It was given out by the French government at Madrid, that the king found it necessary to retire for a time from that city, for the benefit of his health; which was every where made a subject of ridicule. But nothing at all was said on the matter in the newspapers of France, Italy, or Germany. It was evident to Bonaparte, that the Spanish insurrection was of too serious and formidable a nature to be treated lightly in respect of either words or actions. It was manifestly not to be crushed but by a very large force, and a larger one too than any he could march against it, if the Germans should avail themselves of so inviting an occasion to throw off his yoke; and, above all, if the Emperor of Russia should swerve from the treaty of Tilsit.

The Austrians had been employed, for the last three years, in bringing their finances into order, and in strengthening their frontier, forming magazines, and increasing their armies, far beyond what was at all necessary for the preservation of internal tranquillity, and apparently with a view not to mere defence, but to aggression. This did not escape the observation, or fail to excite the suspicions, of the French government. A long correspondence ensued on the subject, which was afterwards published, between Count Metternich, the Austrian ambassador at Paris, and Campagny, the French minister of external relations. The French minister, on the part of his master, after calling to mind the moderation of the conqueror in the battle of Austerlitz, asked the Austrians what they feared from France, or of what they had to complain. If certain posts, still occupied by the French in Silesia, or in any other part towards the frontiers of Austria, had given umbrage, or caused any apprehension, they should be immediately evacuated.

An uncommon degree of earnestness on the part of Bonaparte to persuade the court of Vienna that he did not entertain any hostile designs against Austria, was apparent throughout the whole of this correspondence. "It is not," said Bonaparte, "any part of my political system, to destroy, or even to humble the House of Austria;" and in this he was sincere. It could not have been any part of his policy to annihilate a barrier so convenient and necessary against the power of the Russians, growing every day, by the natural progress of population and improvement, in so vast an empire, greater and greater. The Austrian minister, on the part of his court, disclaimed all hostile designs against France, and explained the increase of the military force complained of, by the general necessity that all the powers of Europe now felt themselves to be under, of proportioning the scale of their standing armies to that of their neighbours.

The Austrians persevered in their military preparations. Orders were transmitted from Paris to the members of the confederation of the Rhine, to call out their respective quotas, which when assembled, would be very powerful. Of the German troops of this confederation, 80,000 were taken into the pay of France, clothed in the uniform of French soldiers, and sent into France to garrison the towns quitted by French regiments sent to reinforce the French army in Spain. In this manœuvre it was Bonaparte's object to render it impossible for the German princes to revolt from him to Austria, while at the same time he stationed a force in France better for some of his purposes, such as that of enforcing the conscription, than that which it replaced; in as much as BOOK VIII. Germans would not be so likely as the French regiments to sympathise and coalesce with the people. But whatever might be the inclinations, or the attempts of the Germans, they were not to be considered as formidable, if the Emperor of the North, as Bonaparte had affected to style him, should abide by his engagements. Alexander, at this moment, held in his hand the balance of Europe, the fate of many nations, their condition, whether as independent states, or as submissive provinces of a great and domineering empire, probably for many centuries! Into whichever of the scales the Czar should throw his weight, that must inevitably preponderate. To confirm and fix the resolution of Alexander was a matter of the last importance, and what Bonaparte did not think it prudent to commit to the agency of any of his ministers. He determined to have a personal interview with the Emperor of the North; on whose mind it would appear he was perfectly confident he should maintain an ascendancy. For, on the 11th of September, he addressed, in print, his soldiers as follows: "Soldiers, after triumphing on the borders of the Danube, and the Vistula, you traversed Germany, by forced marches; you are now, with the same celerity, to traverse France.

"Soldiers, I declare that I have need of you. The hideous leopard contaminates, by its presence, the territory of Spain and Portugal. Let your faces strike him with terror, and put him to flight; let us carry our victorious eagles even to the pillars of Hercules. There we have an affront to revenge.

"Soldiers, you have surpassed in renown all the warriors of modern times. You have equalled the Roman legions, who, in one campaign, triumphed on the Rhine, the Euphrates, Illyrium, and the Tagus. A durable peace and permanent prosperity shall be the reward of your exploits. No good Frenchman can enjoy a moment's repose, so long as the sea is not free and open.

"Soldiers, all that you have already achieved, or that remains yet to be done is for the happiness of the French people, and for MY glory.—Be assured, that the remembrance of so great services shall remain for ever engraven on my heart."

The inhabitants of Lisbon, overawed by the army of Junot, were restrained at first from expressing their joy at the patriotic efforts of their allies, otherwise than in private and confidential conversation. The public voice of Portugal was first heard at Oporto. This town, besides the circumstance of being situate at a considerable distance from the force under Junot, possessed another advantage. It had been occupied by about 3,000 Spanish troops, who, before their departure to join the patriotic standard in Spain, took the French general under whose orders they were, and all his staff, prisoners, and delivered up the government of the city to Lewis D'Oliveira, who had filled that office before the arrival of the French. The treachery of this man, his attachment to the French, and the measures he took for restoring the authority of the French, roused the indignation and rage of the people to such a pitch, that he found it impossible to avert their threatened vengeance otherwise than by yielding up his authority. They rose, on the 18th of June, in one body, broke open the depôts of stores, and having supplied themselves with arms, proceeded to destroy every vestige of French power, and to imprison every person suspected of being in their interest. The Bishop of Oporto, who, with most of the other priests, had been incessant in his efforts to rouse the people to arms, was appointed governor of the city, and the most vigorous measures were adopted for defending it against any force.

General Loison, with about 3,000 men, advanced against the insurgents as far as Amiranço; but on being made acquainted with the determined spirit of the people of Oporto, he retreated on Lisbon. Nearly the whole of the northern provinces of Portugal rose in arms against the French. The south of Portugal was restrained from coming forward so generally, or in so open a manner, by their vicinity to the army of Junot, and also by a strong and numerous French party among themselves. Notwithstanding the terror, however, of Junot, a friendly intercourse, as mentioned in a preceding chapter, was maintained between Lisbon and Sir Charles Cotton.

As soon as Junot received certain intelligence of the Spanish insurrection, he ordered the Spanish troops to be disarmed and put on board the hulks in the Tagus.

The French being expelled from the northern provinces of Portugal, and the authority of the prince-regent re-established, provisional juntas were formed, similar in their character and functions to those of Spain. Of these, that of Oporto exerted itself with the most zeal and effect, in heightening and directing the patriotic enthusiasm of the people, and in the establishment of such orders and regulations as were required by the peculiar circumstances of the country. Oporto, in this respect, was the Seville of Portugal. The junta having taken such measures for raising and supporting an army as circumstances admitted, naturally looked for support and assistance to England; nor were their hopes disappointed. An army, under the command of Sir Arthur Wellesley, (afterwards Duke of Wellington,) destined for Portugal, where it ultimately landed, was, in the first instance, offered to the Spaniards. This army, consisting of about 10,000 men, set sail from Cork on the 12th of July, and arrived at Corunna on the 20th. The battle of Medina del Rio Seco had taken place a few days before, and the Spaniards were retreating fast in different directions: one division of them adhering to Cuesta, proceeded to Salamanca; another, under General Blake, made for the mountains. In consequence of this intelligence, combined with his instructions, Sir Arthur Wellesley offered the assistance of the force under his command to the junta of Galicia. The junta replied, that they did not want men, and that they wished for nothing from the British government except money, arms, and ammunition. But they expressed their firm conviction that his army might be of infinite service both to the Portuguese, and their own nation, if it were employed to drive the French from Lisbon. In the north of Portugal, and consequently at no great distance from Galicia, the French were still in force.

Sir Arthur Wellesley leaving Corunna, proceeded to Oporto. On his arrival there, the bishop, who was the governor, informed him that the Portuguese force was sufficient to deter the French from making any attacks, or if not, to repel them. Sir Arthur, however, that he might be the better enabled to judge what was best to be done, left his forces at Oporto, in order to have a conference with Charles Cotton, off Lisbon; with whom he consulted about the practicability and the prudence of forcing the entrance of the Tagus, and attacking the forts in the near vicinity of that capital. In the mean time, while he was on board the Hibernia, the admiral's ship, he received a letter from General Spencer, who was then, with about 6,000 men, off Cadiz. This force was destined to be employed either in co-operating with the Spanish forces under Castanos, in their operations against Dupont, or in conjunction with the expedition under Sir Arthur Wellesley. As the junta of Seville did not deem the aid of General Spencer's corps at all necessary towards the reduction of Dupont's army, and as Sir Arthur was decidedly of opinion that his own army, and that of General Spencer, could be but of little avail towards the expulsion of the French from Portugal, while they acted separately, he gave orders to General Spencer to join him.

The English general, having made himself acquainted, as accurately as he could, with the numerical strength and disposition of the French army, determined to land his forces in Mondego bay, where he would be able to effect a landing, and to form his army into order, without any opposition from the enemy; while, at the same time, he would be assisted and supported by the Portuguese army which had advanced to Coimbra. Before he landed the troops he received advice from the British government that 5,000 men, under General Anstruther, were proceeding to join him, and that 12,000 more, under Sir John Moore, would speedily be dispatched for the same purpose. He was also informed of the surrender of Dupont, and that the army of Junot was considerably weakened by the necessity of sending about 6,000 men, under General Loison, to quell an insurrection that had broken out in the south of Portugal. This information induced Sir Arthur to disembark his troops without delay. Soon after the disembarkation was effected, the corps under General Spencer also landed: and, on the 9th of August, the advanced guard marched forward on the road to Lisbon. On the 12th the army reached Leyria. On the 15th the advanced guard came up with a party of the French at Obidos, where a slight action took place, called the action of Lourinha, occasioned principally by the eagerness of the British to attack and pursue the enemy. On the 16th the army halted, and on the next day the general came to the determination of attacking the French under General Laborde at Roleia.

Roleia is situated on an eminence, having a plain in its front, at the end of a valley which commences at Caldas, and is closed to the southwards by mountains which come in contact with the hills forming the valley on the left. In the centre of the valley, and about eight miles from Roleia, is the town and old Moorish fort of Obidos, from whence the enemy's piquets had been driven on the 15th. From that time the French had posts in the hills on both sides of the valley, as well as in the plain in front of the main army, which was posted on the heights opposite to Roleia; its right resting upon the hills; its left, on which was a windmill, and the whole covering four or five passes into the mountains on their rear. Their force amounted to about 6,000, of which about 500 were cavalry, with five pieces of cannon: and there was some reason to believe that General Loison, who was at Rio-Major on the 16th, would join General Laborde by his right in the course of the night. The plan of attack was formed accordingly, and the army breaking up from Caldas on the 17th, was formed into three columns; the right destined to turn the enemy's left, and penetrate into the mountains in his rear; the left to ascend the hills at Obidos, to turn all the posts on the left of the valley, and also watch the motions of General Loison; the centre column to attack General Laborde's position in front. The enemy was defeated, but retreated in good order. By this victory the road was cleared to Lisbon. On the day after the battle the British army moved to Lourinha, to protect the landing and facilitate the junction of the troops under General Anstruther; and on the 21st they resumed their march.

General Junot, having been informed of the large reinforcement expected, under the command of Sir John Moore, determined to attack the British army before the reinforcement should arrive. For this purpose he left Lisbon with nearly the whole of the forces under his command, and came up with Sir Arthur on the morning of the 21st of August. A hard-fought battle ensued. The French, with fixed bayonets, attacked the British with their usual impetuosity. They were driven back by our troops with the bayonet. They renewed their attacks, in different columns, again and again, and were as often driven back with cooler intrepidity and greater strength of arm. At last they fled from the charge. In this battle the French lost thirteen pieces of cannon, twenty-three ammunition-waggons, and about 3,000 in killed, wounded, and missing. One general officer was wounded and taken prisoner, and another was killed. The loss of the English, in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to nearly a thousand.

The position of the British army was at Vimeira, a village which stands in a valley through which runs the river Maceira; at the back, and to the westward and northward of this village, is a mountain, the western point of which touches the sea, and the eastern is separated by a deep ravine from the heights over which passes the road which leads from Lourinha and the northward to Vimeira. The greater part of the infantry, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 8th brigades, were posted on this mountain, with eight pieces of artillery; Major-general Hill's brigade being on the right, Major-general Ferguson's on the left, having one battalion on the heights, separated from the mountain. On the eastern and southern side of the town is a hill which is entirely commanded, particularly on its right, by the mountain to the westward of the town, and commanding all the ground in the neighbourhood to the southward and eastward, on which Brigadier-general Fane was posted with his riflemen and the 50th regiment, and Brigadier-general Anstruther with his brigade, with half a brigade of six-pounders and half a brigade of nine-pounders, which had been ordered to the position in the course of the preceding night. The ground over which passes the road from Lourinha commanded the left of this height, and it had not been occupied, excepting by a piquet, as the camp had been taken up only for one night; and there was no water in the neighbourhood of this height. The cavalry and the reserve of artillery were in the valley between the hills on which the infantry stood, both flanking and supporting Brigadier-general Fane's advanced guard.

The French first appeared at eight o'clock in the morning, in large bodies of cavalry, on the left of the English, upon the heights of the road to Lourinha; and it was soon obvious that the attack would be made upon their advanced guard, and the left of their position; and Major-general

Ferguson's brigade was immediately moved across the ravine to the heights, on the road to Lourinha, with three pieces of cannon: he was followed successively by Brigadier-general Nightingale with his brigade, and three pieces of cannon; Brigadier-general Ackland with his brigade, and Brigadier-general Bowes with his brigade. These troops were formed (Major-general Ferguson's brigade in the first line; Brigadier-general Nightingale's in the second; and Brigadier-general Bowes' and Ackland's, in columns in the rear) on those heights, with their right upon the valley which leads into Vimeira, and their left upon the other ravine, which separates these heights from the range which terminates at the landing place at Maceira. On these last mentioned heights, the Portuguese troops which had been in the bottom near Vimeira, were posted in the first instance, and they were supported by Brigadier-general Craufurd's brigade.

The troops of the advanced guard on the height to the southward and eastward of the town were deemed sufficient for its defence, and Major-general Hill was moved to the centre of the mountain on which the great body of infantry had been posted, as a support to these troops, and as a reserve to the whole army. In addition to this support, these troops had that of the cavalry in the rear of their right.

The enemy's attack began in several columns upon the whole of the troops on this height: on the left they advanced, notwithstanding the fire of the riflemen, close to the 50th regiment, and were checked and driven back only by the bayonets of the corps. The 2d battalion, 43d regiment, was likewise closely engaged with them in the road which leads into Vimeira; a part of that corps having been ordered into the church-yard to prevent them from penetrating into the town. On the right of the position, they were repulsed by the bayonets of the 97th regiment, which corps was successively supported by the 2d battalion 52d regiment, which, by an advance in column, took the enemy in flank.

Besides this opposition given to the attack of the enemy on the advanced guard by their own exertions, they were attacked in flank by Brigadier-general Ackland's brigade, in its advance to its position on the heights on the left, and a cannonade was kept up on the flank of the enemy's columns by the artillery on those heights.

At length, after a most desperate contest, the enemy was driven back in confusion from this attack, with the loss of seven pieces of cannon, many prisoners, and a great number of officers and soldiers killed and wounded. He was pursued by the detachment of the 20th light-dragoons; but the enemy's cavalry were so much superior in numbers, that this detachment suffered much, and

Lieutenant-colonel Taylor was unfortunately killed.

Nearly at the same time the enemy's attack commenced upon the heights, on the road to Lourinha. This attack was supported by a large body of cavalry, and was made with the usual impetuosity of French troops. It was received with steadiness by Major-general Ferguson's brigade, consisting of the 36th, 40th, and 71st regiments; and these corps charged as soon as the enemy approached them, who gave way, and they continued to advance upon him supported by the 82d, one of the corps of Brigadier-general Nightingale's brigade, which, as the ground extended, afterwards formed a part of the first line; by the 29th regiment, and by Brigadier-general Bowes's and Ackland's brigades, while Brigadier-general Craufurd's brigade, and the Portuguese troops, in two lines, advanced along the height on the left. In the advance of Major-general Ferguson's brigade, six pieces of cannon were taken from the enemy, with many prisoners, and vast numbers were killed and wounded.

The enemy afterwards made an attempt to recover a part of his artillery by attacking the 71st and 82d regiments, which were halted in a valley in which it had been taken. These regiments retired from the low grounds in the valley to the heights, where they halted, faced about, fired, and advanced upon the enemy, who had by that time arrived in the low ground, and they thus obliged him to retire with great loss.

In this action, in which the whole of the French force in Portugal was employed, under the command of the Duke D'Abrantes in person, in which the enemy was certainly superior in cavalry and artillery, and in which not more than half of the British army was actually engaged, he sustained a signal defeat, and lost thirteen pieces of cannon, twenty-three ammunition-waggons, with powder, shells, stores of all descriptions, and 20,000 rounds of musket-ammunition. One general officer (Berniere) was wounded and taken prisoner, and a great many officers and soldiers were killed wounded, and taken.

The loss of the British army in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to nearly 1000.

After the dispositions for the battle of Vimeira had been made, Sir H. Burrard arrived at the scene of action, but declined to take upon himself the command of the army. On the 22d, Sir Hew Dalrymple, who had been called from his situation of Lieutenant-governor of Gibraltar, to take the command of all the different corps sent by the British government into Portugal, reached Cintra, the place to which the British army had moved after the battle. Within a very few hours after his arrival, a flag of truce came in from Junot, proposing a cessation of hostilities, in order that a convention might be settled, by which the French should evacuate Portugal.

By this convention, signed at Cintra, it was, among other stipulations, agreed on, "That the English government should be at the expense of transporting the whole of the French army to any of the ports between Rochfort and L'Orient. When the army arrived in France, it was to be at liberty to serve again immediately. All the property of the army, as well as the personal property of the individuals of the army, was to be sacred and untouched. It might either be carried off into France or sold in Portugal. In the latter case full security was to be given by the British to the purchasers, that the property they had would not be taken from them, nor they themselves molested on account of the purchase."

This convention was founded on the basis of an armistice agreed upon between Sir Arthur Wellesley and General Kellerman on the day after the battle of Vimeira. But the seventh article of that preliminary treaty, stipulating that the Russian fleet should be allowed either to remain in the Tagus unmolested as long as it thought proper, or to return home, was afterwards rejected by Sir Charles Cotton; between whom and the Russian admiral, Siniavian, a convention was agreed to for the surrender of the Russian fleet to the British fleet, on the 3d of September.

While some defended this convention on account of the danger of suffering a powerful enemy to retreat, whom despair might reinforce, others deprecated it as unworthy of the British nation. A board of enquiry was held upon the occasion, and the following declaration of his majesty's disapprobation of both the armistice and the convention was officially communicated to Sir Hew Dalrymple.

"The King has taken into his consideration the report of the board of enquiry, together with the documents and opinions thereunto annexed. While his majesty adopts the unanimous opinion of the board, that no farther military proceeding is necessary to be had upon the transactions referred to their investigation, his majesty does not intend thereby to convey any expression of his majesty's satisfaction at the terms and conditions of the armistice and convention.

"When those instruments were first laid before his majesty, the king, reserving for investigation those parts of the definitive convention, in which his majesty's immediate interests were concerned, caused it to be signified to Sir Hew Dalrymple, by his majesty's secretary of state, that his majesty, nevertheless, felt himself compelled at once to express his disapprobation of those articles, in which stipulations were made, directly affecting the interests or feelings of the Spanish and Portuguese nations.

"At the close of the enquiry, the king, abstaining from any observations upon any other parts of the convention, repeats his disapprobation of those articles; his majesty deeming it necessary that his sentiments should be clearly understood, as to the impropriety and danger of the unauthorized admission, into military conventions of articles of such a description, which, especially when incautiously framed, may lead to the most injurious consequences.

"His majesty cannot forbear farther to observe, that Lieutenant-general Sir Hew Dalrymple's delaying to transmit for his information the armistice concluded on 22d August, until the 4th September, when he, at the same time, transmitted the ratified convention, was calculated to produce great public inconvenience, and that such inconvenience did in fact result therefrom."

As the defeat of Junot and the deliverance of Portugal were only mediate, and not the ultimate objects of the British army, it marched from Lisbon, but not till the 27th of October, nearly two months after the convention of Cintra, under the command of General Sir John Moore, to the assistance of the Spanish patriots. The general's instructions were, to march through Spain with his face towards Burgos; which was to be the general rendezvous of the British troops: not only of those now under the command of that officer, but of those with which he was to be reinforced from England; and he was to combine his operations with those of the commander-in-chief of the Spanish armies.

The place appointed for a meeting and conference between Alexander and Napoleon was Erfurth, a city in the circle of the lower Rhine, belonging to the electorate of Mayence. Here they met on the 27th of September. The two emperors were each attended by a numerous and brilliant suite, and kings, sovereign princes, and other persons of high distinction, came day after day to do homage to the great emperor of the west. Among others who attended Alexander, were his brother, the Grand Duke Constantine, (whom it was the policy of Bonaparte to flatter with the hope of reigning at Constantinople,) the Count Romanzow, and the two Counts Tolstons, one of whom was the Russian ambassador at Paris. The suite of Bonaparte was composed of Berthier, Talleyrand, Caulincourt, Champagny, Secretary Maret, (the principal writer of official reports,) the Generals Lannes and Duroc, all of them bearing their new titles of princes, dukes, and counts, and in short all the staff-officers belonging to the French army cantoned in Bavaria. The kings and sovereign princes of Germany waited for the most part on Bonaparte in person. The Austrian general, Count St. Vincent, arrived at Erfurth, September 28, with an apology from the Emperor of Austria, for not attending the conference, and no doubt the strongest and most polite assurances of friendship towards both the French and Russian emperor. Count St. Vincent was closeted a long time with Bonaparte. Great was the pomp and ceremony, and most splendid the feasts and other entertainments, that took place on the occasion of this imperial and royal convention. The little town of Erfurth was astonished to witness a magnificence that would have been admired at Paris. The first dinner was given by Bonaparte. Napoleon and Alexander held their conferences every day at ten o'clock. These being over, they rode out together, either in the same carriage or on horseback, to take a view of the adjacent country. In one of these rides Alexander consented to traverse together with Bonaparte the whole field of Jena, the burying-ground, or grave, it may be called, of the ally to whom he had sworn eternal friendship over the ashes of the great Frederick?

The Archduke Constantine, while at Erfurth, appeared every day in the uniform of the horseguards of Bonaparte. It was the great object of Bonaparte, in the conferences and convention at Erfurth, to conciliate the good-will of all parties there, that he might be enabled, having secured quietness in his rear, to bear with all his disposable force on Spain and Portugal. Insignificant as the German powers had become, combinations might be formed by which they might distress him greatly in the present moment. Any concession, therefore, that would secure their connivance at his projects in the west, it was prudent in him to make: fully aware that if he succeeded in Spain, it would be an easy task again to reduce the countries in Germany, which he now occupied. But, at the same time that he found himself under the necessity of recalling his troops from Germany, he wished to hide as much as possible the weakness therein implied, and avert the designs to which a full conviction of that weakness might give birth. He therefore dexterously contrived to give the withdrawing of his troops the appearance of being the result of a negotiation; an act of favor to the sovereigns of Russia and Prussia. A negotiation was entered into at Erfurth, under the mediation of Alexander, in consequence of which Napoleon engaged to evacuate the Prussian territory, as soon as the contributions should be paid up: which he graciously reduced to one-third of their total amount: and he wrote a letter to the Queen of Prussia, with his own hand, in which he promised her the completion of all her wishes. He also relaxed in the severity of his restrictions and imposts on the commerce of Holland.

With regard to Alexander, it was easy to persuade him that the insurrection in Spain was only the natural consequence, and what was to be apprehended from the conclusion of the treaty of Tilsit. This sentiment was expressed on sundry occasions by Alexander, after his return to Petersburgh: and it may be presumed, that it had been inculcated on his pliant mind, by the companion and guide of his excursion to the field of Jena.—In consequence of the conferences at Tilsit, the garrisons of Prussia were evacuated: and the veteran troops of France began to march from the Oder to the Ebro: while, on the other hand, 40,000 French conscripts were sent to Germany.

Another visible effect of the meeting at Erfurth was an offer of peace on the part of Russia and France to the British government. A flag of truce, with two officers, one a Frenchman, the other a Russian, arrived, October 21, at Dover. The Frenchman, by orders of Lord Hawkesbury, who happened then to be at Walmer Castle, was detained. The Russian messenger was allowed to proceed on the 22d to London. It was the object of Bonaparte in this overture to lull the British government into a neglect or delay of sending assistance to Spain, and to excite a distrust of England in her allies; for as to any effect that professions and pacific dispositions on the part of Bonaparte might have on the minds of the French people, they had become stale and altogether barren. It was proposed, by the overture to his Britannic majesty, to enter into a negotiation for a general peace, in concert with his majesty's allies, and to treat either on the basis of uti possidetis, or on any other basis consistent with justice: The king professed his readiness to enter into such a negotiation in concurrence with his allies; in the number of whom he comprehended the Spanish nation. In the reply returned by France to this proposition of his majesty, the Spanish nation was described by the appellation of the "Spanish insurgents;" and the demand for admitting the existing government of Spain, as a party to any negotiation, was rejected as inadmissible and insulting. A declaration, therefore, by his majesty, was published on the 15th of December, concluding as follows: "His majesty deeply laments an issue by which the sufferings of Europe are aggravated and prolonged. But neither the honor of his majesty, nor the generosity of the British nation, would admit of his majesty's consenting to commence a negotiation by the abandonment of a brave and loyal people, who are contending for the preservation of all that is dear to man, and whose exertions in a cause so unquestionably just, his majesty has solemnly pledged himself to sustain."

While the army of France lay inactive on the Ebro, and the passes into the mountainous province of Biscay, and Bonaparte was employed in averting danger to his cause on the side of Germany and Russia, the provincial juntas had leisure to resolve themselves into one supreme and central junta.

The situation of the Spaniards, when their country was assailed by the intrigues, the treachery, and the arms of France, was without example in their history, unforeseen by their laws, and in opposition to their habits. In such circumstances, it was necessary to give a direction to the public force, correspondent with the will and sacrifices of the people. This necessity gave rise to the juntas in the provinces, which collected into themselves the whole authority of the nation, for the purpose of expelling the common enemy, and maintaining internal order and tranquillity. But as soon as the capital was delivered from the invaders, and the communication between the provinces re-established, it became practicable, as well as necessary, to collect the public authority, which had been divided into as many parts as there were provincial governments, into one centre, from whence the strength and the will of the nation might be called into action. A supreme and central junta, formed by deputies nominated by the respective juntas, was installed at Aranjuez, on the 25th of September. The president, per interim, was the venerable Count Florida Blanca.

The supreme central junta was acknowledged by the council of Castile, and all the other constituted authorities in the kingdom. The junta, amongst its first acts, appointed a new council of war, consisting of five members, the president of which was General Castanos. The other four members were Don Thomas Morla, the Marquis de Castelar, the Marquis del Pilacia, and Don Antonio Buerro. In prosecution of their designs it was necessary, in the first place, to attend to the grand spring of government, the finances. Great savings were made from the suppression of the expenses of the royal-household, the enormous sums which had been annually devoured by the insatiable avarice and profuse donations of the favourite, and the confiscation of the estates of those unworthy Spaniards who had sided and fled with the usurper from Madrid. These resources sufficed for their first operations without any new taxes on the people. The first efforts of the junta were directed to the setting in motion all the troops in Andalusia, Grenada, and Estramadura, as well as the new levies; to the transportation of Dupont's army, agreeably to treaty; and to the furnishing of the English army, that had vanquished Junot, with the means of marching from Portugal to join the Spaniards. In the midst of these cares, they sent envoys to demand succours from Britain. The forces of the patriots, including now the army of Romana, and the Spanish regiments that had been confined in hulks of ships by Junot, were divided into three, and disposed in such a manner as to form together, towards the end of October, one grand army. The eastern wing was commanded by General Joseph Palafox; the north-western, by General Blake; the centre, by General Castanos. The number under General Blake was computed at 55,000: that under General Castanos at 65,000; and that under the orders of General Palafox, at 20,000. General Castanos was commander-in-chief. Besides these there was a small army in Estramadura, and another in Catalonia. The positions of the French army remained, with some variation, on the whole much the same as in August; its right towards the ocean, its left on Arragon, its front on the Ebro. It was strengthened from time to time by reinforcements from France. The design of the Spaniards was, with the right and left wings of their grand army, to turn the wings of the French army, whilst Castanos should make a vigorous attack, and break through their centre.

Bonaparte having ordered a levy of 160,000 conscripts, set troops in motion for Spain, and, provided for all that might be demanded by the contingencies of war, set out from Paris for Spain, regardless of the answer to his overture for a negociation with the British government; and having proceeded from Rambouillet, October 30, with his usual celerity he arrived at Bayonne on the 3d of November, and on the 5th, accompanied by a reinforcement of 12,000 men, he joined his brother Joseph at Vittoria.

In time of peace Bonaparte employed proper persons to furnish him with the most correct topographical maps of different territories; on a great scale: by which means, being made acquainted by his generals with the relative positions of the opposite armies, he was enabled to give general directions, even at a great distance. —The campaign had been opened, according to his directions, a few days before his arrival.

Agreeably to the general plan of operations, General Castanos crossed the Ebro at the three points with only a shew of resistance, and he was suffered to push forward detachments, and take possession of Lerin, Viana, Caboroso, and other French posts on the left bank of the Ebro. The French did not oppose his onward course towards Pampeluna, any farther than was necessary to conceal their own plan of operations. Marshal Moncey, the Duke of Cornegiano, was directed with the left wing of the French army to advance along the banks of the Alagon and the Ebro, and instead of opposing the passage, by presenting a weak front, to decoy General Castanos across the Ebro. The stratagem having succeeded completely, Marshal Ney, the Duke of Elchingen, with his division, passing the line of the Ebro, and dashing forward with great celerity in separate columns, took the Spanish posts at Logrono and Colahora, threw the whole country into alarm and confusion, and cut off the communication between the armies respectively under the command of General Blake and General Castanos.

In a series of actions from the 31st of October, the army under General Blake was driven from post to post; from Durango to Guenas; from Guenas to Valmaseda; from Valmaseda to Espinosa. In a strong position there, the Gallician army made a stand, in order to save its magazines and artillery, in vain. After a brave resistance, continued for two days, they were obliged to retreat with precipitation. During the conflict at Espinosa, a detachment was sent against the last retreat of the Gallicians, Reynosa. At break of day, the 11th of November, they were suddenly attacked on both their right, left, and centre. They were forced to consult their safety by flight; throwing away their arms and colours, and abandoning their artillery. General Blake, with the remains of his broken army, took refuge in Asturias. What remained of the corps of the Marquis of Romana, that had formed part of the Gallician army, fled first to St. Andero, and afterwards to Asturias. The Spaniards were pursued closely by Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, the van of whose army entered St. Andero on the 16th. The Bishop of St. Andero took refuge in an English frigate.

In the mean time the Estramaduran army, under the command of Count Belvedere, a young man, was permitted without opposition, by a stratagem similar to that which had drawn General Castanos to the left bank of the Ebro, to advance to Burgos, of which he took possession without resistance. Here the French fell on him with superior numbers and routed his army, after a gallant resistance for twelve hours, and almost annihilated it. The count, with the small remains of his men, fled to Lerma, and from thence to Aranda.

The French, having routed and dispersed the armies of the north of Spain, and of Estramadura, next fell on the central army under Castanos: and an engagement ensued at Tudela, 23d November, which fixed the fate of the campaign.—It is thus described in the eleventh bulletin of the grand French army.

“On the 22d of November, at the break of day, the French army began its march. It took its direction to Calaborra, where, on the evening before, were the head-quarters of Castanos. Finding that town evacuated, it marched on Alfaro; from whence the enemy had also retreated. On the 23d, at break of day, the general of division, Lefevre, at the head of the cavalry, and supported by the division of General Morlat, forming the advanced guard, met with the enemy. He immediately gave information to the Duke of Montebello, who found the army of the enemy in seven divisions, consisting of 45,000 men, under arms, with its right before Tudela, and its left occupying a league and an half, a disposition altogether faulty. The Arragonese were on the right, the troops of Valencia and New Castile in the centre, and the three divisions of Andalusia, which General Castanos commanded more especially, formed the left. Forty pieces of cannon covered the enemy's line.

“At nine in the morning the columns of the French army began to display themselves with that order, regularity, and coolness, which characterise veteran troops. Situations were chosen for establishing batteries, with sixty pieces of cannon; but the impetuosity of the French troops, and the inquietude of the enemy, did not allow time for this. The Spaniards were already vanquished by the order and movements of the French army. The Duke of Montebello caused the centre to be pierced by the division of General Maurice Matthews. The general of division Lefevre, with his cavalry, immediately passed on the trot through this opening, and by a quarter wheel to the left, enveloped the enemy. The moment when half the enemy's line found itself thus turned and defeated, was that in which General le Grange attacked the village of Cascante, where the line of Castanos was placed, which did not exhibit a better countenance than the right, but abandoned the field of battle, leaving behind it its artillery, and a great number of prisoners. The cavalry pursued the remains of the enemy's army to Mallen, in the direction of Saragossa, and to Tarragona, in the direction of Agreda. Seven standards, thirty pieces of cannon, twelve colonels, three hundred officers, were taken. Four thousand Spaniards were left dead on the field of battle, or driven into the Ebro. While a part of the fugitives retired to Saragossa, the left wing of the Spanish army which had been cut off fled in disorder to Tarragona and Agreda. Five thousand Spaniards, all troops of the line, were taken prisoners in the pursuit. No quarter was given to any of the peasants found in arms. This army of 45,000 men has been thus beaten and defeated, without our having had more than 6,000 men engaged. The battle of Burgos had smitten the centre of the enemy, and the battle of Espinosa, the right; the battle of Tudela has struck the left. Victory has thus struck as with a thunderbolt, and dispersed the whole league of the enemy.”

By the battle of Tudela the road was laid open to Madrid. On the 29th of November, a division of the French army, under the command of General Victor, Duke of Belluno, arrived at the pass of the Sierra Morena, called the Puerto. It was defended by 13,000 men of the Spanish army of reserve, under the orders of General

San Juan. The Puerto, or narrow neck of land forming the pass, was intersected by a trench, fortified with sixteen pieces of cannon. While a part of the French advanced to the Puerto by the road, with six pieces of artillery, other columns gained the heights on the left. A discharge of musketry and cannon was maintained for some little time on both sides. A charge made by General Montbrun, at the head of the Polish light-horse, decided the contest. The Spaniards fled, leaving behind them their artillery and standards; and, as the French bulletin stated, their muskets; but this, from subsequent events, proved incorrect.

Advanced parties of the French cavalry appeared on the 1st of December before Madrid. At this period, the inhabitants of this city were busily employed in raising pallisades, and constructing redoubts, breathing a determined spirit of resistance. The enemy was beaten back from certain gates several times; but on the 3d, they were in possession of the gate of Alcala; and also of the Reteiro, the reduction of which place cost the assailants very dear, in the loss, it was computed, of near 1,000 men in killed and wounded. The junta then hoisted a white flag. The people of Madrid pulled down the flag, and persisted in their design of defending the city; but this enthusiasm soon began to subside, for want of leaders to keep it up and direct it: and when they learnt for certain that the French were fortifying themselves in the Reteiro, they began to retire to their respective houses.

During the night of December the 3d, a Spanish officer who had been taken prisoner in the affair of Somosierra, brought a message from General Berthier, summoning for the second time Madrid to surrender. The Marquis of Castellar, captain-general of Castille, sent in answer a letter to Berthier, demanding a suspension of hostilities, that he might have time for consulting the superior authorities. But there was no need or use in this. The superior authorities, who, it was evident, had a secret correspondence with the enemy, had already come to a determination on the subject. Madrid was given up through treachery. When intelligence that the French had forced the passage of the Sierra Morena reached Madrid, a council was held, at which the honorable Mr. Stuart, the British envoy at Madrid, was present. Don T. Morla took the lead, and expatiated at great length on the hopeless state of affairs; and urged the necessity of immediately capitulating for Madrid. When he sat down, another counsellor rose, and reproached Morla for his proposal. He said that this advice was more suited to a minister of Joseph Bonaparte, than to one of King Ferdinand. Two days after this discussion, Don T. Morla, together with the Prince of Castel Franco, to whom the defence of the capital had been committed by the supreme junta, sent a dispatch to Sir John Moore, describing the formidable Spanish force that was assembled at Madrid; and pressing him to advance, with all possible expedition, to the capital. If Sir John Moore had not possessed, in an extraordinary degree, circumspection, penetration, and firmness, the solicitations of the traitors, and those too of Mr. Hookam Frere, minister plenipotentiary from his Britannic majesty to the supreme junta, would have thrown him and his little army completely into the hands of the French. Yet, by some writers, the advice of Mr. Hookam Frere is applauded, and the prudence of Sir John Moore condemned. "Who," enquires one of those authors, "does not feel what sacrifices might have been prevented by a previous march of the British army on Madrid? Who does not lament the unsettled feeling of the British general here?—who, but must severely lament it?" At this time, however, there were many misrepresentations in the Spanish gazettes, which either proceeded from downright folly, or a traitorous design to lull the Spaniards, prone to be so lulled, into a state of false security and inaction. After General Blake had officially notified to the central junta, about the middle of October, that the army he had been able to collect amounted to no more than from 22 to 23,000 men; we find it stated in the Madrid gazette of October the 21st, that 70,000 men had passed through the town of Lugo.—At Madrid, November the 23d, was published the following proclamation: "Spaniards, the central junta of the government of the kingdom, after having taken all measures in its power to defeat the enemy, who, continuing his attacks, has advanced into the neighbourhood of Sornosa, addresses you for the purpose of putting you on your guard against the intrigues with which the perfidious agents of Napoleon endeavour to alarm and deceive you, by increasing the number of the enemy's troops, who hardly amount to 8,000 men, according to the report of the general whom the junta has charged with the defence of the important post of Guadarama."

The letter of the Marquis of Castellar, sent to Berthier in the morning of the 4th, produced a peremptory summons to surrender immediately. In the evening of the same day, Don Thomas Morla and Don Bertrando Yriate waited on Berthier, and were introduced by him to Bonaparte; who told them, with a stern countenance, and in a decided tone of voice, that if the city did not tender its submission by five or six o'clock next morning, it would be taken by assault, and every one found with arms in his hands put to the sword. The Spanish troops in Madrid were sent off, in the dead of night, by the gates of Segovia and Tudela.

Bonaparte, with affected magnanimity, extended his clemency to the degraded deputation from the junta. To conceal their concert with him, and at the same time to gratify his splenetic humour, he cunningly taunted Morla for his former perfidy in breaking the capitulation with Dupont. "The English," said he, "are not renowned for good faith: but having agreed to the convention of Cintra, they observed it." Morla's fortune and military rank were preserved to him. The same indulgence was shewn to his associates, who having joined him in betraying their country, did not disdain to live under the protection of the usurper. Morla, in a circular letter addressed to the Andalusians, endeavoured to draw them over to the side of King Joseph; who, he told them, was a man of great mildness and humanity of disposition.

Bonaparte addressed a manifesto to the Spanish nation, in which he promised them all good things if they received Joseph for their king sincerely and with all their heart.—If not, he would put the crown on his own head, treat them as a conquered province, and find another kingdom for his brother; for God had given him both the inclination and the power to surmount all obstacles.

The troops that had fled from the Puerto, or gate of Guadarama, having arrived, on the 3d of December, almost under the walls of Madrid, demanded with loud cries to be led to its defence. Their commander, Count St. Juan, who opposed so dangerous an attempt, was massacred.

Though the prerogatives of nature may be often neglected for ages, in the progress of time and events they are asserted sooner or later. Long had men of general views and speculation regretted that so fair a portion of the globe, so abundant in all the necessaries and even luxuries of life, and so well situated for the commerce of the world, as South America, should be suffered to languish under a short-sighted system of tyranny and oppression.

The grand interest excited by the state of Spain at this period, was the consideration that it would, in all probability, sever the mother-country from the colonies, and open a new theatre on the other side of the Atlantic, that would change the politics and improve the condition of the world. The balance of Europe being overthrown, it was a consolation to look to a balance on a grand scale: a balance of the world. It was not indeed the contemplation of a magnificent order of affairs that at first aroused the Spanish colonies to the exercise of their faculties, but that ardent devotion to the monarch, by which the Spaniards are particularly distinguished, and indignation against his cruel and perfidious oppressor.

The central junta, in conformity with the uniform intentions of the central juntas, declared that the colonies in Asia and America should not be considered as dependent provinces, but enjoy all the privileges of the metropolis and mother-country. This was also declared in the new constitution framed for Spain by Bonaparte.

In the Canaries, in Mexico, and the Floridas, Cuba and the other islands, and throughout the whole of South America, every Spaniard, as if animated by the same soul, breathed the same sentiments of devotion to the king and detestation of the monster who wished to usurp his throne. The vengeance of many, as is natural in burning climates, would have been wreaked on unoffending individuals of the French nation. In the Floridas the French were so apprehensive of falling victims to the vengeance of the Spaniards, that they fled, with their effects, into the territories of the United States. But the moderation, wisdom, and justice of men in authority, restrained the fury of the populace. The proclamations of the Spanish governors in the colonies, for sense, reason, and justice, equalled those of Old Spain, and for a fervent eloquence, perhaps even exceeded them. Hostilities were every where else declared against France, and the most liberal and prompt contributions remitted to the patriots in Old Spain. This year the French were driven out of the islands of Porto Rico, Deseada, and Morie Galante.

The great affairs of Europe in 1806 are exhibited in the contest between Spain and Portugal, with their ally Great Britain, on the one part; and the ruler of France, aided by his vassal princes and kings, on the other. The annals of other countries sink almost into provincial history. What is most prominent and important in the history of Spain, Great Britain, and France, during that period, has been seen in the present narrative. With respect to France, however, be it remembered, that in the beginning of the year Bonaparte, as a preparation for the farther extension and consolidation of his empire, annexed to France, and took possession of the military posts of Kehl, Wesel, Cassel on the Rhine, and Flushing. It was probably with similar views that he established and endowed a Greek bishoprick in Dalmatia. The state of the French empire in its internal as well as external relations, as exhibited by the ministers of Bonaparte, was far from being candidly disclosed. Such papers, notwithstanding their false colouring and misrepresentation of facts, disclosed the spirit and views of government. The most remarkable article in the exposé, or state of the French empire at this period, was the creation of the hereditary nobility, which was declared to be essential in a hereditary monarchy. The main drift of Bonaparte, in his internal regulations, seemed to be to root out all memorials of liberty, and to establish in France a despotic government, a military costume, and a military spirit. Sweden, in the beginning of the year, might have made her peace with France and Russia. The king, with the general voice of the nation, chose a braver, but more impolitic part. After some attempts on the part of the Russians, tutored, it would seem, in the school of their allies, the French, to seduce the Swedish nation from their allegiance to their king, and their duty to their country, and a rapid succession of the most sanguinary battles, where the Swedes were bending, and ready to fall, never to rise again, under the overwhelming power of Russia, the Swedish government signed a convention on the 7th of November, by which Finland, the granary of the kingdom, was virtually given up to Russia. The heroic King of Sweden was not deserted in this extremity of fortune by his ally, Britain. A naval force, under Admiral Keats, drove the Russian squadrons into their ports, where they were held in a state of blockade. A land-force of 10,000 men, under the command of Sir John Moore, was sent in the month of May to assist Sweden, against a combined attack from Russia, France, and Denmark. On the 17th of May, this army reached Gottenburgh, but was not permitted to land. Sir John Moore repaired to Stockholm to communicate his orders, and to concert measures for the security of Sweden. He there found, to his surprise, that though the Swedish army was quite insufficient for even defensive operations, his majesty's thoughts were wholly intent on conquest. It was first proposed, that the British should remain in their ships, till some Swedish regiments should be collected at Gottenburgh, and that the combined forces should land, and conquer Zealand. Upon an examination of the plan, it was found and admitted, that the island of Zealand, besides several strong fortresses, contained a regular force far superior to any that could be brought to bear against it: and also, that the island of Funen was full of French and Spanish troops, which could not be prevented from crossing over in small parties. It was next proposed that the British alone should land on Finland, storm a fortress, and take a position there. But Sir John Moore represented, that ten thousand British troops were wholly insufficient to encounter the principal force of the Russian empire, which could quickly be brought against them at a point so near Petersburg.—Sir John escaped from the resentment of his Swedish majesty in disguise, and conformably to his instructions, brought back his little army to England. In consequence of the disastrous and menacing aspect of affairs in Sweden, Louis XVIII. of France, with the queen and the Duchess of Angoulême, took refuge, in the month of August, in England.

As the Russians acquired an extension of territory on the one hand by the acquisition of Swedish Finland, they still kept a steady eye on the long-meditated project of extending their empire to the Bosphorus, by the acquisition of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Bessarabia. The number of their troops in Moldavia and Wallachia, in the autumn of this year, was raised to upwards of 80,000 men. To face these a great number of Turkish troops marched from time to time from Constantinople and other places, to the Danube: and of these no inconsiderable number had been trained in the European manner, and taught the use of the bayonet.

In Italy the most prominent events were the transference of the crown of Naples to Murat, Bonaparte's brother-in-law, the Grand Duke of Berg; the usurpation of the papal throne, and annexation of Rome, with all the ecclesiastical states, Placentia, Parma, and Anconia, to the French empire. The cardinals were banished from Rome, but allowed no inconsiderable pensions. The person of his holiness was secured in a state of confinement. Bonaparte said, that he only took back what had been given to the church for the support of religion and promotion of piety: but as the munificent donations of his predecessor, Charlemagne, had been used for very different purposes, it was very fit that they should be recalled. "The kingdom of Christ," he observed, like a sound divine, "was not of this world."

The same pope, Pius VII. that had gone to crown Napoleon at Paris, and agreed to the subversion of the Gallican church, and the diminution of the apostolical power, by the establishment of the concordat, in this terrible crisis, assumed the courage and the character of a martyr. He protested, by a public manifesto, against the irreligious and unjust proceeding of the Emperor of the French towards the holy apostolical see. He formally excommunicated him. In proclamations addressed to the Spanish, Portuguese, and all other Catholic nations, he exhorted them to the defence of the altar and the throne, at the hazard of their lives, as well as the expense of their fortune.

Many were, indeed, surprised that so subtle and refined a politician as Bonaparte, should incur the hazard of exciting the indignation, and a spirit of resistance to his aggressions, in all Catholic countries, by the spoliation and imprisonment of the pope. But Bonaparte's power had, by this time, risen to so enormous a pitch, that he did not think it necessary to manage or keep any terms with the opinions and prejudices of men and nations. His general plan was to arm and direct one half of the world against the other, and to make every thing bend under the weight of military despotism.

ON the 14th of December, Sir John Moore's head-quarters were at Alaejos, where he had received a letter from the Marquis of Romana, at Leon, with whom he was in communication, approving the reasons of retreat he had before intended. From Alaejos it had been projected to move on Valladolid. But the situation of Marshal Soult, with two divisions, at Saldana, and Junot at Burgos, exposed Sir David Baird to be attacked in forming his junction. Sir John Moore, accordingly, in order to unite as soon as possible with Sir David Baird, returned to Toro, whence it might still be possible, should Marshal Soult afford the opportunity, to strike a blow, under cover of the belief expressed in the French dispatches, that the force and movements of the French upon Talavera and Badajoz must have forced back the English army upon Lisbon.

At Toro, Sir John Moore received accounts of the disorganized and feeble state of the Marquis of Romana's army, with which he was meditating a junction, for adding vigour to his intended attack on Marshal Soult. From Toro, too, Sir John Moore dispatched an account to Mr. Frere, of the intelligence he had received by the intercepted dispatches; and here he was again assailed by the harassing intreaties of the Junta and the forcible representations of the minister-plenipotentiary. The general, firm in his designs, continued his march on Villapardo and Valderos. On December 20 he reached Majorca, and there, by completing his junction with Sir David Baird, united the whole British army, which now amounted to 23,000 infantry and 2,000 and some hundred cavalry.

On December 21, the British commander advanced to Sahagun, from which place Lord Paget, at the head of 400 horse, had, the morning before, dislodged and defeated 700 French cavalry, taking 157 prisoners, with two lieutenant-colonels. It was here Sir John Moore concerted, with General Romana, the plan of attack on Marshal Soult, whose forces, to the number of 18,000, were concentrated behind the river Carrion; 7,000 were posted at Saldana, and 5,000 at the town of Carrion, below Saldana. The British were collected between Sahagun, Grabal, and Villado. It was the intention of the British general to march from Sahagun to Carrion, and thence to Saldana by night, while Romana proceeded to the same point by Mansilla. The marquis prepared, in the best manner the defective state of his troops would permit, to co-operate in the design; for which purpose he arrived at Mansilla on the 23d, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and from thence announced his arrival to Sir John Moore, who was to march from Sahagun the same evening.

The expectations of the army were wound up to the highest pitch. The dispositions were already made for combat, and the generals had received their instructions, when Sir John Moore received information, that considerable reinforcements had arrived to the French from Palencia. A courier from Las Santas told of the halt of the French at Talavera, and several messengers reported their advance from Madrid. The latter part of this intelligence was confirmed by an express from the Marquis of Romana. The purport of these movements was easily frustrated by the British commander. He countermanded the advance of his troops, and determined on a retreat.

This retreat, from the distance marched, and the numerous difficulties by which it was attended, will long remain an honorable proof of the energy, perseverance, and valour of the British soldiery. It has no parallel in the annals of modern history; and it reflected equal honor on the talents of the commander-in-chief by whom it was conducted, and the officers and men who were individually concerned in its accomplishment. The following is an extract from Sir John Moore's dispatch to Lord Castlereagh on this occasion, dated December 28:—

"On the 21st the army reached Sahagun; it was necessary to halt there, in order to refresh the men, and on account of provisions. The information I received was, that Marshal Soult was at Saldana with about 16,000 men, with posts along the river from Guarda to Carrion.

"The army was ordered to march in two columns at eight o'clock on the night of the 23d, to force the bridge at Carrion, and from thence proceed to Saldana. At six o'clock I received information that considerable reinforcements had arrived at Carrion from Palencia, and a letter from the Marquis de la Romana informed me, that the French were advancing from Madrid either to Valladolid or Salamanca. It was evident that it was too late to prosecute the attempt upon Soult, that I must be satisfied with the diversion I had made, and that I had no time to lose to secure my retreat. The next morning Lieutenant-general Hope, with his own division, and that of Lieutenant-general Fraser, marched to Majorga. I sent Sir David Baird with his division to pass the river at Valencia, and followed Lieutenant-general Hope on the 25th, with the reserve and the light brigades, by Majorga and Valdeiras, to Benevento. The cavalry under Lord Paget followed the reserve on the 26th; both the latter corps entered this place yesterday. We continue our march on Astorga. Generals Hope and Fraser are already gone on; General Baird proceeds to-morrow from Valencia, and I shall leave this with the reserve at the same time. Lord Paget will remain with the cavalry to give us notice of the approach of the enemy; hitherto the infantry have not come up; but they are near, and the cavalry surround us in great numbers: they are checked by our cavalry, which have obtained, by their spirit and enterprize, an ascendancy over that of the French, which nothing but great superiority of numbers on their part will get the better of.

"The diversion made by our march on Sahagun, though at great risk to ourselves, has been complete; it remains to be seen what advantage the Spaniards in the South will be able to make of it; but the march of the French on Badajoz was stopped, and when its advanced-guard had reached Talavera de la Reine, every thing disposable was turned in this direction. The only part of the army which has been hitherto engaged with the enemy has been the cavalry, and it is impossible for me to say too much in their praise. I mentioned to your lordship, in my letter of the 16th, the success Brigadier-general Stewart had met with in defeating a detachment of cavalry at Rueda. Since that, few days have passed without his taking or killing different parties of the French, generally superior in force to those which attacked them. On their march to Sahagun, Lord Paget had information of 600 or 700 cavalry being in that town. He marched on the 20th from some villages, where he was posted in front of the enemy at Majorga with the 10th and 15th hussars. The 10th marched straight to the town, whilst Lord Paget with the 15th endeavoured to turn it. Unfortunately he fell in with a patrol, one of whom escaped and gave the alarm. By this means the French had time to form on the outside of the town before Lord Paget got round. He immediately charged them, beat them, and took from 140 to 150 prisoners, amongst whom were two lieutenant-colonels and eleven officers, with the loss, on our part, of six or eight men, and perhaps 20 wounded."

The exact amount of the forces brought by the French emperor against the Spaniards (after his return from his conference with the Russian emperor at Erfurth,) cannot be easily ascertained. According to an intercepted letter from the governor of Bayonne, 78,000 were to enter Spain between the 16th of October and the 16th of November. About the same period, 15,000, chiefly from Italy, entered Catalonia; and 30,000, under Junot, entered Spain in the beginning of December. The forces stationed behind the Ebro, together with the force in Barcelona and the other garrisons, amounted to 65,000, making a total of 182,000 at least. But the French prisoners agreed in making the total of the French army in Spain, at the end of 1808 and the beginning of 1809, 200,000. By the ruin of the armies under Blake, Castanos, and the young Count Belvidere, the road was cleared, and Bonaparte moved from Burgos upon the capital.

Bonaparte, on the 18th of December, marched from Madrid, with an army consisting of 32,000 infantry and 8,000 cavalry; even the division under Mortier, called the Duke of Treviso, which was on its march to Saragossa, was stopped. In short, the whole disposable force of the French army, forming an irregular crescent, was marching on to environ the British. To accomplish this favorite object, Bonaparte interrupted his victorious career to the South, where there was nothing capable of resisting him. Lisbon and Cadiz, at that time, would have yielded as easily as Madrid. The bold measures which had been adopted by Sir John Moore prevented the immediate subjugation of the Peninsula. It remains to be recorded, what was the plan Sir John Moore adopted for the extrication of his army from its perilous situation.

The advanced-guard of the French cavalry, which Bonaparte had brought from Madrid, passed through Tordesillas on the 24th of December; on the same day the van of the British army left Sahagun, and both moved towards the same point, at Benevento. The retreat of the British army now began by the passage of the river Eslar. The Marquis of Romana was left in possession of the bridge of Mansilla and the road to Leon. Sir David Baird crossed the Eslar, for the ferry of Valencia, where he took post to cover the magazines at Benevento and Zamora. Sir John Moore, with the remainder of the army, passed by the bridge of Castro Gonzalo. These movements were masked by the cavalry under Lord Paget, who advancing close to the positions of the enemy, fell in with and defeated several detachments of cavalry, which Bonaparte had pushed forward from Tordesillas.

Before Sir John Moore quitted Benevento, about 5 or 600 of Bonaparte's imperial cavalry crossed a ford below the town, and attacked the English pickets, who immediately assembled, to the amount of 220 men, under Brigadier-general Stewart, and retired slowly, disputing every inch of ground, and repeatedly charging through the enemy's squadrons, till the arrival of Lord Paget with the 10th hussars, who, together with the pickets, drove the enemy into the river, killing or wounding fifty-five, and taking seventy prisoners; among whom was the young General Lefebvre, commander of Bonaparte's imperial guard. Bonaparte is said to have viewed the action from a lofty hill, about a league from Benevento.

Sir John Moore now detached General Craufurd with 3,000 chosen troops on the road to Orense. Had he neglected this precaution, Bonaparte might have sent a light corps by this road, headed the British columns, and obstructed their retreat. Besides, there was great room to apprehend, that the whole army could not have been provided with subsistence had it remained united. General Craufurd proceeded undisturbed to Vigo, while the other columns pursued their march, through deep snows, across the dreary plains of Leon, to Astorga, where the British general found the town filled and the road encumbered with the straggling army of Romana; who, having abandoned the position and bridge of Mansilla, without breaking it down according to his instructions, was going to Orense. The Duke of Dalmatia, having crossed the Esclas at Mansilla, quietly entered Leon. His intention probably was, to occupy Astorga before the arrival of the British. In this, however, (if such was his design) he was disappointed by the skill and promptitude of Sir John Moore.

The British commander, uniting his army with the division of Sir David Baird from Valentia, proceeded, December 20, on Villa Franca and Lugo. At Astorga all the superfluous camp-equipage was destroyed, and all the mules, horses, &c. that could not keep up with the columns abandoned. On the march from hence the military chest was sacrificed; barrels full of dollars were staved, and precipitated over rocks into ravines, dens, and rivers. From Astorga to Lugo the road lay, for the most part, through bleak mountains covered with snow, affording so scanty a supply of provisions, that the troops were sometimes two days without tasting any food.

Bonaparte, after being joined by the Duke of Dalmatia at Astorga, and reviewing his troops, to the amount of 70,000 men, had dispatched three divisions, under three marshals, in pursuit of the English army. Continual skirmishes took place between the French advanced, and the British rear-guard commanded by Sir John Moore in person, who took his measures so well as always to repel his assailants. He offered battle to Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, before Lugo. This the duke did not think fit to accept; conceiving, probably, that he was playing a surer game, by endeavouring to envelop and destroy the British on their march.

On the 11th of January, 1809, the British army marched from Betanzos to Corunna, having now traversed 250 miles of mountainous and difficult country in the face of an enemy immensely superior in numbers; very often without food or shelter, drenched with rain, and worn out with cold and fatigue; yet still unbroken, presenting every-where an undaunted front to the enemy, who had not to boast of having won a single trophy. As yet, however, they were not in safety, very few transports having arrived from Vigo, owing to contrary winds. The position of Corunna was bad, and the enemy were assembling on the heights which surround it. There were not wanting generals who advised Sir John Moore to offer terms to the Duke of Dalmatia, for the purpose of being allowed to embark in safety; but the British general was determined not to accept of any terms, which (to use his own expression) would be in the least dishonorable to the army or to the country.

There were three ports at which the army might have been embarked—Vigo, Ferrol, and Corunna. The distance from Astorga to Vigo was too great, and besides there was not at Vigo any military position. The jealousy of the Spaniards would not have admitted the English into Ferrol; and further, the roads were too narrow and winding for transports to ride in safety from an enemy on shore. The peninsula of Betanzos, Sir John Moore had reason to hope, would afford a position for defending the embarkation, and was also so much nearer, that had not contrary winds detained the transports two days longer at Vigo, the army would have been embarked unmolested. As this was not the case, the general prepared for action, by occupying a small chain of hills a short distance from Corunna. The enemy occupied a more extended chain in his front; and a valley, with the village of Elvina, separated the two armies. From the 13th to the 15th, the embarkation of the sick, the artillery, horses, &c. was going on, the enemy in the mean time gradually drawing round and skirmishing with the out-posts of the English. On the 15th the advanced-guard of the British army, which was stationed on the heights near a place called Villaboa, was attacked by the enemy, as were the other out-posts, probably with the view of ascertaining, with more exactness, the nature of their position and the amount of their force. This was considered as a preliminary measure to a general battle, which was confirmed by the events of the following day.

The French had posted two guns at a detached house on the road, from whence they fired on the British lines. They were soon silenced by two English field-pieces, and obliged to retire with precipitation. The English guns were so extremely well served and pointed, that a shot from one of them was seen to kill several of the enemy, whilst their efforts were attended with little effect, the shots mostly falling short of the objects they were aimed at. One shell passed over the advanced post it was directed against, falling near the road amongst several British soldiers, without occasioning any of them the smallest injury. The whole day was passed in continual skirmishing, during which the cool and intrepid conduct of the British troops was eminently conspicuous and exemplary. The late Lieutenant-colonel Mackenzie, of the 1st battalion of the 5th regiment, particularly distinguished himself by his activity and bravery. Having had one horse shot under him, he remounted on another, advanced again to the attack, and unfortunately received a wound from a musket-ball, which occasioned his death in a few hours afterwards.

A most interesting spectacle presented itself during this day in the movements and operations of the contending parties. A detachment, consisting of more than a hundred of the enemy, took possession of a house on the side of a hill, from whence they were speedily dislodged by the British artillery, the first shot from whom penetrated through the house, compelling them to seek safety on the height by a precipitate flight.

The firing did not entirely cease till the evening, when the out-posts were relieved, and the brave English troops who had been engaged were withdrawn to take that rest which their vigorous and arduous exertions rendered so requisite. The army in general had been supplied with their due proportion of rations since their arrival at Corunna, which the uncommon rapidity of the retreat, and local circumstances, prevented their receiving with regularity during their march. Those soldiers who required them were also furnished with shoes, stockings, and other articles, and new arms were delivered out, to replace those that had been lost or rendered unfit for service.

On the morning of the 16th an unusual degree of bustle and animation appeared to prevail amongst the Spanish troops and inhabitants; his Excellency the commandant, Don Joaquim Garcia Morena, having by proclamation and other methods exhorted them to exert their utmost efforts in co-operating with their brave allies to repel the assaults of the enemy, and to afford them every possible facility towards effecting their embarkation, declaring at the same time, it was his determination to defend the place to the last extremity. This venerable and patriotic officer, though apparently upwards of seventy years of age, evinced the utmost activity and zeal in the performance of his duties, being the greatest part of every day on horseback, personally inspecting the progress of the works, and the organization of the volunteers.

At this period, every thing appearing perfectly quiet, the English soldiers, excepting those on contr'y, were resting and taking refreshment, but still in a situation ready to turn out at a moment's notice. The men had erected for themselves huts, formed of boards, straw, and other materials, hastily collected from the buildings in the neighbourhood, there being very few tents. Notwithstanding the fatigue they had already undergone, and the severe conflicts they had recently been engaged in, they appeared in excellent spirits, expressing the highest confidence in their officers, and seemed anxious, by being again opposed to the enemy, to bring to a conclusion the object of their illustrious general-in-chief, of the favourable issue of which they entertained no doubt. Between the hours of ten and eleven, a large body of cavalry and infantry, evidently a reinforcement, were marching up to the heights in front, accompanied by bands of music, drums, and fifes. A few shots were fired at their rear by the British, but the distance was too great for them to do execution. The extent of the French lines could plainly be ascertained through a telescope, and engineers and artillerymen were seen busily employed in their front, erecting a battery. From the extent and depth of their line, the enemy's army appeared to be upwards of 30,000.

The commanding position of the enemy's guns enabled them to have a superior effect to those of the English, who were so much below them. The principal attack of the enemy was directed to the division under Sir David Baird, which was undoubtedly the weakest portion of the British line, against which they advanced three very strong columns. Nothing could possibly exceed the intrepidity, firmness, and good order with which this division sustained the attack. After a very arduous struggle, the British succeeded in driving the enemy down from the heights whereon they had attacked them, and charged them with the utmost spirit and ardor half-way up the hill, on the other side, which they had before occupied, to the place where they had posted their guns, which very nearly fell into the hands of the English, and were only preserved by being hastily withdrawn.

A village to the right of General Baird's division became an object of obstinate contest between the two armies. It was situated at the foot of a hill, and crowded with French troops. These were gallantly attacked by the English no less than three several times, who at length succeeded in carrying the place, after an immense slaughter of the enemy.

An hour and a half after noon, Sir John Moore, in continuation of his preparations for the embarkation of the army, mounted his horse, in great spirits, to visit the out-posts, but soon received a report from General Hope, confirmed by a deserter, that the enemy's line was getting under arms. He had scarcely arrived, on the field, when the enemy's light troops were beheld, pouring down upon the right of the British army, and the advanced piquets were firing on them.

Sir John Moore ordered General Fraser to take a position on the right; and General Paget to support Lord William Bentinck with the reserve, while a heavy cannonade from eleven guns on the hills covered the advance of four strong columns of the enemy: two approached the right from a wood, one the centre, and the other from El Burgo, the left of the British line, supported by a corps which rested half way down the hill. To the right, the attention of the general was directed, from an idea of its weakness of position, though it was composed of the fourth, forty-second, and fiftieth regiments, with the guards in their rear, to which was added, the reserve under General Paget.

The enemy's artillery descended rapidly, the two armies approached each other under a heavy fire. Sir David Baird leading his division, lost his left arm by a grape-shot, and was compelled to quit the field: but it had no effect on the steady advance of the troops.

The ground was intersected by hedges and stone walls, except on the right, which in consequence was attempted to be turned by a French corps from the left of the enemy's line, (which outflanked that of the British) moving up the valley. The right wing of the fourth regiment instantly fell back, so as to form an obtuse angle with its left, and commenced a heavy and effectual fire from the right flank, which Sir John Moore immediately approved, exclaiming, "it was exactly what I wanted to be done." The fiftieth regiment, under Majors Stanhope and Napier, passed the inclosure which separated them from the enemy, and charging most gallantly, drove him with great loss from the village of Elvina, at the expence of Major Napier, having been wounded and taken prisoner, and the mortal wound of Major Stanhope. The general also approved this charge with the exclamation, "Well done fiftieth! well done my majors!"

The forty-second rushed on the enemy with their usual fire, till a wall obstructed them. The commander-in-chief bade them remember "Egypt," and praised their conduct. A momentary error of the light company arose from his ordering a battalion of guards to their left flank, which, as their ammunition was exhausted, appeared coming to relieve them, but it was instantly repaired when the general pointed to their bayonets. The French artillery was now playing round the spot, from which a cannon-ball struck the left shoulder of the commander-in-chief, and he fell. Captain

Hardinge reported the circumstance to General Hope, who now assumed the command, and in the following letter thus described the fall and death of Lieutenant-general Sir John Moore.

"The circumstances which took place immediately after the fatal blow which deprived the army of its gallant commander, Sir John Moore, are of too interesting a nature not to be made public, for the admiration of his countrymen. But I trust that the instances of fortitude and heroism of which I was a witness, may also have another effect, that of affording some consolation to his relatives and friends.

"With this feeling I have great satisfaction in committing to paper, according to your desire, the following relation.

"I had been ordered by the commander-in-chief to desire a battalion of the guards to advance; which battalion was at one time intended to have dislodged a corps of the enemy from a large house and garden on the opposite side of the valley; and I was pointing out to the general the situation of the battalion, and our horses were touching, at the very moment that a cannon-shot from the enemy's battery carried away his left shoulder and part of the collar-bone, leaving the arm hanging by the flesh.

"The violence of the stroke threw him off his horse, on his back. Not a muscle of his face altered, nor did a sigh betray the least sensation of pain.

"I dismounted, and taking his hand, he pressed mine forcibly, casting his eyes very anxiously towards the forty-second regiment, which was hotly engaged; and his countenance expressed satisfaction when I informed him that the regiment was advancing.

"Assisted by a soldier of the forty-second, he was removed a few yards behind the shelter of a wall.

"Colonel Graham Balgowan, and Captain Woodford, about this time came up; and, perceiving the state of Sir John's wound, instantly rode off for a surgeon.

"The blood flowed fast; but the attempt to stop it with my sash was useless, from the size of the wound.

"Sir John assented to being removed in a blanket to the rear. In raising him for that purpose, his sword hanging on the wounded side, touched his arm, and became entangled between his legs. I perceived the inconvenience, and was in the act of unbuckling it from his waist, when he said, in his usual tone and manner, and in a very distinct voice, "It is well as it is. I had rather it should go out of the field with me."

"Here I feel that it would be improper for my pen to venture to express the admiration with which I am penetrated in thus faithfully recording this instance of the invincible fortitude, and military delicacy, of this great man.

"He was borne by six soldiers of the forty-second and guards, my sash supporting him in an easy posture.

"Observing the resolution and composure of his features, I caught at the hope that I might be mistaken in my fears of the wound being mortal; and remarked, that I trusted when the surgeons dressed the wound, that he would be spared to us, and recover.—He then turned his head round, and, looking steadfastly at the wound for a few seconds, said, "No Hardinge, I feel that to be impossible."

"I wished to accompany him to the rear, when he said, "You need not go with me. Report to General Hope that I am wounded, and carried to the rear."

"A serjeant of the forty-second, and two spare files, in case of accident, were ordered to conduct their brave general to Corunna; and I hastened to report to General Hope.

"I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

"H. HARDINGE."

The tidings of this disaster were brought to Sir David Baird when the surgeons were dressing his shattered arm. He instantly commanded them to desist, and run to attend on Sir John Moore. When they arrived, and offered their assistance, he said to them, "You can be of no service to me, go to the soldiers, to whom you may be useful."

As the soldiers were carrying him slowly along, he made them turn him round frequently, to view the field-of-battle, and to listen to the firing; and was well pleased when the sound grew fainter.

A spring-waggon bearing Colonel Wynch wounded from the battle came up. The colonel asked, "who was in the blanket?" and being told it was Sir John Moore, he wished him to be placed in the waggon. The general asked one of the Highlanders, whether he thought the waggon or the blanket best; who answered, that the blanket would not shake him so much, as he and the other soldiers would keep the step, and carry him easy. Sir John said, "I think so too." So they proceeded with him to his lodgings in Corunna, the soldiers shedding tears as they went.

In carrying him through the passage of the house, he saw his faithful servant François, who was stunned at the spectacle. Sir John said to him, smiling, "My friend, this is nothing."

The monument of Sir John Moore now became the subject of deliberation among his military friends who had survived the engagement; when Colonel Anderson informed them that he had heard the general repeatedly declare, "that if he was killed in battle, he wished to be buried where he had fallen!" General Hope and Colonel Graham, immediately acceded to his suggestion; and it was determined that the body should be interred on the rampart of the citadel of Corunna.

At twelve o'clock at night, the remains of Sir John Moore were accordingly carried to the citadel, by Colonel Graham, Major Colborne, and the aides-de-camp, and deposited in Colonel Graham's quarters. A grave was dug by a party of the ninth regiment, the aides-de-camp attending by turns. No coffin could be procured, and the body was never undressed, but wrapt up by the officers of his staff in a military cloak and blankets.

Towards eight o'clock in the morning some firing was heard. It was then resolved to finish the interment, lest a serious attack should be made; on which the officers would be ordered away, and not suffered to pay the last duties to their general. The officers of his family bore the body to the grave; the funeral service was read by the chaplain, and the corps was covered with earth.

Besides showing these extraordinary marks of respect to the British army, the Duke of Dalmatia, before he left Corunna, gave orders to Mr. Foureroy, the French consul, to erect a commemoration-stone on the spot where Sir John Moore fell, to testify the high estimation he was held in by his enemies. But this design was frustrated by the French being soon obliged to evacuate the town. The Marquis of Romana, then, excited by similar sentiments, raised up, on the field-of-battle of Corunna, a monument to the British general.

To these may be added, as an evidence of readiness to yield every testimony to merit, the following

GENERAL ORDERS.

"The benefits derived to an army, from the example of a distinguished commander, do not terminate at his death; his virtues live in the recollection of his associates, and his fame remains the strongest incentive to great and glorious actions.

"In this view, the commander-in-chief, amidst the deep and universal regret which the death of Lieutenant-general Sir John Moore has occasioned, recalls to the troops the military career of that illustrious officer, for their instruction and imitation.

"Sir John Moore, from his youth, embraced the profession with the feelings and sentiments of a soldier; he felt, that a perfect knowledge, and an exact performance of the humble, but important duties of a subaltern officer, are the best foundations for subsequent military fame; and his ardent mind, while it looked forward to those

BOOK VIII. brilliant achievements for which it was formed, applied itself with energy and exemplary assiduity to the duties of that station.

CHAP. V.

"In the regimental duty, he obtained that correct knowledge of his profession so essential to the proper direction of the gallant spirit of the soldier; and he was enabled to establish a characteristic order and regularity of conduct, because the troops found in their leader a striking example of the discipline which he enforced on others.

"Having risen to command, he signalized his name in the West Indies, in Holland, and in Egypt. The unremitting attention with which he devoted himself to the duties of every branch of his profession, obtained him the confidence of Sir Ralph Abercrombie; and he became the companion in arms of that illustrious officer, who fell at the head of his victorious troops, in an action which maintained our national superiority over the arms of France.

"Thus Sir John Moore, at an early period, obtained, with general approbation, that conspicuous station in which he gloriously terminated his useful and honorable life.

"In a military character, obtained amidst the dangers of climate, the privations incident to service, and the sufferings of repeated wounds, it is difficult to select any one point as a preferable subject for praise: however, one feature so particularly characteristic of the man, and so important to the best interests of the service, that the commander-in-chief is pleased to mark it with his peculiar approbation.

"The life of Sir John Moore was spent among the troops.

"During the season of repose, his time was devoted to the care and instruction of the officer and soldier; in war, he courted service in every quarter of the globe. Regardless of personal considerations, he esteemed that to which his country called him, the post of honor; and by his undaunted spirit, and unconquerable perseverance, he pointed the way to victory.

"His country, the object of his latest solicitude, will rear a monument to his lamented memory; and the commander-in-chief feels he is paying the best tribute to his fame, by thus holding him forth as an example to the army.

"By order of his royal highness the commander-in-chief.

"HARRY CALVERT, Adj.-general.

"Horse-Guards, Feb. 1, 1809."

Neither the fall of Sir John Moore, or the removal of Sir David Baird, arrested, for a moment, the energies of the British troops. They pressed on with astonishing ardour.

Colonel Beckwith with the rifle-corps returned the attempt of the enemy, by advancing on their flank and nearly capturing a piece of cannon, till the force in the valley became superior. General Paget, with part of the reserve, the fifty-second in particular, then attacked this force of the enemy, and so pressed its left wing, that it was compelled to throw itself entirely back, and the whole strength of the enemy now drew itself against the British centre.

Here they were at once repulsed by its generals, Leith and Manningham, who occupied good ground, and were therefore enabled to use artillery with effect. The enemy, also, tried the left without success; it was still more favorably posted. In turn they were attacked, in a small body, in the village of Betanzos, by Lieutenant-colonel Nicholls, with some companies of the fourteenth foot, and compelled to evacuate it with loss. The firing, which, on the part of the British, had been quick and steady throughout, continued, though desultorily, till dark: that of the enemy ceased at six o'clock. They had given way at every point, though not in a degree, perhaps, to permit the ordinary claim of a brilliant victory on the part of the British army, yet certainly so decisively, as to leave to it the ground it occupied at the commencement of the battle, and which ground also its picquets and reserve maintained, till every object of utility was effected.

Of the loss on either side, no perfect estimate was formed. That of the British troops was considered by the officer, who held the final command, at between seven and eight hundred; that of the enemy, double. Other accounts stated the enemy's loss greater. In less than four hours, having shewn the enemy the nature of the composition of a British army, under the worst circumstances, the troops moved towards Corunna, by brigades, leaving strong picquets, and a rear-guard of 2,000 men, under Major-general Beresford. Every arrangement, it appears, was made highly creditably in every instance. Boats were so in readiness, that nearly the whole army was embarked during the night, and even including picquets, before day-light. The rear-guard still remained on shore.

On the morning of the 17th, the French made a demonstration with their light troops on the heights of St. Lúcia, and planted cannon on the rising ground, near the harbour. General Hill's brigade embarked at two o'clock, under the citadel. General Beresford sent off all the sick and wounded that could be removed; and, lastly, the rear-guard got into their boats without interruption. The whole was conducted, as far as regarded the navy, and also the officers concerned in the transport service, with the greatest energy and skill. From the fire of a French battery, four transports having cut their cables, ran aground; and, the troops being taken out, were burnt.

CHAPTER VI.

Debates in the Third Session of the Imperial Parliament relative to the War.—Bonaparte's abrupt Departure from Spain.—Second Siege and Capitulation of Saragossa.

THE third Imperial Parliament having assembled on the 19th of January, pursuant to his majesty's proclamation, the following speech was read to both houses by the Lord Chancellor, in his majesty's name.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—“We have it in command from his majesty to state to you, that his majesty has called you together, in perfect confidence that you are prepared cordially to support his majesty in the prosecution of a war, which there is no hope of terminating safely and honorably, except through vigorous and persevering exertion.

"We are to acquaint you, that his majesty has directed to be laid before you, copies of the proposals for opening a negociation, which were transmitted to his majesty from Erfurth, and of the correspondence which thereupon took place with the government of Russia and of France; together with the declaration issued by his majesty's command on the termination of that correspondence.

"His majesty is persuaded, that you will participate in the feelings which were expressed by his majesty, when it was required that his majesty should consent to commence the negociation by abandoning the cause of Spain, which he had so recently and solemnly espoused.

"We are commanded to inform you, that his majesty continues to receive from the Spanish government the strongest assurances of their determined perseverance in the cause of the legislative monarchy, and of the national independence of Spain; and to assure you, that so long as the people of Spain shall remain true to themselves his majesty will continue to them his most strenuous assistance and support.

"His majesty has renewed to the Spanish nation, in the moment of its difficulties and reverses, the engagements which he voluntarily contracted at the outset of its struggle against the usurpation and tyranny of France; and we are commanded to acquaint you, that these engagements have been reduced into the form of a treaty of alliance; which treaty, as soon as the ratifications shall have been exchanged, his majesty will cause to be laid before you.

"His majesty commands us to state to you, that while his majesty contemplated with the liveliest satisfaction the achievements of his forces in the commencement of the campaign in Portugal, and the deliverance of the kingdom of his ally from the presence and oppressions of the French army, his majesty most deeply regretted the termination of that campaign by an armistice and convention, of some of the articles of which his majesty has felt himself obliged formally to declare his disapprobation.

"We are to express to you his majesty's reliance on your disposition, to enable his majesty to continue the aid afforded by his majesty to the King of Sweden. That monarch derives a particular claim to his majesty's support in the present exigency of his affairs, from having concurred with his majesty in the propriety of rejecting any proposal for negociation, to which the government of Spain was not to be admitted as a party.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,—“We are commanded by his majesty to inform you, that he has directed the estimates of the current year to be laid before you. His majesty relies upon your zeal and affection, to make such further provisions of supply as the vigorous prosecution of the war may render necessary; and he trusts that you may be enabled to find the means of providing such supply, without any great or immediate increase of the existing burdens upon his people.

"His majesty feels assured it will be highly necessary to you to learn that, notwithstanding the measures resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of destroying the commerce and resources of his kingdom, the public revenue has continued in a course of progressive improvement.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—“We are directed to inform you, that the measures adopted by parliament in the last session, for establishing a local militia, has been already attended with the happiest success, and promises to be extensively and permanently beneficial to the country.

"We have received his majesty's commands most especially to recommend to you, that, duly weighing the immense interests which are at stake in the war now carrying on, you should proceed, with as little delay as possible, to consider of the most effectual measures for the augmentation of the regular army, in order that his majesty may be better enabled, without impairing the means of defence at home, to avail himself of the military power of his dominions, in the great contest in which he is engaged; and to conduct that contest under the blessing of divine Providence, to a conclusion compatible with the honor of his majesty's crown, and with the interest of his allies, of Europe, and of the World."

On the motion, in the House of Lords, by the Earl of Bridgewater, seconded by Lord Sheffield, for an address of thanks to his majesty, various animadversions on the conduct of ministers took place, imputing the whole failure of the expedition to their incapacity; but, as in all such debates, assertion was endeavoured to be overruled by opposition; faults were implied, but no specific remedy seemed to be suggested; all appeared to be wrong, but none were willing to put right; thus censure having been very liberally dispensed, the proposed reproach was exploded by the majority for a vote of address.

"There were some persons who appeared to think, that an army once landed could act as speedily as a ship when it has left the port. The difference, however, was very great: the ship had nothing to do but to go with the wind, and meet the enemy; whereas an army, when landed, had much difficulty in collecting provisions, and the means of transporting their necessary baggage. If the present administration were, however, to have waited till every thing was ready for the reception of our armies, they must have stood as still as the last vigorous administration, who actually did nothing while in office. He would venture to say, from the melancholy experience of the fate of General Blake's army, that if a British army had landed at St. Andero, and scrambled as far as General Blake advanced, none of them would ever have come back. He was convinced, that there was not a single military man who would support the idea of a campaign in the Pyrenees for a British army.

"The right honorable gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby) had stated, that the expedition which had achieved the deliverance of Portugal had been sent to sea, to seek its fortunes, without any particular direction from government. The fact, however, was directly the reverse; because, most unquestionably, the expedition under Sir Arthur Wellesley did sail with a most precise and determinate object. It had been ordered to go immediately to the Tagus, without stopping at Corunna. This direction was given in consequence of precise information from Sir Charles Cotton, (which, however, afterwards turned out to be unfounded,) that there were no more than 5,000 French troops in Lisbon, and the other forts upon the Tagus, and that Sir Arthur Wellesley's expedition would be sufficient to dislodge them.

The expedition then had been sent out with precise instructions; but it would hardly be contended, that government should have tied up the hands and the discretion of such a meritorious officer as Sir Arthur Wellesley, so completely as to say, that he must on no occasion take advantage of any favorable circumstances which might occur in the varying and fleeting fortune of the war, without waiting until he had made a direct communication to government on the subject, and had received their answer. It appeared to him, that floating armies, under the command of trustworthy officers, might be of great service, even when acting according to the circumstances of the times, without any particular directions from government; and he was confident, that in this manner the corps of General Spencer had been of considerable service in marching from Seville to Ayamonte, and stopping a portion of Junot's army that was coming to the relief of Dupont.

"As to the attacks which had been made upon him, for not having sent sufficient cavalry with the expedition, he was ready to strengthen the right honorable gentleman's argument, and to admit, that it was only by accident that any cavalry at all had been attached to it. It was not supposed that cavalry was a proper description of force to send with those floating expeditions, which might be a long time at sea before they found a favorable opportunity for landing. Some of the cavalry, however, which were in Portugal, had happened to come from the Mediterranean. He should always protest against the notion, that we were never to engage an enemy, unless we were equal or superior to him in cavalry. He would ask the house, Would they wish to blot out from the page of our history those brilliant victories, which we had gained when much inferior in cavalry? At the glorious battle of Alexandria, Sir Ralph Abercrombie had but 150 dragoons, and the French had 2,400 cavalry; and at the battle of Maida, Sir John Stuart had no cavalry at all. In the expedition to Portugal, the government had made sufficient provision of cavalry. Our army would have been superior to the enemy in this respect, if the cavalry, which was in Munda's Bay on the 20th (the day before the battle), had landed. The 18th dragoons were also very near. He would allow, however, that if Sir Arthur Wellesley had had the cavalry on that day upon which he routed the French, the result of that victory would have been still more glorious."

Various other strictures were made in the course of the debate; but the question being put, the motion was carried, and a committee appointed to prepare the address; and votes of thanks to Sir Arthur Wellesley were passed on the 25th of January, in both houses; which also passed votes of thanks to Generals Spencer,

Hill, Ferguson, Ackland, Nightingale, Fane, and Bowes, and the officers under their command; and a resolution, expressive of the approbation of parliament of the non-commissioned officers and privates at the battle of Vimeira, which Lord Castlereagh distinguished by the name of "immortal."

On the same day, in the house of lords, the Earl of Liverpool moved the thanks of the house for the defeat before Corunna. The earl paid a high eulogium to the memory of the departed general, "whose life," he said, "had been devoted to the service of his country; for there was scarcely any action of importance, during the two last wars, in which he had not participated." After some observations on the difficulties encountered in the retreat, and the battle in which it terminated, and stating, that in wording the motion, the precedent of Egypt, in which the gallant Abercrombie fell, had been followed, his lordship moved "the thanks of the house to Lieutenant-general Sir David Baird, second in command of the army in Spain; Lieutenant-general the Honourable John Hope, who took the command on Sir John Moore's receiving the wound, which terminated in his much-lamented death, and to the other officers employed."

All the lords who spoke on this occasion concurred heartily in this motion, bestowed the highest praise on the character and conduct of Sir John Moore, and deeply deplored his loss to the country.

The Earl of Moira, however, in giving his concurrence, could not avoid asking ministers, "how it had happened that so heavy and lamentable a loss as that of Sir John Moore, and so great a proportion of his army, had been sustained, without any one object having been obtained except the embarkation of the army? British blood and treasure, and the invaluable lives of British officers and soldiers, had been sacrificed to no purpose. To what but the ignorance and incapacity of ministers were all these calamities to be attributed?"

Lord Erskine, too, "who felt as much for the fame of the immortal officer deceased as any of their lordships could possibly feel (from peculiar or personal circumstances which he detailed), could not refrain from expressing his indignation at such men, and that such resources as ours should have been utterly thrown away and lost by the total incapacity of those who had misdirected their efforts."

Lord Grenville observed, that "they were called upon to vote thanks for a success followed by a retreat. The success belonged to the army and its commander; the retreat to those who sent them, and placed them in such a situation; that a safe retreat was the only thing that could be looked for. Ministers, for the folly of such conduct, must answer to their country."

Such were the modes of reproach used, because, by mere unpropitious circumstances, a well-intended project had failed! At length the motion was agreed to, nem. diss. as was also a motion acknowledging and approving the services of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers; a motion of thanks to Rear-admiral De Courcy, and Sir Samuel Hood, and the other officers, for their assistance; and another, acknowledging and approving the services of the seamen and marines on that occasion.

In the course of the same night, Lord Castlereagh in his official capacity, as minister at war, expressed his sorrow at the "loss of one of the ablest of our generals, possessing, in an eminent degree, every valuable quality that can dignify the man, and enhance the superiority of the soldier; at once in the prime of life, and the prime of professional desert; giving, in the evidence of his past life, the best assurance of what might be expected from his zeal, intrepidity, and talents." He concluded with the following motion: "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, requesting that a monument be erected in the cathedral of St. Paul, to the memory of the late Lieutenant-general Sir John Moore, Knight of the Bath; who, after an honourable and meritorious life, fell by a cannon-ball, in the action near Corunna, on the 16th of January, 1809, after having, by his judicious dispositions, skill, and gallantry, repulsed an enemy of superior force, and secured to the troops under his command a safe and unmolested embarkation."

This motion was agreed to unanimously, as were also other motions for the thanks of the house to the lieutenant-generals, officers, non-commissioned officers, &c. for their effectual exertions on this memorable occasion.

The next business which attracted the attention of parliament, was Lord Henry Petty's motion, in the house of commons, "for a resolution, declaring, 1st, That the convention of Cintra, and a maritime convention, concluded nearly at the same time, off the Tagus, had disappointed the hopes and expectations of the country; and 2dly, That in the opinion of the house of commons, those conventions had, in a great measure, arisen from the misconduct and neglect of his majesty's ministers." This motion was lost by a majority of 50 in favour of the ministry.

But, on the 24th of February, the subject of the campaign in Spain, which had been incidentally the object of remark in the house of commons, was formally brought under the consideration of the house, as a motion by the Right Hon. George Ponsonby, "That it is indispensibly necessary that this house should enquire into the causes, conduct, and events of the late campaign in Spain."

In reply to Mr. Ponsonby's accusative arguments, Lord Castlereagh observed, that "the only reason that had been alleged for the enquiry were reducible to the ignorance of the right honourable mover. And he did not think that that was, or had ever been, pretended to be a proper parliamentary ground for enquiry. As he could not bend to the cogency of this reason, he certainly should oppose the motion; though, at the same time, he declared, that had there been the slightest prima facie evidence to support it, he would have fully concurred in it. If the result of the campaign in Spain had not been as glorious as had been so earnestly and justly expected, whether owing to the imperfect state of discipline of the Spanish armies, or to the want of sufficient time to complete that discipline, still, he contended, that there was no prima facie ground for imputing the blame of that failure to his majesty's ministers. The British army was intended only to act as an auxiliary force in aid of the Spanish armies; and surely the British government was not to be blamed because the Spanish forces, unhappily, had not been able to hold out till the arrival of the military succours that were sent out to their assistance from this country.

"It had been said by Mr. Ponsonby, that government ought to have united to collect full information how far the spirit of liberty in the Spaniards went to the amelioration of their condition; how far the national feeling and public spirit of Spain were such as to justify ministers in hazarding a British military force in aid of its cause. How the honourable mover could reconcile this with his former admonition to "speed and celerity," it was not within the compass of his intellectual powers to discover.

"As to the selection of characters proper for reporting to government the real state and spirit of Spain, would it have been rational for ministers to listen to any man's opinion on that point before the formation of the central junta, which alone could decide on the views of Spain? And were they to leave Spain and Portugal to their destinies till that event should have taken place? The only rational question was, Whether it could be hoped that Spain, with our assistance, would be enabled to stand against France? Spain had made an energetic effort: she had borne up against the military power of France with more vigour, more constancy, and better success, than those powers which had been supported by formidable regular armies. There had been many circumstances in the case of Spain to inspire a confident hope of its success. It was known that the popular rising was the simultaneous effort of the whole country. All the provinces had risen, he believed, within the space of five or six days. In the course of a very few months, they had collected an army in Andalusia, and obtained a most decided victory over the French under Dupont, at the memorable battle of Baylen, in which the Spanish army was little superior in number to the enemy. The Spaniards were so confident of their own strength, that when General Spencer applied to them, to know whether he should come to their assistance, they recommended his marching to the relief of Portugal. Saragossa also, as well as Andalusia, presented a picture of encouragement. Nor had Leon been deficient; for, at the battle of Rio Seco, the enemy had, by no means, the advantage they boasted of. The Spaniards had, in fact, obtained decided advantages, and would have effectually defeated the enemy, if they had had the benefit of cavalry to follow up their successes. What the Spanish army might have been expected to have done, if they had had sufficient cavalry, could be easily inferred from what they had done, when, in the course of six months, it succeeded in driving 100,000 men from the provinces they had occupied, and confined them to the left bank of the Ebro. With respect to the nature of the co-operation that was adopted by his majesty's ministers, and the question, "Whether it was the best that could be resorted to under all the circumstances of the case?" he observed, that "there were two extreme opinions on the subject, and a middle one. It was this intermediate opinion that had been adopted by his majesty's ministers. One of the two other opinions was, that if Spain was really animated by the spirit of true patriotism, she had the elements of her own salvation within herself, and did not want British soldiers to fight her battles; that our co-operation needed not to go any further than supplies of money, arms, clothing, ammunition, and whatever other necessities might be wanting. Than this opinion," he thought, "nothing could be more unwise. Nothing could have tended more effectually to confirm that reproach which had been dealt out by the enemy against us, than that we should not, in this instance, have taken an active part ourselves. The other extreme was, that there was no medium between a great effort, and the greatest of which we were capable; and that not a soldier should be kept at home. Without taking any notice of the effects that such a measure might produce at home, if our utmost efforts should be attended with disaster, the thing would be in itself impracticable. There was a limit beyond which ministers could not go. In short, they must necessarily keep within the limits of the national credit, and it was unnecessary to say any thing more in answer to this second extreme opinion, than that it was impossible to act upon it. The only question then was, Whether the effort made by his majesty's ministers was sufficient? And this would be best judged of by considering it, first, as to its extent; secondly, as to its course; and thirdly, as to its ability.

"With regard to its extent, when information had been first received by his majesty's ministers, that a supply of British troops was wished for, to act in concert with the native armies of Spain, there were sent, exclusive of the 10,000 men under the Marquis Romana, liberated in the north of Europe, no less a force than 45,000 or 50,000 men, nearly 50,000 rank and file into the Peninsula. Besides this army, government had issued orders that the forces in the Mediterranean should send out detachments to act in Catalonia; though subsequent circumstances interposed to prevent those troops to be detached, from rendering that service which it was then intended to employ them in.

"The next question for the house to consider would be, if ministers gave the army of nearly 50,000 men a proper direction? He assured Mr. Ponsonby he was not now going to the Pyrenees. He could conceive a man of common sense going to St. Andero, but he could not conceive a man of sound sense going to the Pyrenees. The port of St. Andero might have been thought preferable to Corunna; but that port was extremely small, and in what situation would an army there have been in, with 40,000 or 50,000 French in the neighbourhood of Vittoria, and that army but half equipped, and all the transports going away?

"He was not going, with Mr. Ponsonby, to the Pyrenees, but merely to the question he had put, as to what could have detained the British army so long, during the interval previous to the 27th of October, on the 1st of which they made their first movement from Portugal to Spain. He had, at an early period of the campaign in Portugal, directed that a communication should be opened with the Spanish generals, on the subject of the co-operation of the British army in Spain. A letter had been accordingly sent to General Castanos on that subject; but it did not reach him till after the conclusion of the convention of Cintra. On the 25th of September, orders had been sent to Sir Hew Dalrymple, to move forward with his army towards the north of Spain; and on the same day Sir David Baird received orders to embark for Ferrol or Corunna. It was not, however, till the 29th of September, that the first letter from Lord William Bentinck, (who had been sent to attend the supreme central junta) was written, containing the answers of the junta to certain questions which he had been directed to submit to them, as well relating to the entrance of the British army into Spain, as to the manner in which it should be employed there. The answers were, that the fate of Spain depended on the early co-operation of a British force; and that they wished our forces to be concentrated as one British army. And General Castanos received orders to confer with Lord William Bentinck, as to the best mode of carrying those wishes into effect. It was proposed, that the army in Portugal should make for Burgos, by the route of Salamanca, and Sir David Baird disembark his troops at Corunna. This intelligence was received at Lisbon on the 8th of October.

"While the question respecting the operation of the British forces in Spain was pending at Madrid, the very same question was pending in London, and the very same decision was agreed to at the same time. The Marquis of Romana's opinion on this subject was in writing, and ready to be laid upon the table of the house.

"With regard to the troops not being immediately permitted to land, he would only say, that from a prior and distant application made to his majesty's government, for British troops, on the part of the juntas of Galicia and Asturias, ministers had a right to expect that no obstacle would be thrown in the way of any troops they might afterwards send. The juntas of Galicia, and on the frontiers of Leon, were apprised of the expeditions then going out; and letters to different English officers from our government, requiring them "to try every method to secure the troops accommodations on their landing," and necessaries for their continuing their march, were laid before the respective juntas. He was very sorry to say, that the juntas had neglected to act according to those communications. He did not wish to censure, or complain of their conduct; but such was the fact. Mr. Ponsonby had experienced surprise, that the movements of the British army had been so slow, and those of the French comparatively so rapid. But there was a difference between an army fully equipped, and one not equipped; between an army that would seize every thing on its way that could facilitate its march, whether provisions or carriages, and an army that could not have any such resources. Though the Spanish armies under Blake and Romana, and that of Estremadura, had, before the arrival of Sir John Moore at Salamanca, suffered severe reverses, still this was not a fair test of the general spirit of the people. They had at that period the most difficult task imposed upon them, that could devolve to the nation in such circumstances. They were at the same time to make head against a powerful enemy, and to make a government. After the march of the army from Salamanca, the only object was to draw off the forces of the enemy from pushing his conquests to the south. And surely never was a diversion more completely effected."

Lord Castlereagh ridiculed the notion of our military character being lost in consequence of the late reverses, and asked "if the disgraces of Vimeira and Corunna were to be blotted from the memories of Englishmen? If gentlemen were anxious for enquiry, they might go into a com-

BOOK VIII. mittee that would occupy them three months. Nothing, however, could be a greater mistake, than the supposition, that those who called for enquiry meant that they wanted information. He left it with confidence to the house to say, whether any case had been made out to justify the motion of the right honourable gentleman; and where no case was made out, no enquiry could be called for."

The house agreed with his lordship, the question was loudly called for, and a division took place, when there appeared for Mr. Ponsonby's motion 127, against it 220; so that the ministry had a majority of 93 in their favor.

To furnish supplies to carry on the various warfares in which Great Britain was engaged, as well as to subsidize the powers that were in concert, parliament raised the vast sum of 47,588,024*l.* on account of England.

Such considerable pecuniary assistance gave increased energy to her armies; but Bonaparte, as obstinate as he was violent, after the reduction of Madrid, had sent a large force to Talavera del Reyna, with the intention of reducing Cordova, Seville, Cadiz, and Lisbon. Oporto had been seized, without resistance, by Marshal Soult, though garrisoned by a force three times his number. Marshal Ney, strongly reinforced by Kellerman, Mortier, and Bonnel at the same time giving their assistance at Lugo, made considerable progress in the provinces of Galicia, Asturias, and Biscay. Ferrol also, Corunna, Bilbao, St. Andero, and all places of importance on the northern coast of Spain, soon were in the possession of the French army.

Bonaparte having suddenly quitted Spain, returned unexpectedly to Paris. The cause of his abrupt departure from Spain, where his presence was so necessary for carrying into complete execution his plan of subjugating that country, was owing to the hostile attitude of the Emperor of Austria, and his perseverance in the organization of the military levies.

Of the exertions made at this time on the part of Spain, the second siege and capitulation (for such it must be termed) of Saragossa, must naturally form the most leading feature.

Saragossa capitulated on the 19th of February, after a defence the most glorious and obstinate which occurs in modern history. The chief particulars of this siege we shall select from the "Exposition" of Don Pedro Maria Ric, regent of the royal audience of Arragon, dated Fonz, (a town in Arragon) June 4, and from a "narrative of the affairs of Saragossa," by Charles R. Vaughan, M. P. during a residence in that city.

On the 10th of January, the French began to bombard Saragossa, with such fury that the bravest and most intrepid men concurred in the necessity of taking precautions, and even the clergy suspended the administration of the sacraments. By this may be easily conceived the impracticability which the audience experienced of continuing its functions, since there were neither plaintiffs nor defendants, nor subordinate officers of the court, who had courage to remain there during the term of audience; and at last the members themselves were afraid, because the building being contiguous to that occupied by the general, occasioned the enemy to direct his fire principally to that quarter; and so many bombs and grenades fell, that ultimately they consumed that precious monument of antiquity, with whatever it contained, except the registers and papers, which were in the offices, and which were all that could be saved, notwithstanding the most efficacious measures.

Of Saragossa, attacked so vigorously, and constantly bombarded for forty-two days, oppressed by disease, and exhausted by famine; the fall was inevitable, especially without succours from any quarter.

Saragossa had almost exceeded the limits of possibility by her unwearied fidelity and love to her sovereign; and affairs had reached such a deplorable crisis, that, as early as the 1st of February, persons of accredited honor and loyalty came to Don Ric to suggest the necessity of capitulating, in order that he should represent it to the captain-general; and, doubtless, according to military rules, the city might, and ought, to have surrendered several days before; since, besides possessing nothing of a fortified town but the name, and even that only in the report of strangers, the batteries, which had been constructed, were demolished, and there were not only open breaches, but the enemy was already among them, occupying various points within the city. But to surrender, when their cause was so just and necessary, appeared so hard, that Don Ric improved the charge which the general had given him of rousing the people, and even availed himself of some of those who were inclined to capitulate, for carrying into effect the measures he judged proper, according to the knowledge he possessed of that people, which knowledge also afforded him many ideas which he proposed, and were adopted by the general with so good an effect, that, in spite of impossibility, the city held out till destitute of all resource. The captain-general, being himself attacked by the epidemic, transferred all his authority, and civil and military powers, to a supreme junta of government, which he formed in the night between the 18th and 19th of February, naming Don Ric president of it. Don Ric immediately summoned all its members, and they began their functions at one o'clock in the morning.

Nobody was ignorant of the lamentable desolation of the city; all called for a capitulation; and although the junta saw and thought the same, it endeavoured to see if it was possible to save it, and, in duty to their sovereign, to accomplish the services it desired; but, on investigating the real state of affairs, there was not a heart capable of sustaining so deplorable a situation. The chiefs of the army were called for, to give their opinions verbally, and in writing; the major-general of cavalry represented the impracticability of further defence, there remaining only sixty-two weak and unserviceable horses, the rest having died of hunger; the major-general of infantry presented a statement of the army, by which it appeared there were only 2,822 men fit for service. The commandant of artillery urged the surrender, on account of the ammunition being nearly exhausted, and not having any more than was manufactured in the inquisition, which manufacture would vanish the moment a bomb or grenade fell there. The commandant of engineers reported the fortifications unserviceable, and the means of repairing them wanting, as there were neither men nor materials, and all the cloth which could serve for bags of earth was consumed.

All these chiefs not only gave their opinion for the surrender of the place, but held the junta responsible to God and the king for the many lives which were every moment sacrificed, as it was morally impossible to save the city, whose surrender would not prevent it from returning to the dominion of its legitimate sovereign, if the nation triumphed over him who so unjustly oppressed it.

The junta, appalled by so melancholy a representation, wished to hear the opinion of Lieutenant-general Don Philip San Marc, who was one of its members. This worthy general had so signally manifested his loyalty, valour, and military talents, that his vote could not fail to satisfy the general-in-chief, the junta, and all the people, since all were witnesses of those estimable qualities. This discreet and brave general stated ingenuously, that if the enemy made a general attack, as was to be feared from the preparations which were observable, the utter ruin of Saragossa was inevitable, together with all that accumulation of horror and calamity consequent on the fury with which the French troops treated every town they conquered, and which would be greater in that city, on account of the wrathful hatred with which it was viewed by them, their chiefs, and their emperor; but, that, if the attacks were partial, like those they repeatedly made every day, the city might hold out for two, or four days at most, provided that more people were furnished for defence, and for the works; it being understood that this defence was to be attempted only in case of their being well-founded expectations of speedy relief, since otherwise it would be highly reprehensible to sacrifice so many persons as perished daily; the surrender of the city being unavoidable within the short term mentioned.

In order to proceed with due knowledge, the Duke of Villahermosa went to inquire of the general what intelligence he had respecting succours, and as he was so seriously ill that he could give no account of any thing, they demanded of the secretary the letters and documents he might have on that subject, who transmitted an enigmatical scrap of paper, necessity so requiring it, as it had to pass through the enemy's line: it appeared to be from the Conde de Montijo: in it he informed the general that himself and the Duke del Infantado wished to come to the relief of Saragossa, but that the central junta had ordered that "the Swiss should go," and they were to fall upon Madrid. By the Swiss, the junta understood Don Theodore Reding; and, although the fame of this brave general was sufficient to encourage it, it could not rely much on his assistance, because, being in Catalonia, he had to cross the Ebro, which was more than difficult, on account of the enemy having possessed himself of the suburb, thereby preventing the passage over the stone-bridge. Another letter was sent by the secretary, which was from Don Francisco Palafox, to his brother, the general of Arragon: that zealous representative manifested, in the most striking manner, how many and great exertions he had in vain made to collect troops, and that, destitute of the resources he wished for, he was then at Tortosa assembling the peasantry and some troops of the garrisons on the coast, which he designed to reinforce with some gun-boats that were to ascend the Ebro.

These papers were of a very anterior date; and, all circumstances considered, induced the belief that the nation had suffered misfortunes in common with Saragossa, which prevented it from affording relief. It was known that the brave and intrepid Perena had collected a body of peasantry, but it was thought to be certain that they had been defeated, as the French general had stated in his last summons; and, besides, it was not likely that a body of inexperienced peasants, in want of arms and ammunition, could encounter so formidable an army as that which besieged Saragossa.

While the junta was deliberating on the part it ought to take, the enemy renewed the bombardment in a tremendous manner: no one believed that the city could or ought to hold out any longer; but it was distressing to abandon a treasure like Saragossa, which had acquired the esteem of all Spain, and even of all Europe! Of thirty-four members, who composed the junta, only eight were of opinion with Don Pedro Maria Ric, that the city should be maintained; not because the grounds on which the others voted were unknown, but with the desperate resolution of braving the last danger, in the hope that it was within the bounds of possibility that some relief might arrive. It was at length agreed to acquaint the general with the deplorable state of the city, in order that he should send a flag of truce to the French general, requesting a suspension of hostilities for three days, which he did, assigning for his object, the sending officers to ascertain the situation and condition of their armies, and to treat for the surrender of the place, according to the intelligence they might bring. This mode had been proposed by Marshal Lasnes himself, in the above-named summons, notwithstanding which, he replied that it offended him exceedingly, and vented several threats against the city, unless it surrendered immediately—the flag returned with a second letter, in which he was reminded that the proposal came from himself, and was invented by the French, who practised it in one of the towns of Portugal—to this he gave no other reply than a shower of grenades, bombs, and shot; and, at a favorable time, ordered his troops to make the attack in several places in a manner that was irresistible. The Spaniards lost that evening the quarter of the Tanneries, and a part of the Strand leading to the stone-bridge, and the Puerto-del-Angel, which point, if in possession of the enemy, facilitated to him the massacre of the inhabitants, without having recourse to mines and explosions. The acquisition of each house had cost him a struggle. That same evening the Spaniards had the misfortune to have four cannon spiked, which were in the battery of the wooden-bridges; and notwithstanding this was supposed to be treacherously done, it could not be ascertained, circumstances not affording the opportunity for investigation.

General San Marc, knowing the small number of men that remained for the defence of the city, requested of Don Ric only two hundred for the points attacked; he immediately took measures, which, at another time, would have produced a thousand armed peasants within a quarter of an hour, since, besides, having that same day charged Don Miguel Marraco, beneficed priest of Pilar, and commissioned by the general with the organization of the peasantry, to form a reserve of a thousand armed men, and another thousand for the works, he sent him an impressive note, capable of inflaming the most lukewarm; a similar one he addressed to Don Mariano Cerezo, an honorable citizen, who, from the commencement of the war, had known how to improve his influence with the people; a third he sent to a priest named Laborde, who, a short time previously, had united with several ecclesiastics and friars, for the purpose of training and encouraging the peasants; he likewise ordered the générale to be beaten, in the new tower, and profiting by a favorable moment when the enemy was driven by the bayonet from the Convent del Sepulchro, directed the public crier to run through the streets, proclaiming that they contended successfully; and, by the sound of the trumpet, calling on the people to complete the victory!

This ended, General San Marc came to inform Don Ric that seventeen men only had joined him, which clearly shewed the diminution of inhabitants; and, indeed, the few who remained alive were either sick, or attending those that were attacked by the disorder. Never were the reports from the various commanders so melancholy as on that day; one complained of being cut off; another that the enemy were about to do so; another that they had undermined him, and in the same manner the others; all called for troops, ammunition, and labourers, at a time when all were wanting; in short, the painful moment arrived when every one was convinced of the necessity of surrendering, since the contrary, so far from benefiting the city, gave greater advantages to the enemy in the effects he would have made himself master of by entering with fire and sword.

The junta dispatched a flag of truce to Marshal Lasnes, requesting a suspension of hostilities for twenty-four hours, to negotiate the capitulation, and, at the same time, ordered the almoners of each parish to acquaint their parishioners with the state of the city, and to transmit to the junta the opinion they formed in consequence. In this situation of affairs, a French officer, said to be commandant of the besieging-artillery, was brought to Don Ric, who informed him that his general, in consequence of the flag of truce, had determined that the junta should wait upon him within two hours. Don Ric instantly ordered it to assemble; and, as all the members could not be collected with that promptitude which the French officer desired, (who assured him that, after the time was expired, the general would not listen to them,) he resolved to proceed with some of those who had met, leaving three or four to acquaint the others with the result of the flag of truce, and to take such measures as circumstances might require.

The firing continued with vigour on both sides, and it seemed expedient to take a trumpeter with them to announce the parley; but, notwithstanding this, the enemy's battery at Trinitarios discharged a royal grenade at Don Ric and his companions; which violation of the rights of men, Don Ric directly remonstrated against, refusing to proceed further, unless assurance was given that the laws of war should be observed; an aid-de-camp of the French general, who, a little while before, had come to announce that the junta was to repair to the Casa Blanca, which is a large "white house," situated near the end of the canal of Arragon, between two and three miles from Saragossa, and not to the suburb, whither it had been ordered, was immediately dispatched, who gave directions that the junta should be respected; and, for greater security, brought an escort of infantry to conduct it to the presence of Marshal Lasnes.

The marshal was surrounded by general officers, and various persons of inferior rank: he received the junta with extraordinary gravity, and, after the usual formalities on both sides, took some turns about the room, treating it with the greatest indifference, and even contempt. At length, addressing himself to Don Ric, as president, he began to reprove Saragossa with much severity, enlarging on the little consideration it deserved, especially for not having credited his assertion when he summoned it to surrender.—The president cut him short, by saying that he disquieted himself to no purpose, because the junta had commenced its sessions only on the preceding day, and could not be responsible for what was not under its direction: that to have surrendered, without ascertaining the necessity of it, would have been a madness which the marshal himself ought to consider as such, but that, informed of the real state of affairs, and bearing in mind that summons of which he made so much merit, it had considered of a capitulation, for which purpose the letter he stated to have given so much offence, had been sent by the captain-general: that this had been repeated, at the same time acquainting him with the reasons for demanding a suspension of hostilities, and that some of their officers might go out to investigate the state of the nation: which, not having merited a reply from him, the junta had of itself dispatched a third flag, requesting a suspension for twenty-four hours, which term was necessary for ascertaining the will of the people, to whom it was accountable; because Saragossa, which had so eminently distinguished itself in the mode of carrying on the war, ought also to distinguish itself in the mode of capitulating; since, among all the places conquered by the French, none had been found possessing the honor, sincerity, and good faith, of Saragossa; and that, acting on these principles, it was his duty to represent that he brought neither powers nor instructions, nor did he yet know the will of the people, but that he supposed they would accept a capitulation, if it was reasonable, and becoming the heroism with which the city had defended itself.

This admirable address, it appears, disarmed the stern marshal; since, laying aside the bitter reproaches he had used, he said that the women and children should be respected, and that the negotiation was concluded. But, Don Ric replied, it was not yet begun; because that was surrendering at discretion, which was very far from the intentions of Saragossa; and if the marshal insisted on that idea, he might follow up his attacks on the city, whither the president would return with his companions, and continue to defend themselves, since there were yet arms, ammunition, and daggers; and, as the fortune of war was precarious, it would finally be seen for whom victory declared.

The marshal then called his secretary, and dictated the preamble of the capitulation, and some of the articles; which, when read, Don Ric proposed an addition to be made to the first, stipulating that the garrison should, as became it, march out with military honors, to be stated by the major-general of infantry, whom he had taken with him for that purpose. Lasnes would not consent to the article being expressed in any other terms than those he had prescribed; but promised, on his word of honor, that the garrison should not only march out with military honors, but that the officers should retain their baggage, and the soldiers their knapsacks. Don Ric also proposed the articles respecting religion and the laws, which were granted, though not with the specification suggested relative to the privileges of the Spanish kingdom.

He likewise proposed another article, by which liberty should be guaranteed to General Don Joseph Palafox, to go wherever he pleased, with all his staff; the marshal replied, that a particular individual never was the subject of capitulation, but that he pledged his word of honor, General Palafox should go wherever he wished, to Mallen, to Toledo,—and on the president's saying these places would not suit him, on account of being occupied by French troops, whose presence could not be agreeable, and, moreover, that he had understood he thought of proceeding to Majorca; Lasnes gave his word of honor that he should go to whatever place was convenient to him.

On the same security the marshal offered to give a passport for Don Ric, and as many as wished to leave Saragossa, in order to avoid the contagion; adding, that the article he proposed on this head was unnecessary, as he was desirous of terminating the capitulation, and that all who wished it might go out.

Whilst two copies of the capitulation were drawing up, Lasnes produced a topographical plan of Saragossa, pointing out the part which would have been blown up that night, for which purpose 44,000 lbs. of powder were already lodged; this was to be followed by a bombardment from thirty mortars and seventy pieces of cannon, which at that time they were mounting in the suburb; (it was in fact known, that a number of batteries and embrasures had been constructed in that quarter.) Immediately he changed his discourse, and descanted on the benefits lavished by the emperor and his brother Joseph, whose speech, in reply to that of the auxiliary Bishop of Madrid, he read. Little could be said against the account he gave of their conquests and victories, because the siegè having been so rigorous, nothing was known of what occurred out of Saragossa. He then held out a parcel of papers, which appeared to be French journals, but not one of the junta took or even noticed them. Duplicates of the capitulation being signed, the president withdrew with his companions, carrying a copy to lay before the other members of the junta, who accepted, ratified, and signed it, assured of the wish of the city.

The junta resolved that Don Ric should try if the French general would grant some additions they considered necessary, which were a statement in the capitulation of the honors of war, which, on his word, he had promised to the garrison; since, otherwise, they would not be mentioned in the gazettes, where the written capitulation only appears. It was also required that the peasants, who had been compelled to take arms, in order to form temporary corps, should not be prisoners of war, since they ought not to be considered as regular soldiers; and, besides, would be a severe loss to manufactures and agriculture. Lastly, on the petition of the clergy, an additional article was solicited, stipulating the punctual payment of their revenues from the funds assigned by the government, which, to the junta, appeared very proper, as, without it, the clergy would be reduced to indigence; and as, in fact, they had been, not receiving any dues except those arising from funerals.

But scarcely had he begun his proposals, in terms which neither could or ought to have offended any one, when Marshal Lasnes flew into a violent rage, and snatching the paper from him, threw it behind him into the fire, of which action it appeared one of his generals was ashamed, since he stooped to rescue it from the flames.

Lasnes strongly insisted on the prompt surrender of the city; and Don Ric, with the rest of the junta, returned to it, after having requested, that, as the capitulation had been ratified, the corresponding copy should be delivered to them, which was done.

However, before the surrender took place, several French officers and soldiers entered the city in search of wine, and to walk about, and were received in a manner answerable to the capitulation, in the expectation that they would on their part observe it as they ought; but, so far from that, they began that night the most atrocious pillage imaginable, continuing it with such effrontery, that the day following they robbed publicly, and without the least reserve; their licentiousness went still further, since the governor, whom they had placed in Saragossa, having ordered the metropolitan chapter, prelates, curates, &c. to go and compliment the marshal, which was faithfully performed, the most painfully-cruel violations followed: the curate of San Lorenzo was robbed of his gown, in the Plaza del Carmen, a friar of his hood, and another priest of his cape, tearing from him even his shoes. Don Ric ceased not from making repeated and strong remonstrances; but either he received no answer, or was told that the evil was unavoidable, because the troops had to indemnify themselves for the plunder they looked upon as certain, and which they would have had the next day; but in the president's opinion, and that of many others, they stole, particularly mules, in concert with the French generals: since redress could not be obtained, notwithstanding that many times restitution of the mules was demanded before the completion of the robbery; and a Frenchman, from whom they had stolen twelve, succeeded, on account of being a Frenchman, in getting them restored; but with the hint that one of them was adapted for the coach of the general-in-chief, to whom he had to present it. They took possession of the public funds, plundered the magazines even of the army, and introduced into the city confusion and disorder, at the same time that they wished to be treated with kindness and attention. They demanded of Don Ric 50,000 pair of shoes, 8,000 pair of boots, and 1,200 shirts, the whole new; a large quantity of medicines, with every requisite for a hospital; and a service of china for General Junot, and that a tennis-court should be fitted up where he might play. Several officers demanded table-equipage and linen; even curtains, pens, paper, &c. &c. there not being a single article which they did not exact, with injunctions that it might be good and abundant, and, above all, at the expense of the unhappy Spaniards.

The reader may easily conceive how much the president had to dispute and suffer, in order to avoid these exorbitant demands, which would forever have completed the ruin of Saragossa. He contended with firmness against maintaining the chiefs of the French army, who so eagerly wished to support their pompous titles at the cost of others, till, after several debates, they threatened him with sending in a squadron of hussars, to which he replied, that well they might, since the gates of the city were demolished and in their power; but, that the nation would avenge the outrage, and from that moment they would not advance a foot of ground without first moistening it with French blood.

Notwithstanding Marshal Lasnes' word of honor, Don Joseph Palafox was immediately made a prisoner, surrounded by French, and destitute of necessary food. He was soon afterwards carried towards France; but they were obliged to halt with him on account of the illness he laboured under, from which he had not recovered when they had torn him away from the town. Death at last released the hero from his troubles.

In vain were all Don Ric's endeavours to prevent the removal of the jewels belonging to the Lady of Pilar, which, by order of the marshal, were carried to the Casa Blanca, and returned again, with the specious pretext, that they wished to make an offering of them to Maria Santissima, and to worship her with the greatest splendour, especially on the day of the marshal's entry; but, soon afterwards, the governor sent for Don Ric to wait upon him, accompanied by a member of the junta who understood the French language: he did not explain the object of this order, nor could Don Ric go, on account of being ill, but the member of the junta having gone, he told him that it was necessary to make a present to the principal officers of the army, intimating the sum or value of about 80,000 dollars, for the commander-in-chief, and in the same proportion for the rest. This shock was terrible to a town like Saragossa, particularly at a time when all was misery, desolation, and wretchedness; the metropolitan chapter continuing its great services in favor of the king and the people and desirous of ransoming these from farther troubles at the expense of any sacrifice whatsoever, afforded the means of surmounting the difficulty, by bestowing the jewels that might be requisite, from their Lady of Pilar, which in every respect were considered as very insecure from French rapacity; some members of the said chapter and of the junta conveyed the resolution to Don Ric, and he had to carry into effect the measures agreed to by them; but not one of the French generals accepted the jewel assigned him; and the affair terminated in ordering him to remain in his house, and that one member only of the junta should go with the jewels to the French governor, where a commissary, who occasionally acted as intendant, met him; and, taking the jewels, proceeded with the member to the church of Pilar, to carry away the remainder, Marshal Lasnes, as was reported, retaining the whole.

The two or three times that Don Ric waited on the marshal, in order to tender the resignation of his employments, and treat of public concerns, he was never received; and it seems that on the day of his entry into Saragossa, he did not wish even to hear him, notwithstanding the attachment which the French have for harangues, since the above-mentioned commissary informed Don Ric, before-hand, that he would address the marshal in his name, so that he had not to speak a word.

At length Don Ric obtained his wish, the French having reinstated, in the post of president, his predecessor, Don Joseph de Villa y Torre; restoring Don Ric to that of auditor, and having officially renounced that also, since all the members were summoned except the auditor.

The fall of Saragossa was an event of great importance to the French emperor; yet the valour which protracted this melancholy event for the space of three months, must excite the wonder and kindle the enthusiasm of future generations! Nor had the invaders much to boast of, who against an open city, with natural and weak defences, employed subterraneous warfare, the last resource for subduing a city unconquerable by other means. More than 30,000 soldiers, the flower of the Spanish armies, 160 pieces of artillery, 60,000 muskets, all was lost with Saragossa; 500 officers lay beneath her venerable ruins. So many sacrifices, such enormous losses of houses and property, besides the lives of numberless inhabitants, which left the streets of that august capital desert, delivered the southern provinces of Spain from the invasion of the enemy, and will ever cause the name of Saragossa to be pronounced with affection, by patriots of all ages and countries.

On the surrender of Saragossa, a glorious decree was issued by the body executing the supreme authority of the state, from which the following is an extract:

"Spaniards! Saragossa is still standing, and lives in imitation and in example; she survives still in public spirit, which is ever imbibing lessons of valour and constancy from energies so heroic; for who is the Spaniard, proud of that name, who would be less than the brave Saragossans, and not seal the proclaimed liberty of his country, and his promised fidelity to his king, at the cost of the same perils and the same labours? Let vile egotists, and men without courage, be alarmed at these, but not the other towns of Arragon, who are ready to imitate and deliver their capital—not the firm and loyal patriots who behold in that town a model to imitate, a vengeance to take, and the sole path of conquest. Forty thousand Frenchmen, who have perished before the feeble walls which defended Saragossa, cause France to deplore the barren and ephemeral triumph she has gained, and evince to Spain that three towns, of equal constancy and resolution, will save the country and disconcert her tyrants. Valour springs from valour; and when the unhappy, who have suffered there, shall hear that their fellow-citizens, following them in the paths of glory, have been more favored by fortune, they will bless their destiny, however hard, and look forward with joy to new triumphs."

NOTWITHSTANDING the unpromising state of affairs, the British ministry was determined neither to abandon the cause of Europe in its demonstrations on the Peninsula, nor to alter the course it had pursued in respect to this war. Sir Arthur Wellesley was appointed to the command of the British army, and active preparations were made for a new campaign. He sailed from Portsmouth, April 15, in the Surveillante, and arrived at Lisbon on the 22d.

On the side of Portugal, General Beresford, who had been dignified with the rank and title of Field-marshal, was also appointed generalissimo, and employed the honors he had attained, as well as the power with which he was endued, in organizing and disciplining a Portuguese army; which he accomplished with great activity and success. He adopted the laudable practice of occasionally issuing bulletins, not only for the information of the army which he was forming, but also for the whole Portuguese nation; by which he communicated events, as they occurred, whether they were favorable or otherwise, taking care, however, to intersperse his information with such hints as fully evinced the good effects of order and discipline on one hand, and the fatal issue of insubordination and confusion on the other.

The Spanish troops, under Silveira, in the mean time, cut off the communications of the French in the north of Portugal, by the successful siege of the important frontier-town of Chaves, in the province of Tralos Montes. Notwithstanding its being supposed to possess a garrison of 10,000 men, it capitulated on the 25th of March, and greatly tended to inspire troops which had already suffered every discouragement, and prepare them to bear up against the reverses to which they were unhappily more liable.

This spirit became shortly put to the test by the failure of an attack on Victor, who had drawn up his army of 20,000 infantry and 3,000 cavalry in front of Medellin, a town on the Guadiana, in Estremadura. In close columns, prepared for attack or defence, the flanks covered by cavalry, and in front six batteries, the enemy was vigorously attacked by Cuesta, who failed by the defection of the cavalry, which supported his left wing on an attack from that of the French: it was consequently thrown into disorder, and compelled to leave the whole brunt of the action on the right. The infantry, nevertheless, evinced great steadiness; a great loss of officers and men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was the result, and General Cuesta cashiered some others. A much more important result, however, ensued in the celerity with which he was enabled to reassemble the army after his retreat, and render it again formidable to the enemy.

Nothing could exceed the many formed exaggerations of the soi-disant King Joseph on this action, which tended to shew the importance attached to it; an importance, nevertheless, which could not but be decreased by the speedy reformation of the broken army.

The Spanish general and his troops were pronounced, by a decree of the supreme junta, to have deserved well of their country. Those who particularly distinguished themselves were honored and promoted; and the pay for one month of two regiments of cavalry, and two of Chasseurs, which accompanied them, was mulcted, and applied to the reward of those who had given so much promise to the future energies of Spain.

Marshal Beresford had already commenced operations in his new character, and prepared reinforcements for Sir Robert Wilson, among the mountains southward of Salamanca, as well as an auxiliary force to General Cuesta, of between 2 and 3,000 men, for a post on the line of the Thietar.

Sir Arthur Wellesley having arrived at Coimbra, May 2, passed through an acclaiming multitude to the rich augustine monastery of Santa Cruz, appointed his head-quarters, reviewed the army on the fine plain below the city, May 6, and was highly satisfied.

Determined on marching, with nearly the whole of his force, against Marshal Soult at Oporto, Sir Arthur Wellesley was suddenly there and a part of his army in advance for that city. Lieutenant-general Payne, on the 8th, with the cavalry and infantry under Major-generals Cotton and Hill, marched by Averro, where the infantry was to embark for Ovar, and turn the enemy's right by the coast. Marshal Beresford made a feint or diversion with his division, by Lameigo on the upper Douro. The remainder moved towards Aveiro.

Marshal Soult aware of his inequality to maintain Oporto against the united British force which was marching against him, had recourse to stratagem; first, to enable him to withdraw his troops with safety, and next, if favored by fortune, to endeavour to draw after him, northward, Sir Arthur Wellesley; which would thus leave Victor the opportunity of marching the French force, that after the battle of Medellin had remained stationary between Merida and Badajos, by the Tagus, into the south of Portugal. But the judgment and vigilance of the British commander, and his active generals-of-division, precluded his accomplishment of either the one or the other; and, therefore, notwithstanding the hypercriticisms on the declarations contained in Sir Arthur Wellesley's dispatch upon the action which ensued, Marshal Soult must be considered as having suffered a signal defeat.

Soult having determined to evacuate Oporto, and pass through Leon to the French force in Galicia, on the principle of concentration, took care to have it generally understood, that, certain of receiving due succours, and confident in his own strength, he was determined to defend Oporto to the last extremity. In the mean time, however, he manœvered his troops about the city, and for that ostensible purpose sent out a considerable body in detachments, many of which never returned. Of the body which remained, the British troops left few to follow.

Nothing could be more steady or vigorous than the advance of the British army, according to every account.

The advanced-guard and the cavalry had marched on the 7th, and the whole had halted on the 8th, to afford time for Marshal Beresford, with his corps, to arrive upon the upper Douro.

The infantry of the army was formed into three divisions for this expedition, of which two, the advanced-guard, consisting of the Hanoverian legion, and Brigadier-general R. Stewart's brigade, with a brigade of six-pounders, and a brigade of three-pounders, under Lieutenant-general Paget, and the cavalry, under Lieutenant-general Payne, and the brigade of guards, Brigadier-general Campbell, and Brigadier-general Sontag's brigades of infantry, with a brigade of six-pounders, under Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke, moved by the high road from Coimbra to Oporto; and one composed of Major-general Hill's, and Brigadier-general Cameron's brigades of infantry, and a brigade of six-pounders, under the command of Major-general Hill, by the road from Coimbra to Aveiro.

On the 10th, in the morning before day-light, the cavalry and the advanced-guard crossed the Vouga with the intention to surprise and cut off four regiments of French cavalry, and a battalion of infantry and artillery, cantoned in Albagana Nova, and the neighbouring villages, about eight miles from that river, in the last of which they failed; but the superiority of the British cavalry was evident throughout the day. They took some prisoners and their cannon from them; and the advanced-guard took up the position of Oliveira.

On the same day, Major-general Hill, who had embarked at Aveiro, on the evening of the 9th, arrived at Ovar in the rear of the enemy's right, and the head of Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke's division passed the Vouga on the same evening.

On the 11th, the advanced-guard and cavalry continued to move on the high road towards Oporto, with Major-general Hill's division, in a parallel road which leads to Oporto from Ovar.

On the arrival of the advance at Vendas Novas, between Santo Redondo and Grijon, they fell in with the out-post of the enemy's advanced-guard, which were immediately driven in, and shortly afterwards they discovered the enemy's advanced-guard, consisting of about 4,000 infantry, and some squadrons of cavalry, strongly posted on the heights above Gijon; their fronts being covered with woods and broken grounds. The enemy's left flank was turned, by a movement well executed by Major-general Murray, with Brigadier-general Langwerth's brigade of the Hanoverian legion, whilst the 16th Portuguese regiment of Brigadier-general Richard Stewart's brigade attacked their right, and the rifle-men of the 95th, and the flank-companies of the 29th, 43d, and 52d, of the same brigade, under Major Way, attacked the infantry in the wood and villages, in their centre. These attacks soon obliged the enemy to give way, and the honorable Brigadier-general Charles Stewart, and two squadrons of the 16th and 20th dragoons, under the command of Major Blake, having pursued the enemy, destroyed several, and took many prisoners.

On the night of the 11th, the enemy crossed the Douro, and destroyed the bridge over that river.

It was important with a view to the opera-

BOOK VIII. tions of Marshal Beresford, that Sir Arthur CHAP. VII. Wellesley should cross the Douro immediately, 1809. and he had sent Major-general Murray in the morning with a battalion of the Hanoverian legions, a squadron of cavalry, and two six-pounders, to endeavour to collect boats, and, if possible, to cross the river at Avintas, about four miles above Oporto, and he had as many boats as could be collected brought to the ferry, immediately above the towns of Oporto and Villa Novo. The ground on the right bank of the river at this ferry is protected and commanded by the fire of cannon placed on the heights of the Siena Convent, at Villa Nova; and there appeared to be a good position for the British troops on the opposite side of the river, till they should be collected in sufficient numbers.

The enemy took no notice of their collection of boats, or of the embarkation of the troops, till after the first battalion, (the buffs,) were landed, and had taken up their position under the command of Lieutenant-general Paget, on the opposite side of the river. They then commenced an attack upon them with a large body of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, under the command of Marshal Soult, which that corps most gallantly sustained till supported successively by the 48th and 66th regiments, belonging to Major-general Hill's brigade, and a Portuguese battalion, and afterwards by the first battalion of detachments, belonging to Brigadier-general Richard Stewart's brigade.

Lieutenant-general Paget was unfortunately wounded soon after the attack commenced, when the command of those gallant troops devolved upon Major-general Hill.

Although the French made repeated attacks upon them, they made no impression; and, at last, Major-general Murray having appeared on the enemy's left flank, on his march from Avin-tos, which he had crossed, and Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke, who by this time had availed himself of the enemy's weakness in the town of Oporto, and crossed the Douro, at the ferry, between the towns of Villa Nova and Oporto, having appeared on their right, with the brigade of guards and the 29th regiment, the whole retired in the utmost confusion towards Amarantha; leaving behind them five pieces of cannon, eight ammunition tumbrils, and many prisoners. The enemy's loss in this action was very great: it is supposed they left upwards of 700 behind them in Oporto sick and wounded. Brigadier-general the honorable Charles Stewart now directed a charge, by a squadron of the 14th dragoons, under the command of Major Harvey, whomade a successful attack upon the enemy's rear-guard. In the different actions with the enemy, the British lost some, and the immediate services of other, valuable officers and soldiers.

After the evacuation of Oporto by the French,
the commander-in-chief took the laudable precaution to issue the following proclamation:

"Inhabitants of Oporto!—As the French troops have been expelled from this city, by the bravery and discipline of the army which I command, I require from the inhabitants that they shall comport themselves with compassion and humanity towards the said troops who may be made prisoners. By the laws of war they are entitled to my protection, and it is my duty to afford it. It would be very inconsistent with the generosity and magnanimity of the Portuguese nation to revenge upon unfortunate individuals
the outrages and calamities which it has suffered;
I direct the inhabitants of the city to remain tranquil in the town, and that no person that does not belong to a military corps shall appear armed in the city. In case of this order being contravened, or of any attack being made upon the said individuals, such persons shall be punished as guilty of having disobeyed my orders
—I appoint Colonel Trant commandant of this city, unless the government of his royal highness shall object to this nomination. I order the commander to use all the means necessary to enforce obedience to this order, and to produce the effect of complete tranquillity and peace, for which I am so anxiously solicitous.

(Signed) "ARTHUR WELLESLEY.

"Head-quarters, Oporto, May 13, 1809."

Nothing could be more judicious than this proclamation in the second city of Portugal, where, among the first objects which presented themselves, were the stripped bodies of the dead enemy.

The army was there received, as it had been every where, with the highest demonstrations of joy; and as on the march the officers had been received in the houses of the inhabitants, and the troops into the convents; so in Oporto they were all received by the inhabitants with hospitality.
The ladies graced their entrance by waving their handkerchiefs from the balconies; the aged wept and blessed them: and, indeed, though charges of this kind are successively made as of course, by every army which succeeds another, there was sufficient evidence that the French soldiery under Loison had so particularly degraded themselves, by enormities against the people of Oporto, as to hand his name down with the especial infamy of those transactions.

Soult, notwithstanding his evident determination to evacuate Oporto, certainly did not count upon the rapidity of the British operations, and therefore fairly incurred the censure of being surprised. Having destroyed the bridge of Amarantha, by which Marshal Beresford was to pass, and dispatched Loison there, he evidently counted upon a leisure which Sir Arthur Wellesley denied him. Above a thousand sick were found in the hospitals.

The British army continued indefatigable in the pursuit of the French, of which there was every prospect of success. By a variety of feints, however, and forced marches, their general drew them towards the mountains.

When Sir Arthur Wellesley determined upon the expedition to the north of Portugal, against Marshal Soult, he was in hopes that the Portuguese general, Silveira, would be able to hold his post upon the Tamaga till he should be reinforced, by which, and by the possession of Chaves, the enemy's retreat would have been cut off, excepting across the Minho; and Sir Arthur intended, if successful, to press him so hard, as that the passage of that river would have been impracticable. The loss of the bridge of Amarantha, however, on the 2d inst. altered his prospects; he had then no hopes that Marshal Beresford, who marched towards the upper part of the Douro on the 5th, and arrived at Lamego on the 10th, would be able to effect more than confine the enemy on that side, and oblige him to retire by Chaves into Galicia, rather than by Villa Real into Castile. General Beresford, however, having obliged the enemy's posts at Villa Real, and Maisan Frien, to fall back with some loss; and, having crossed the Douro, drove in General Loison's out-posts at the bridge of Amarantha, and again acquired possession of the left bank of the Tamaga on the 12th, the day which the corps under Sir Arthur Wellesley's command formed the passage of the Douro at Oporto.

Loison retired from Amarantha on the morning of the 13th, as soon as he had heard of the events at Oporto of the preceding day, and met the advanced-guard of the French army at a short distance from the town, which General Beresford immediately occupied. Sir Arthur Wellesley was unable to commence the pursuit of the enemy till the morning of the 13th, when the Hanoverian legion moved to Valonga, under Major-general Murray. On that evening he was informed that the enemy had in the morning destroyed a great proportion of his cannon, in the neighbourhood of Penafrel, and had directed his march towards Braga.

This appeared to be the probable result of the situation in which he found himself, in consequence of General Beresford's operations upon the Tamaga; and, as soon as Sir Arthur Wellesley had ascertained that the fact was true, he marched, on the morning of the 14th, with the army in two columns, towards the river Minho.

At the same time Sir Arthur directed General Beresford upon Chaves, in case the enemy should turn to his right; and Major-general Murray to communicate with General Beresford, if he should find, as reported, that Loison remained in the neighbourhood of Amarantha. BOOK VIII.

CHAP. VII.

On the evening of the 14th Sir Arthur Wellesley was certain, from the movements of the enemy's detachments in the neighbourhood of Braga, that he intended to direct his retreat upon Chaves, or Monte Alegre, and directed General Beresford, in case of the latter movement, to push on for Monterey, so as to stop the enemy, if he should pass by Villa de Ric. General Beresford had anticipated Sir Arthur's orders to march his own corps upon Chaves, and had already sent General Silveira to occupy the passes of Tuivaes and Melgassy, near Salomonde, but he was unfortunately too late.

Sir Arthur Wellesley arrived at Braga on the 15th, General Murray being at Guimaraens, and the enemy about fifteen miles in their front; and at Salomonde, on the 16th, they had an affair with the rear-guard. The guards, under Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke and Brigadier-general Campbell, attacked their position; and, having turned their left-flank by the heights, they abandoned it, leaving a gun and some prisoners behind them. This attack was necessarily made at a late hour in the evening.

On the 17th, Sir Arthur Wellesley moved to Ruiveas, waiting to see whether the enemy would turn upon Chaves, or continue his retreat upon Monte Alegre, and on the 18th to Monte Alegre; where Sir Arthur Wellesley found that he had taken a road through the mountains towards Orense, by which it would be difficult, if not impossible, for him to overtake him, and on which he had no means of stopping him.

The enemy commenced his retreat, by destroying a great proportion of his guns and ammunition. He afterwards destroyed the remainder of both, and a great proportion of his baggage, and kept nothing, excepting what the soldiers and a few mules could carry. He left behind him his sick and wounded; and the road from Penafrel to Monte Alegre, was strewed with the carcasses of horses and mules, and French soldiers, who were put to death by the peasantry before the British advanced-guard could save them.

Their soldiers had plundered and murdered the peasantry at their pleasure; and Sir Arthur Wellesley saw many persons hanging in the trees by the sides of the road, executed for no reason that he could learn, excepting that they had not been friendly to the French invasion and usurpation of the government of their country; and the route of their column, on their retreat, could be traced by the smoke of the villages to which they set fire.

The British took about 500 prisoners. Upon

BOOK VIII. the whole, the enemy had not lost less than a fourth of his army, and all his artillery and equipments, since attacked upon the Vouga.

CHAP. VII.

Notwithstanding the desolation produced in the French army by this pursuit, the loss of the British was, according to the best estimates, more trifling than could be admitted as probable, were it not that while the troops pursued with the utmost rapidity, they did not abandon any of the equipments or stores of their force as was constantly the case with the French.

After Sir Arthur Wellesley had determined to discontinue the further pursuit of Marshal Soult's army, and to return with the British troops to the southward, he heard that Marshal Victor had broken up on the Guadiana, and had made an attack, and had carried Alcantara on the 14th.

A small garrison, consisting of the second battalion of the Lusitanian legion, under Colonel Mayne, and the Idanha Nova battalion of Portuguese militia, had occupied that place since the army marched to the northward, which it was forced to evacuate with some loss, in consequence of this attack.

An attempt was made to blow-up the bridge over the Tagus, which failed, and the enemy's cavalry crossed immediately.

The extensive line of country occupied by the 1st battalion of the Lusitanian legion, and the Spanish troops and Portuguese cavalry by which it was reinforced, forming the advance of the corps of observation, left by Sir Arthur Wellesley under General Mackenzie, at Abrantes, extending from Almeida on the left, to the inaccessible Sierra de Franca on the right, with a garrison of six thousand Spaniards at Ciudad Rodrigo, in their rear, made such a demonstration towards the enemy as could not but leave him in doubt,—a doubt difficult to solve,—whether a force, by many multiplications more powerful, might not defend the whole eastern frontier of Portugal.

In fact, not only every means was strictly practised to preclude the enemy from ascertaining the real strength, or rather weakness, of the force employed; but even the allies had reason to conceive it much greater than it ever was. For the advanced posts of the French were even attacked, and piquets surprised and captured, and every thing wore the appearance of offensive activity, so that the supreme junta of Spain placed under the chief command of Sir Robert Wilson the whole of the Spanish troops in Leon.

That the reader may form some idea of the gallantry of the Lusitanian legion, we shall instance a few of their early efforts.

A small French force, forming an out-post at the village of Labobada, Sir Robert Wilson with his British officers and some dragoons of the legion, galloped into it, surprized, and after a short resistance, made the whole prisoners. Captain Picaluci, Lusitanian light-horse, acting aide-de-camp to Colonel Mayne, leading his men forward in the most gallant manner, received a ball through his heart. The arms of the prisoners were delivered to Spanish peasants, and themselves sent into the woods.

Irritated at the loss, the French sent a considerable body to redeem it, but without any other success than compelling the little party to retire, and taking Lieutenant l'Estrange, seventy-first regiment, prisoner; who had mounted one of the captured horses, as superior to his own. General D'Urban and Lieutenant-colonel Grant eminently distinguished themselves in this affair.

Intelligence having been obtained that the French had made a very considerable requisition of money and horses, from the town of Sedesma, on the Toures, under penalty of its destruction, with its magistrates; the same officers, with a squadron of cavalry mounted on mules and horses, with 100 infantry, (both including by the way several stragglers of Sir John Moore's army) proceeded to that town for the purpose of intercepting the enemy with his booty.

The junta were found waiting in state, with the requisitions in readiness, the rapacious plunderers not having yet returned for it, so that it was deemed best to transfer it into the safer hands of the junta of Ciudad Rodrigo, leaving instead Sir Robert Wilson's receipt for the enraged enemy, who arrived within an hour afterwards, but was thus precluded from exercising any severities against the inhabitants.

A French garrison was in consequence immediately sent to occupy it; the out-posts of which Lieutenant-colonel Grant almost immediately after surprized, and destroyed or dispersed, with a detachment of the legion, as they were sitting round their fires in the woods.

Those and similar affairs cleared the neighbourhood from the French marauders, who were intimidated by their active intrepidity, which excited also the spirit and vigilance of the Spanish peasants and Guerillas, and prevented the corps under General La Pisse from entering Portugal by Almeida, in aid of Marshal Soult against Sir Arthur Wellesley.

When the occupation of Puerto de Baines became necessary to prevent the communication between that general and Marshal Victor, opposed to General Cuesta, on the Tagus, at Almaraz, Colonel Mayne, with two battalions of the legion, were employed on that service with similar effect. The colonel strengthened this pass by artillery, on the commanding points, and mining the roads through it. He also assisted in fortifying the town of Bejar; receiving in compliment from its inhabitants the celebrated ducal sword preserved there. And, though last, not least, on this subject, among other passing captures, was that of a large convoy with important dispatches from Paris mails for Madrid. Of these, the first naturally were appropriated to the consideration and disposal of Sir Robert Wilson; there were, also, of no less consequence, the seals of the soi-disant King Joseph's government; and there were also presents for the French officers, with a handsome watch for the Intendant-general Danet, at Madrid. There were, also, innumerable love-letters, of the tenderest nature, from the Parisian fair, which must ever remain sacred; to say nothing of the effects of such billets doux on the vivid imaginations of generous partizans, wandering amid the lonely and romantic scenes of the lofty Sierra d'Estrella.

But among the tokens of imperial favor and affection, there was one which was neither exempt, reserved, nor sacred, though, as an object of domestic endearment, it might certainly claim a various tribute of regard.—It was French butter for the table of King Joseph, and was, by the laws of want and war, entirely estranged for his pseudo majesty.

A subsequently-captured dispatch of La Pisse to Victor, also, described his having marched a column of 6,000 men towards him, and its return in consequence of the occupation of Puesto de Baines. His feelings on this subject was soon after demonstrated, by an attack on the post of Major l'Estrange, at the bridge of Esia, in which that officer was made prisoner, and his force compelled to retire. Also in a severe attack upon the post of Colonel J. Wilson, by General Hammerstein's regiment of chasseurs à Cheval, which was, however, compelled to retire.

An attack on Ciudad Rodrigo succeeded by the force of 7,000 men from Salamanca threatening assault, which Lieutenant-colonel Grant, with a detachment of the legion, and four guns posted in front, received by a salute of artillery, and a reply of the governor, that accession was inconsistent with his duty. Upon which General La Pisse thought it best to remonstrate gently on the impropriety of the Spanish general and Garus suffering themselves to be misled by British officers to resistance against his soldiers, plunder the King of Spain, &c.

To the repulsion of this tricking siege is to be added another brilliant affair with a French column at San Felices, on the Agueda, at the same time, in which Lieutenant-colonel Grant eminently distinguished himself.

Sir Robert Wilson had gone to Coria, to take the command of a corps sent by General Beresford, to be united with another detached by General Cuesta, to act on the rear and right flank of Marshal Victor. On his way he received information that Cuesta was retreating, and that the combination could not take place.

On the morning of the 1st of April, he marched with the detachment of troops, consisting of about 200 men of the regiment of Avila, 130 of the legion under his command, sixty Spanish and thirty Portuguese dragoons, with one howitzer and one field-piece, with the intention of surprising or carrying the posts of the enemy at Barba del Puerco.

When within a quarter of a mile of the village, he detached Lieutenant-colonel Wilson, with eighty Spaniards and some horse, to alarm the enemy in his rear, in case of resistance; the main body was close upon the village before the enemy's sentries perceived its approach; when Lieutenant-colonel Grant, and Lieutenant-colonel Don Carlos D'Espagne, aid-de-camp to his excellency the captain-general, galloped forward with the cavalry, and killed or secured such part of the enemy as could not reach in time the rocks in the descent of the mountains.

The commanding officer and sixteen men were pressed so hard by the detachment under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Wilson, that they were unable to reach the bridge, and were obliged to throw themselves into a cave at the base of the mountain, which was extremely difficult of access.

The Spaniards and a part of the legion went down the sides of the mountain, and Sir R. Wilson posted the remainder of the legion, with the howitzers, on the height commanding Barba del Puerco, and the road of San Felices; and he brought the gun through the village to the ridge of the path leading to the bridge, from which situations the artillery played with very great effect, on the guards ascending the San Felices road, and the reinforcements which subsequently descended.

The enemy sent immediately forward from San Felices, where he had 3,000 men, detachments of light troops, who took post on the side of the mountain opposed to Sir Robert's troops, and where they kept up a very brisk fire; which was as briskly answered, from eight o'clock in the morning until two in the afternoon, but with considerable loss on their part, from the activity and excellence of some of Sir Robert Wilson's marksmen, particularly some officers and chasseurs, peasants.

Finding that the enemy persevered in throwing more troops forward, and not having the means or intention to occupy the post of Barba del Puerco, especially as Sir Robert was aware that he could, and did, by single persons, pass and assemble a large force on this side of the bridge, who could divide and turn the British position to right and left; he withdrew his guns from Barba del Puerco to its height; when the Spaniards re-ascended the hill, and formed on a height about 400 yards from the village. The troops of the legion maintained the ground obstinately against

Sir R. Wilson gradually withdrew his guns and the Spanish infantry in separate divisions; then the cavalry, as the ground did not admit of its acting; and when the main body had thus descended the hill, and passed an intervening open space, extremely unfavorable to cross under an enemy's fire from the height, he withdrew the troops of the legion; and, by keeping up a fire from behind the rock that favored his skirmishers, he passed also the rear-guard, without any loss or the smallest disorder, to the rocky height beyond the plain, where, again making a stand in some strength, the enemy halted and retired up the hill.

The troops had directions to halt at Viella de Cervo, where Sir Robert remained during the night, constantly patrolling to Barba del Puerco; and where he found that the enemy early at night had, from fear of an attack, withdrawn his forces, leaving only a small guard.

At this time the enemy was guilty of a most flagitious breach of faith and military honor. When Sir Robert Wilson was informed of the officer and his party being in the cave, at whom the Spaniards were endeavouring to pour fire from every direction, he desired Lieutenant Wilson to offer them their lives, on condition of surrendering; and Lieutenant-colonel Don Carlos D'Espagne accompanied him, to prevent the Spanish infantry from firing. Finding that the communication could not be made on this side of the bridge, these officers, joined by Lieutenant-colonel Grant and Lieutenant Charles, of the Royal British artillery, passed the bridge, advanced with a white handkerchief, and proposed the terms Sir Robert desired. The officers came forward, and said it was what they wished, and begged Lieutenant-colonel Wilson to approach nearer. At the instant a volley was fired at him and the rest of the officers; and the fire was continued until they passed the bridge again. Unfortunately it happened at the moment that the enemy's detachments were descending the hill, so that the complete example could not be made which such conduct imperiously demanded; but most of the assassins perished, for only the officer and four men came out of the cave alive.

The co-operation and communication of the French general being cut off, and the peasantry of the surrounding country excited against him, he found himself impelled to make a sudden movement towards the south, for a junction with Victor's corps on the left bank of the Tagus, by crossing it at the bridge of Alcantara.

Colonel Mayne's division was thus brought into an embarrassing situation in his front. The resources of this excellent officer, however, did not fail him; he moved on Cacillas de Flores, and tried to gain the pass of Peralis, which headed the enemy's column, with the hope of arresting its progress, till a junction of every Spanish and Portuguese force could be effected; and, finding this in vain, endeavoured to cut off their detachment at Payo, and, though unsuccessful, made some prisoners. It, however, formed a junction at this place with Colonels Wilson and Grant, to whom at night arrived Sir Robert Wilson, who had made a considerable number of prisoners.

This whole force, with irregular additions, pursued the enemy, for two days, with every species of annoyance, the enemy conceiving himself pursued by a large and efficient army.

On the 14th of May, the enemy, under Victor, having made an attack on the small garrison of Alcantara, carried it. The inhabitants of this ancient and renowned, though poorly fortified, city, endeavoured to obstruct the passage of the river, over which is a magnificent Roman bridge, built by the dignified Trajan. They excavated the road to the depth of near twenty feet, and also constructed a kind of abatis across it. They then urgently solicited, by every means, a British force for its defence.

Colonel Mayne, under whose command the brigade at Alcantara remained, had, on the 7th of May, issued the following orders:

"In the event of the enemy moving upon Alcantara in great force, you will order immediately the two hundred infantry under your command to fall back to the heights of Alcantara, on the east side of the Tagus, remaining with the cavalry under your orders as long as you can in safety, for any information concerning the enemy's advance. I find the town of Alcantara so thoroughly indefensible, that it is out of the question to take any steps for its defence; and the greater object being the pass of the Tagus, it must be abandoned; but should the enemy come forward in small force, or in any numbers equal to our own, I should recommend a skirmishing retreat, falling back upon my force, which shall, in this case, be prepared to give them a very warm reception.

"You will patrol on the line of Caceres, towards Aroydo de Puerco, and in the circle of Alcantara, as your judgment may point out to you, keeping a watchful eye on the upper line of the Tagus.

"You will send reports to my head-quarters every third day, of every thing that passes under your command; being careful in procuring and forwarding, immediately, every other information of greater importance.

"I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

(Signed) "WILLIAM MAYNE,

"Colonel, commanding the brigade at Alcantara."

On the following day, General Cuesta thus addressed him for a co-operation.

"Most excellent Sir,—The news that I have received, that 2,000 troops have arrived under your command in the place of Alcantara, has given me the greatest satisfaction, and the more particularly so, as I understand these to be the advance of a large army of British troops, under his excellency General Wellesley, moving into Spain.

"I should think Marshal Victor with his army will make a disposition to enter Portugal from Estremadura, to relieve General Soult; and it will give me much pleasure to concert any plans for the impediment of the enemy's movement in the vicinity of Badajos and Elvas, the former place being now fortified and strengthened in the best possible manner. It is also probable, they may try to pass the Tagus at Alcantara, and to move on to Castello Branco, in Portugal.

"Your excellency may depend upon every information that I can obtain; and of my determination to pursue the enemy's movement in either case; and to harass them by every means in my power.

"I trust your excellency will have the goodness to inform me of all the circumstances that may transpire for the good of our common cause, and to believe that it will be my greatest desire to render every assistance to the allies, as captain-general of the province of Estremadura.

"May God preserve your excellency, &c.

(Signed) "GREG. DE LA CUESTA."

The several juntas, in their addresses to Colonel Mayne, returned their most cordial thanks for the military skill which he had displayed with his few, but valiant troops, for the defence of Alcantara and its dependencies. But, notwithstanding these views and hopes, to which the daring valour and discriminating zeal of this extraordinary little force had certainly given birth, Alcantara could not be saved. It was cannonaded, and forced; and the determined spirit of the inhabitants, which would have inspired a generous enemy with respect, only produced the severe enormity of war.

In the Lisbon Gazette, dated May 20, we find the following account of this gallant battle:

"When the French army, in Estremadura, abandoned the Guadiana, they attempted to cross the Tagus at Alcantara. On the 14th of May, this place was attacked by a division of 10 or 12,000 men, commanded by Marshal Victor, Duke of Belluna, in person; they were opposed by the Loyal Lusitanian legion, with six pieces of cannon, the militia regiment of Idanhia Nova, and fifty horse of the 11th regiment of cavalry: the whole commanded by Colonel Mayne, of the Loyal Lusitanian legion, whose force did not exceed 1,800 men.

"This valiant commandant and garrison disputed the passage of the bridge of Alcantara for nine hours, and then retired in front of the enemy, so much superior to them, with all their artillery, to Lodiero.

"The fire of the enemy, whose whole force was engaged, was tremendous beyond conception, although the loss of the patriots was nothing in comparison with theirs, which at least amounted to 1,400 men.

"Lieut.-colonel Grant, the second in command, gave the greatest assistance to Colonel Mayne, and those two officers are entitled to the greatest merit for their bravery and conduct on this trying occasion. The enemy's cavalry followed them until dusk; but, by their judicious management, the retreat was effected in the greatest order.

"The courage of 1,800 Portuguese, at the battle of Alcantara, will remain a monument to posterity, and does not yield to the greatest actions of our ancestors."

CHAPTER VIII.

Wants of the British Army.—Sir Arthur Wellesley's Letter to Lord Castlereagh.—Second Attack of the Enemy at the Bridge of Alcantara.—General Blake's unsuccessful Attack on Saragossa.—Intercepted Dispatches, containing Details of the Enemy's Operations.—Symptoms of an approaching Battle.—A Plan of Operations concerted.—Battle of Talavera.—Remarks.—Biographical Sketch of Sir Arthur Wellesley (Duke of Wellington.)

SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY, about to proceed to the eastern frontier, found not only that the impediments which had attended the return of his army from the north of Portugal, arose from not being able to get forward the necessaries required with sufficient rapidity, but from the absolute want of them in the capital; and that an early supply would not only be necessary, but, perhaps, indispensable to his progress towards Spain.

This, however, did not impede the operations.

of his capacious mind. In a letter from Coimbra, dated May 31, his excellency thus addressed Lord Castlereagh.

"I have the honor to inform your lordship, that, since my letter of the 20th instant, the enemy has withdrawn the corps which had taken possession of Alcantara on the 14th, and his army is concentrated in the neighbourhood of Caceres, between the Jaqua and the Guadiana. The Spanish army, under General Cuesta, had advanced from its possession at Llena, upon receiving accounts of the enemy's march from the Guadiana, and the advanced-guard had attacked a fortified post which the enemy still held at Merida. But, by a letter from General Cuesta, of the 20th instant, I find that he had discontinued the attack, owing to the difficulty of supporting it, in consequence of the swelling of the Guadiana. His head-quarters were, by the last accounts, at Fuente del Mistre.

"General Mackenzie is in the mountains, behind Castello Branco, and he had been directed again to occupy Alcantara in such force as to be able to secure that passage over the Tagus.

"The army is in march towards this place: the leading brigades have already arrived here, and I expect the whole in the course of a few days.

"The march has been delayed in some degree, in consequence of the badness of the weather, and the general want of shoes by the troops; it having been impossible to bring up from Lisbon a sufficient supply before this time.

"The arrangements, however, are all made for the early movement of the troops to the Tagus; and they will begin their march on the day after to-morrow."

This letter, at the same time, was accompanied with a request that directions might be given for a supply of 30,000 pair of shoes, for the use of the British troops, to be sent to Lisbon at an early period. It was also desirable (he added) that the store-keeper should give directions that these shoes should be of the best quality. Sir Arthur Wellesley also begged Lord Castlereagh to order, that 1,500,000 pounds of biscuits should be sent to Lisbon, for the use of the army, and 3,000,000 pounds of hay, and 3,000,000 pounds of oats. To this Sir Arthur added:—

"That, from every information he had received of the probable supply of money for bills upon England, it was his opinion that a sum, amounting to not less than 300,000 pounds sterling, ought to be sent to Lisbon at an early period."

This did not, however, impair the zeal of the army in its progress, and Sir A. Wellesley was enabled to add the arrival of his van in Spain.

"Since I wrote last, Marshal Victor has broken up in the neighbourhood of Caceres, has removed his head-quarters to Trinsillo, and passed a division of his army over the Tagus by the bridge of Alcantara. It is probable that the whole are about to retreat.

"A part of the army of General Cuesta was, by the last accounts of the 3d of June, on the Guadiana, near Medellin, and one division near Merida; the whole are, I understand, advancing towards that river.

"A part of the troops under my command have arrived upon the Tagus, at Abrantes, and the remaining four brigades are following them."

In the mean time, the corps under General Mackenzie, forming the advance, Colonel Mayne, with a reinforcement to his legion, was appointed by him to command the van of the allied army moving into Spain.

Colonel Mayne returned to the post of Alcantara, which unfortunate town was now rendered a scene of desolation by the French. The enemy at this time occupied all the villages in its vicinity, and patrolled within five miles of the town. On the morning of the 10th of June, Colonel Mayne was again attacked by four columns of infantry, three squadrons of horse, and four pieces of artillery. The cannonading continued on both sides a short time, when, in obedience to the orders he had received from Marshal Beresford, he blew up the centre arch of the bridge of Alcantara; the last act of Trajan's grandeur, and the only one remaining in that part of Spain.

Colonel Mayne's army did some execution with their shells from the heights, dispersing two columns of infantry, and one of cavalry, when they were advancing on the town. The French were about 6,000; when they discovered the destruction of the bridge, they retired by the road of Brosas, and never again took a regular position.

The joint army of Valentia and Arrogan, under the command of General Blake, on the 19th of May proceeded against Alcaniz, a town in the kingdom of Arragon, seated on the river Guadalupe, near the frontiers of Catalonia, then occupied by the French. These the Spaniards drove, in great disorder, from that important post; and afterwards routed and forced smaller parties of the enemy from other stations. Under such success, General Blake was induced, on the 15th of June, to make an attack on Saragossa; but, was repulsed with great loss. Souchet attacked him for two days in the neighbourhood of Belshite; General Blake, however, was enabled to repel him; but on the third day, when the battle was renewed in the valley of Almonazir, the whole of the Spanish army, without firing a shot, though opposed by only one-third of their numbers, suddenly took flight, and left their general, attended by only six or seven officers. The Spaniards not only abandoned their baggage but threw down their arms. This army was composed principally of raw recruits from Valencia: they had acted with courage on sundry former occasions; and would probably have continued to display the same spirit, had not the most villainous, insidious arts been employed to excite alarm, and thus produce their sudden dispersion.

General Blake, in his extreme grief and anxiety for this transaction, was not sparing of his reprobation, in his dispatches to the junta, and treated the base cowardice of his army in the terms such conduct truly deserved. His own character and conduct he vindicated with becoming spirit, observing, at the same time, that "it was not in the power of any general to foresee the circumstances which gave rise to panic fear, nor was the contagion, under such circumstances, to be prevented." In some instances, indeed, parties of Spaniards, after having made their escape from the dangers of the field, before the issue of the battle in which they had been engaged, were received by their countrymen without marks of displeasure or disrespect; but the fugitives of Belshite were treated, and every where spoken of, with ridicule and contempt.

In the correspondence of Sir Arthur Wellesley with Mr. Canning, secretary for foreign affairs, printed and laid before parliament in May, 1809, is the following extract: "I am of opinion, that an effort should immediately be made for clothing the Spanish troops in a national uniform. The adoption of this measure would put a stop to the custom which so generally prevails of their throwing down their arms and accoutrements, dispersing, and betaking themselves to flight, on pretence of their being not soldiers, but simply peasants."

By two curious dispatches from Marshal Soult, which had been intercepted, it was discovered that he had effected his retreat from Gallicia, and arrived, on the 24th of June, at the Cueba de Sanabria. His letters, which were directed to King Joseph, contained a detail of his proceedings since the 2d, and of the whole of his retreat through Monforte, Montefurado, Bello, and Viana. This retreat was proceeded by an attempt to crush the Marquis of Romana's force by an operation combined with Marshal Ney; but it seemed to have been defeated by the check which the latter received at Puerto de San Cayo, and which determined him to fall back upon Santiago.

The two generals appeared to have been upon very bad terms; Marshal Soult thought that the situation of his army, in consequence of the retreat from Oporto, was such as made it impossible to remain in Gallicia, where there were no means of providing them the necessary equipments; and in addition to this, he had another powerful motive, from the knowledge of Sir Arthur Wellesley's march to the southward, to attack General Victor; and he plainly insinuated that Marshal Ney failed in the co-operation intended to have been directed against Orense, with the intention of obliging him, Marshal Soult, to remain in Gallicia. Marshal Ney, on his side, had not admitted the justness of the calculation, according to which Marshal Soult concluded that it would be possible for him to maintain himself alone in Gallicia. Soult's letter, though very cautiously worded, plainly indicated the disgust of a part of his army at the species of war which they had to carry on, and their weariness of the atrocities which they had been committing, and which had been followed, in some instances, by a terrible retaliation.

Marshal Ney left Corunna on the 22d, and had entirely evacuated the whole of the province on the 28th.

In the state of incertitude in which the allies remained, even the following dispatch from General Cuesta, dated "Bridge of Almaraz, June 26, 1809," appeared important.

"Most excellent Sir,—When my van-guard passed the Tagus I received notice that the enemy's whole force was at a short distance between this and Oropesa, and a great part of them in ambuscade in the woods, hoping to surprise and cut off my van-guard, in case of its advancing incautiously. This intelligence made me more circumspect, and I suspended the passage of the river, and am occupied in repairing the bridge, having, in the mean time, formed my infantry and artillery on the left bank, in order to protect the retreat of the van-guard in case it should be obliged to effect it.

"We have no intelligence of the enemy having abandoned the bridge of Arzobispo, nor is it to be supposed they will do so as long as they continue in the above project: on the other hand, their delay may be of advantage to us, by affording time for the arrival of the British army, which I consider is already advanced on its march to the banks of the Tietar."

The whole of the circumstances of this period, though in their immediate results not decisively important, afforded strong presages of the active operations about to ensue, like the first distant motion of a tempest; and prepared the British army fully to expect a grand struggle with the enemy, in which the character of the allied troops, and the value of their co-operation, would be evinced, and the nature of the campaign at least decided.

Though Sir Arthur Wellesley had been for a considerable time inactive, he was anxious, if possible, to strike some decisive blow; but before this could be attempted, he deemed it necessary that some plan of co-operation should be concerted between him and the Spanish generals, particularly with General Cuesta. Indeed he was more desirous of the co-operation of this general than solicitous that the Spanish generals should make any kind of attempt of importance, without the assistance of the British army. General Cuesta heartily coincided in Sir Arthur's wishes, and promised that he would suspend any particular operations till the British army had reached the banks of the Tagus. Sir Arthur, according to the correspondence which was afterwards laid before parliament, had also many obstacles which intruded themselves, in managing and coming to a perfect understanding with the central junta; the junta had likewise great difficulty in calling forth the means and energy of the country. A plan of operations was, however, concerted, and their armies commenced their march towards Madrid.

On the 20th of July a conjunction of the forces took place, and measures were immediately consulted, for carrying into effect the plan which had been agreed upon by the generals. The result was, that Sir Robert Wilson, commanding a corps of Portuguese, amounting to from 3,000 to 4,000 men, whom he had been at very considerable pains to bring into a state of excellent discipline, was ordered to proceed to Escalona, on the river Alberché; the corps under Venegas advanced to Argonda; and the main strength of the allied army marched on to meet the enemy, who were posted at Olalla, a town in New Castile.

The junction and march of the allied army up the valley of the Tagus having taken place, and a march having commenced towards the French under Victor, a general engagement was daily expected. Prayers were offered up for the success of the allies, to the Supreme Disposer of all events, at the cathedral church of Seville, at which the central junta attended in a body. General Cuesta's advanced-guard was attacked on the 26th of July, near Torrijos, and was obliged to fall back to the left bank of the Alberché. The army of the enemy, remaining still at Olalla, indicated its determination of trying the result of a general action.

Sir Arthur Wellesley, prompted by such a seeming resolution of the French, was not one to disappoint them in their intentions; and therefore, considering that the neighbourhood of Talavera del Reyna, a town half-way between Placentia and Madrid, and about sixty or seventy miles distant from both, was a good position; and General Cuesta having consented to take up this position, on the 27th in the morning, the British General Sherbrooke was ordered to retire with his corps to its situation in the line, leaving General Mackenzie, with a division of infantry and a brigade of cavalry, as an advanced post in the wood on the right of the Alberché, which covered the left flank of the allies.

An extent of nearly two miles was taken up by the position of the troops at Talavera. Where the British troops were stationed, the ground was open on the left, and was commanded by a height, on which a division of infantry, under Major-General Hill, was drawn up in echelon, and in second line. Still farther to the left was a valley, unoccupied on account of being commanded by the height, which was situated between that height and the mountains, the range of which appeared at too much distance to have any influence on the expected action. Immediately in front of the town of Talavera, down to the Tagus, were stationed the Spanish troops, forming the right wing of the allied army. Great part of the ground was covered by olive-trees, and intersected by banks and ditches. A heavy battery, in front of a church, was occupied by Spanish infantry, which defended the high-road, leading from the bridge over the Alberché. The town itself, and all its avenues, were defended in a similar manner. There was also a commanding spot in the centre, between the British and Spanish armies, on which the British had begun to construct a redoubt, with some open ground in the rear; at this spot was posted a division of infantry, supported by a brigade of dragoons and some Spanish cavalry.

The alacrity of the British forces in preparing to join the Spanish army was mentioned, in a very expressive manner, by Sir Arthur Wellesley in his first dispatch to Lord Castlereagh, dated from Placentia, 15th July, 1809, and is as follows:

"My Lord,—After I had written to your lordship on the 1st instant, Joseph Bonaparte crossed the Tagus again, and joined Sebastiani with the troops he had brought from Madrid, and with a detachment he had brought from Marshal Victor's corps, making the corps of Sebastiani about 28,000 men, with an intention of attacking Vanegas' corps. Vanegas, however, retired into the mountains of the Sierra Morena, and Colonel Larcy, with his advanced-guard, attacked a French advanced corps in the night, and destroyed many of them.

"The French troops then returned again to the Tagus, which river Joseph had crossed with the reinforcements which he had taken to Sebastiani's corps; and this last corps, consisting of 10,000 men only, was on the left bank of the Tagus, about Madnelejos, in front of Vanegas, who was again advancing.

"The last accounts from this quarter were of the 8th.

"The French army under Victor, joined by the detachments brought by Joseph from Sebastiani's corps, and amounting in the whole to about 35,000 men, are concentrated in the neighbourhood of Talavera, and on the Alberché; General Cuesta's army has been in the position which I informed your lordship that it had taken up since I addressed you on the 1st instant.

"The advanced-guard of the British army arrived here on the 8th, and the troops which were with me on the Tagus arrived by the 10th; the 23d light dragoons, and the 48th arrived yesterday; the 61st regiment will arrive to-morrow.

"I went to General Cuesta's quarters at Almaraz on the 10th, and stayed there till the 12th, and I have arranged with that general a plan of operations upon the French army, which we are to begin to carry into execution on the 18th, if the French should remain so long in their position.

"The Spanish army under General Cuesta consists of about 28,000 men, (exclusive of Vanegas's corps) of which 7,000 are cavalry. About 14,000 men are detached to the bridge of Arzobispo, and the remainder are in the camp under the Puerte de Mirabete.

"I have the pleasure to inform your lordship, that the seven battalions of infantry from Ireland and the islands, and the troop of horse-artillery from Great Britain, arrived at Lisbon in the beginning of the month.

"General Craufurd's brigade is on its march to join the army, but will not arrive here till the 24th or 25th.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"ARTHUR WELLESLEY."

This dispatch was truly indicative of the energy with which the British government was desirous to conduct the campaign in the Peninsula; but the next dispatch, dated at Talavera del Reyna, July 24th, fully evinced the vast inconveniencies which both the British and Spanish forces were compelled to suffer.

"My Lord,—According to the arrangement which I had settled with General Cuesta, the army broke up from Placentia on the 17th and 18th instant, and reached Oropesa on the 20th, where it formed a junction with the Spanish army under his command.

"Sir Robert Wilson had marched from the Venta de Bazagon, on the Tietar, with the Lusitanian legion, a battalion of Portuguese chasseurs, and two Spanish battalions on the 15th; he arrived at Arrenas on the 19th, and on the Alberché, at Escalona, on the 23d.

"General Vanegas had also been directed to break up from Madrilejos on the 18th and 19th, and to march by Trembleque and Ocana to Puente duenas on the Tagus, where that river is crossed by a ford, and thence to Arganda, where he was to arrive on the 22d and 23d.

"On the 22d, the combined armies moved from Oropesa, and the advanced-guards attacked the enemy's outposts at Talavera. Their right was turned by the 1st hussars and the 23d light-dragoons under General Anson, directed by Lieutenant-general Payne, and by the division of infantry under the command of Major-general Mackenzie, and they were driven in by the Spanish advanced-guards, under the command of General Sarjas, and the Duke d'Albuquerque.

"We lost eleven horses by the fire of cannon from the enemy's position on the Alberché, and the Spaniards had some men wounded.

"The columns were formed for the attack of this position yesterday; but the attack was postponed till this morning by desire of General Cuesta, when the different corps destined for the attack were put in motion, but the enemy had retired at about one in the morning to Santa Olalla, and thence towards Torrijos; I conclude to form a junction with the corps under General Sebastiani.

"I have not been able to follow the enemy as I could wish, on account of the great deficiency of means of transport in Spain. I enclose the copy of a letter, which I thought it proper to address upon this subject to Major-general O'Donoghue, the adjutant-general of the Spanish army, as soon as I found that this country would furnish no means of this description.

"General Cuesta has urged the central junta to adopt vigorous measures to relieve our wants; till I am supplied, I do not think it proper, and indeed I cannot continue my operations. I have great hopes, however, that before long I shall be supplied from Andalusia and La Mancha with the means which I require, and I shall then resume the active operations which I have been compelled to relinquish.

"I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

(Signed)

"ARTHUR WELLESLEY."

Perplexed with these untoward circumstances, and encompassed with difficulties, the British commander-in-chief determined on hazarding an action. He did not suffer trifles to suspend his operations; and, though disaffection pervaded the minds of too many of his countrymen in Great Britain, he considered much more than their haggard ideas had suggested; he considered, as it afterwards proved, that the only effectual warfare to harass French policy must take place in the Peninsula.

His resolution did not waver; for about two o'clock in the afternoon, on the 27th of July, an attack was made on the division under General Mackenzie, who gradually fell back in good order, though not without some loss, on the left of the position of the combined armies. Towards evening the French made an attempt to overthrow the Spanish infantry, which formed the right wing of the allied army, but the endeavour was unsuccessful. They commenced a general attack, towards the dusk of the evening, on the allies, by a cannonade on the left of their position, and by an attempt with cavalry to overthrow the Spanish infantry; in this, also, they entirely failed. A division was then pushed along the valley on the left of the height occupied by Major-general Hill, by which the French gained a momentary possession; but Major-general Hill, by an attack with the bayonet, displaced the enemy, and regained his position. His positions were again twice attacked in the night, and at day-light in the morning of the 28th, by two divisions of the French infantry; but in both those attacks they were bravely repulsed by General Hill and his troops. The French had also made similar attacks on the troops under General Campbell, but were equally unsuccessful; for that officer, supported by a regiment of Spanish cavalry and two battalions of Spanish infantry, completely discomfited them, and took their cannon. General Sherbrooke's division, which formed the left and centre of the first line of the army, was next attacked; but that division instantly received the enemy with the points of their bayonets, and drove them back with great slaughter. In this part of the contest, the brigade of guards, which had formed part of this division, in their eagerness to pursue the enemy, advanced too far, and were thrown into a temporary confusion, by having exposed their left flank to the fire of a battery; but a part of General Cotton's brigade of cavalry, on observing this, pushed forward, and covered them, till they were enabled to regain their original position.

Thus foiled, in every point of attack against the allied army, having also lost twenty pieces of cannon and some of their men, who were taken prisoners, the French considered it most advisable to commence a retreat, which they effected, in good order, across the Alberché.

Their loss in killed and wounded was never calculated with any degree of exactness; but Sir Arthur Wellesley estimated it at 10,000: though the French wished to make it appear that the loss of the allies must have been greater than theirs, owing, they asserted, to the greater number of cannon they were enabled to bring into the field against them. The loss of the British amounted to nearly 6,000 in killed, wounded, and missing. Among the killed, were Major-general Mackenzie, Brigadier-general Langworth, and Brigadier-general Beckett. As the Spanish troops were only engaged partially, their loss was comparatively small, not exceeding 1,000 in killed, wounded, and missing.

In order to do sufficient justice to the merits of the commander-in-chief, and those under his command, we think it proper to give the account of this brilliant action which Sir Arthur Wellesley addressed to Lord Castlereagh:

“Talavera del Reyna, July 29, 1809.

“My Lord,—General Cuesta followed the enemy's march with his army from the Alberché on the morning of the 24th, as far as Santa Olalla, and pushed forward his advanced-guard as far as Torrijos.

“For the reasons stated to your lordship, in my dispatch of the 24th, I moved only two divisions of infantry and a brigade of cavalry across the Alberché to Casalegos, under the command of Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke, with a view to keep up the communication between General Cuesta and me, and with Sir Robert Wilson's corps at Escalona.

“It appears that General Vanegas had not carried into execution that part of the plan of operations which related to his corps, and that he was still at Damiel, in La Mancha; and the enemy in the course of the 24th, 25th, and 26th, collected all his forces on this part of Spain, between Torrijos and Toledo, leaving but a small corps of 2,000 men in that place.

“His united army thus consisted of the corps of Marshal Victor, of that of General Sebastiani, and of seven or eight thousand men, the guards of Joseph Bonaparte, and the garrison of Madrid, and it was commanded by Joseph Bonaparte, aided by Marshals Jourdan and Victor, and General Sebastiani.

“On the 26th General Cuesta's advanced-guard was attacked near Torrijos, and obliged to fall back, and the general retired with his army on that day to the left bank of the Alberché, General Sherbrooke continuing at Casalegos, and the enemy at Santa Olalla.

“It was then obvious, that the enemy intended to try the result of a general action, for which the best position appeared to be in the neighbourhood of Talavera, and General Cuesta having consented to take up this position on the morning of the 27th, I ordered General Sherbrooke to retire with his corps to its station in the line, leaving General Mackenzie, with a division of infantry and a brigade of cavalry, as an advanced post in the wood on the right of Alberché, which covered our left flank.

“The position taken up by the troops at Talavera extended rather more than two miles; the ground was open upon the left, where the British army was stationed, and it was commanded by a height, on which was, in echelon and in second line, a division of infantry under the orders of Major-general Hill.

"There was a valley between this height and a range of mountains still further upon the left, which valley was not at first occupied, as it was commanded by the height before-mentioned; and the range of mountains appeared too distant to have any influence upon the expected action.

"The right, consisting of Spanish troops, extended immediately in front of the town of Talavera down to the Tagus. This part of the ground was covered by olive-trees, and much intersected by banks and ditches. The high road leading from the bridge over the Alberché, was defended by a heavy battery in front of a church, which was occupied by Spanish infantry. All the avenues to the town were defended in a similar manner; the town was occupied, and the remainder of the Spanish infantry was formed in two lines behind the banks on the roads which led from the town and the right, to the left of our position.

"In the centre, between the two armies, there was a commanding spot of ground, on which we had commenced to construct a redoubt, with some open ground in its rear.

"Brigadier-general Alexander Campbell was posted at this spot with a division of infantry, supported in his rear by General Cotton's brigade of dragoons, and some Spanish cavalry.

"At about two o'clock on the 27th, the enemy appeared in strength on the left bank of the Alberché, and manifested an intention to attack General Mackenzie's division.

"The attack was made before they could be withdrawn; but the troops, consisting of General Mackenzie's and Colonel Donkin's brigades, and General Anson's brigade of cavalry, and supported by General Payne with the other four regiments of cavalry, in the plain between Talavera and the wood, withdrew in good order, but with some loss, particularly by the 2d battalion 67th regiment, and 2d battalion 31st regiment, in the wood.

"Upon this occasion the steadiness and discipline of the 45th regiment, and of the 5th battalion 60th regiment, were conspicuous; and I had particular reason for being satisfied with the manner in which Major-general Mackenzie withdrew his advanced-guard.

"As the day advanced, the enemy appeared in larger numbers on the right of the Alberché, and it was obvious that he was advancing to a general attack upon the combined army.

"General Mackenzie continued to fall back gradually upon the left of the position of the combined armies, where he was placed in the second line, in the rear of the guards, Colonel Donkin being placed in the same situation further upon the left, in the rear of the King's German legion.

"The enemy immediately commenced his attack in the dusk of the evening, by a cannonade upon the left of our position, and by an attempt with his cavalry to overthrow the Spanish infantry, posted, as I have before stated, on the right. This attempt failed entirely.

"Early in the night he pushed a division along the valley on the left of the height occupied by General Hill, of which he gained a momentary possession, but Major-general Hill attacked it instantly with the bayonet, and regained it.

"This attack was repeated in the night, but failed, and again, at day-light in the morning of the 28th, by two divisions of infantry, and was repulsed by Major-general Hill.

"Major-general Hill has reported to me in a particular manner the conduct of the 29th regiment, and of the 1st battalion 48th regiment, in these different affairs, as well as that of Major-general Tilson, and Brigadier-general Richard Stewart.

"We have lost many brave officers and soldiers in the defence of this important point in our position; among others I cannot avoid to mention Brigade-major Fordyce, and Brigade-major Gardner; and Major-general Hill was himself wounded, but I am happy to say, but slightly.

"The defeat of this attempt was followed, about noon, by a general attack with the enemy's whole force upon the whole of that part of the position occupied by the British army.

"In consequence of the repeated attempts upon the height on our left by the valley, I had placed two brigades of British cavalry in that valley, supported in the rear by the Duc d'Albuquerque's division of Spanish cavalry.

"The enemy then placed light infantry in the range of mountains on the left of the valley, which were opposed by a division of Spanish infantry, under Lieutenant-general De Bassecourt.

"The general attack began by the march of several columns of infantry into the valley, with a view to attack the height occupied by Major-general Hill. These columns were immediately charged by the first German light dragoons and 23d dragoons, under the command of General Anson, directed by Lieutenant-general Payne, and supported by General Fane's brigade of heavy cavalry; and although the 23d dragoons suffered considerable loss, the charge had the effect of preventing the execution of that part of the enemy's plan.

"At the same time he directed an attack upon Brigadier-general Alexander Campbell's position in the centre of the combined armies, and on the right of the British.

"This attack was most successfully repulsed

BOOK VIII.

by Brigadier-general Campbell, supported by the King's regiment of Spanish cavalry, and two battalions of Spanish infantry; and Brigadier-general Campbell took the enemy's cannon.

"The Brigadier-general mentions particularly the conduct of the 97th, the 2d battalion 7th, and of the 2d battalion of 53d regiments, and I was highly satisfied with the manner in which this part of the position was defended.

"An attack was also made at the same time upon Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke's division, which was on the left and centre of the first line of the British army.

"This attack was most gallantly repulsed by a charge with bayonets, by the whole division, but the brigade of guards, which were on the right, having advanced too far, they were exposed on their left flank to the fire of the enemy's battery, and of their retiring columns; and the division was obliged to retire towards the original position, under cover of the second line of General Cotton's brigade of cavalry, which I had moved from the centre, and of the 1st battalion 48th regiment.

"I had moved this regiment from its original position on the heights, as soon as I observed the advance of the guards, and it was formed in the plain, and advanced upon the enemy, and covered the formation of Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke's division.

"Shortly after the repulse of this general attack, in which apparently all the enemy's troops were employed, he commenced his retreat across the Alberché, which was conducted in the most regular order, and was effected during the night, leaving in our hands twenty pieces of cannon, ammunition tumbrils, and some prisoners.

"Your lordship will observe by the inclosed return the great loss which we have sustained of valuable officers and soldiers in this long and hard-fought action, with more than double our numbers. That of the enemy has been much greater. I am informed that entire brigades of infantry have been destroyed, and indeed the battalions that retreated were much reduced in numbers. By all accounts, their loss is 10,000 men, Generals Lapisse and Morlot are killed; Generals Sebastiani and Boulet wounded.

"I have particularly to lament the loss of Major-general Mackenzie, who had distinguished himself on the 27th; and of Brigadier-general Langworth, of the King's German legion, and of Brigade-major Beckett, of the guards.

"Your lordship will observe, that the attacks of the enemy were principally, if not entirely, directed against the British troops. The Spanish commander-in-chief, his officers and troops, manifested every disposition to render us assistance, those of them which were engaged did their duty; but the ground which they occupied was so important, and its front at the same time so difficult, that I did not think it proper to urge them to make any movement on the left of the enemy while he was engaged with us.

"I have reason to be satisfied with the conduct of all the officers and troops. I am much indebted to Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke for the assistance I received from him, and for the manner in which he led on his division to the charge with bayonets.

"To Lieut.-general Payne and the cavalry, particularly General Anson's brigade, to Major-generals Hill and Tilson, Brigadier-generals Alexander Campbell, Richard Stewart, and Cameron, and to the divisions and brigades of infantry under their commands respectively, particularly the 29th regiment, commanded by Colonel White, the first battalion 48th, commanded by Colonel Donnelan, afterwards, when that officer was wounded, by Major Middlemore; the 2d battalion 7th, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Sir William Myers; the 2d battalion 53d, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Bingham; the 97th, commanded by Colonel Lyon; the 1st battalion of detachments, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Bunbury; and the 2d battalion 31st, commanded by Major Watson; and of the 45th commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Guard; and the 5th battalion 60th, commanded by Major Davy, on the 27th.

"The advance of the brigade of guards was most gallantly conducted by Brigadier-general Campbell, and when necessary, that brigade retired, and formed again in the best order.

"The artillery, under Brigadier-general Horwath, was also, throughout these days, of the greatest service; and I had every reason to be satisfied with the assistance I received from the chief engineer, Lieutenant-colonel Fletcher, the adjutant-general, Brigadier-general the Hon. C. Stewart, and the Quarter-master-general, Colonel Murray, and the officers of those departments respectively, and from Colonel Bathurst and the officers of my personal staff.

"I have also received much assistance from Colonel O'Lawlor, of the Spanish service, and from Brigadier-general Whittingham, who was wounded when bringing up the two Spanish battalions to the assistance of Brigadier-general Alexander Campbell.

"I send this by Captain Lord Fitzroy Somerset, who will give your lordship any further information, and whom I beg leave to recommend.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"ARTHUR WELLESLEY."

Though the battle of Talavera has been censured by some, yet the impartial politician must confess that it was highly honorable to the commander-in-chief, and equally so to the army under his command. The latter evinced, in an exemplary manner, their steadiness, discipline, and courage. Sir Arthur Wellesley displayed his skill in military operations, and his wisdom, by his confidence in such an army of British heroes: and, in one circumstance, his prudence was as remarkable as his prowess, in the use he made of the assistance of the Spanish army. Had he allowed that army to have taken an active part in the battle, he thought it very probable that the Spaniards might have been agitated, as in former instances, by panic, and consequently be defeated, and throw the whole army into confusion; he therefore, well considering their nature, posted the Spaniards on strong ground, difficult of access; thus at once employing them as an impenetrable wing to his own army, and securing them for future operations. An army, which had not consistency enough to impel their courage to commence an attack, might yet be equal to the service of a pursuit; and thus it was that Sir Arthur thought proper to employ them.

In the annals of history there can be nothing traced to surpass the bravery which the British troops evinced in this battle, where 24,000 British stood the attack, and defeated such superior numbers of French, headed by generals of known celebrity, after two days and nights hard fighting. The dispatches, and the letter of thanks from his majesty to the troops after the battle, proved how highly the government appreciated the valour of the army; and medals were struck off and presented to commanders of regiments, holding the rank of lieutenant-colonels.

It is a circumstance worthy of observation, because it shows the coolness and intrepidity of the troops, that, during the action of the 28th, and at the time the enemy's guns were playing on the left of the British line with great effect, a solitary hare was started on the plain and valley on the left of the height, by a shell accidentally bursting near the cover of the affrighted animal, who, being discovered by the divisions on the height, and in the valley, a halloo was set up by the men, much to the annoyance of the general officers, who, however, could not prevent them enjoying the chase in fancy, until the timid creature, unable to extricate itself, (the artillery playing from every direction in which it attempted to retreat,) was shot with a bullet by a soldier of the rifle battalion of the 60th regiment. The diversion this chase afforded to the soldiers sufficiently proves that their minds could not have been overpowered by fear.

During the second day of the battle, the face of the ground changed from straw-colour to black, the power of the sun having parched the ground, together with the weed and stubble, then its only produce. The explosion of a shell instantly fired it; and on reaching the pouch or magazine of the wounded, who were unable to assist themselves, would either blow up the sufferer altogether, or irretrievably injure him.

The effect of a shell when exploding in a proper range, is terribly destructive, twenty men falling under the influence of this combustible in a second. Sometimes it will make its way through an entire column; and, in one instance, where a shell exploded in the centre of a French column, the whole were thrown into entire disorder. A ricochet-ball having struck an English tumbril near the height, blew up its contents and killed Brigadier-major Gardiner, of General Stewart's brigade, and badly wounded some officers of the sixtieth regiment:—the 48th regiment and buffs received much damage in the same way; and one shell fell on the height on which the commander-in-chief placed himself, and destroyed a tumbril, four horses, and all the people near it at the time.

Colonel Gordon, 83d regiment, after being previously wounded, and in the act of being removed from the field in a blanket, was (together with those around him) blown to pieces by a shell, which, in a most unhappy manner, rolled after him. This officer had the respect of his regiment, and was considered by all to be a great loss to the service.

Colonel Muter, third buffs, was struck by a shell on the head, while sitting, among a number of officers, on the side of the height, remarking upon the enemy's movement. He was universally esteemed, and deeply regretted by the buffs.

Among the many brave officers who fell, or received mortal wounds, at Talavera, none was to be more regretted than Lieutenant-colonel Charles Donnellan, first battalion 48th regiment, who received a wound in the knee, which proved mortal, while leading his battalion to the charge, in support of the guards, who were thrown into confusion from having advanced too far after the enemy. Colonel Donnellan was one who governed his regiment without flogging; and Sir David Baird publicly declared the second battalion forty-eighth regiment, when on the Curragh, of Kildare, in 1808, as fine a regiment, and in as high a state of discipline, as he could desire to command. The abolition of flogging, of course, gained him the affection of the privates; and although he frequently spoke harshly to the officers, he never would injure them by unnecessary courts-martial, or stopping their promotion: and, with the name of a very severe commanding-officer, he was looked upon as a father by all, and familiarly styled Charley, an appellation by which he frequently heard himself commented on in the tents or barrack-rooms, by the men, unconscious of his proximity at the moment. He was promoted to the first battalion in Gibraltar, and joined it early in the year 1809; his removal was deeply regretted by the soldiers of the second. On the day of the battle, the colonel was dressed according to his regimental order, for a garrison town—stiff leather breeches and long boots, hair powdered, &c. and expressed much displeasure against the enemy, who wounded two of his horses with their (as he expressed himself) “long muskets, made to shoot from two miles off.” On receiving his wound, he was in front of the battle; it was very severe, and seemed to disable him at once. He, however, took off his hat, and, gracefully bowing, called Major Middlemore to take the command. If there had been surgical assistance in time, and his leg and part of his thigh amputated, it was thought he might have lived; but, in three days symptoms of mortification appeared, and he was left in Talavera, where he almost immediately died; on his death-bed, he desired to be particularly remembered to all his brave officers, and begged, if he had offended them, that they would excuse his hasty temper, when he was no more. This brave officer was buried by the French grenadiers of the regiment in Talavera, on or near the spot where he received his wound, with the real honors of war.

We shall devote the remainder of this chapter to a biographical sketch of the illustrious commander-in-chief, (afterwards Duke of Wellington) previously to his sailing from Ireland to take the command of the expedition to Portugal and Spain.

Arthur Wellesley, the fifth son of the Earl of Mornington, received the rudiments of his education at Eton College, whence he was removed to the Military Academy at Angers, in France. He applied himself with great industry, during his residence there, in acquiring a thorough knowledge of the theory of that profession to which he had devoted his future life, entered the British army as a subaltern, at an early period, and obtained the rank of a field-officer, without having had any opportunity of distinguishing himself till the year 1794, when he displayed his military talents, while conducting the retreat of three battalions, which he effected with great credit.

The Marquis Wellesley having been appointed to be the Governor-general of Bengal, Sir Arthur, who had purchased the lieutenant-colonelcy of the thirty-third, accompanied his regiment to India. On his arrival, an expedition being then on foot for the reduction of Manilla, Sir Arthur was appointed to it, and had actually embarked, when it was found necessary to abandon the expedition, on account of the intrigues of France with Tippoo Sultan.

Lieutenant-general Harris had been appointed to command the Madras army, destined to act against Tippoo, and penetrate into the Mysore country; upon the arrival of the Nizam's subsidary force, consisting of nearly 15,000 native troops, General Harris appointed Colonel Wellesley to command it, as a separate body. When Seringapatam was stormed, (See Book III. chap. XV.) the colonel commanded the reserve at that ever memorable assault; and he was thanked in public orders by General Harris, for his gallant intrepidity. In the commission of British officers, selected to arrange the division of the Mysore territories, Colonel Wellesley was appointed for the division of the prize treasure taken in Seringapatam.

Our hero's next appointment was that of governor of the conquered capital; a task the most difficult, and which required great integrity and military ability, united to much prudence and judgment. In this arduous employment, and for the meritorious discharge of this difficult duty, Colonel Wellesley received the thanks of the governor-general in council.

General Harris having quitted India for Europe, and the command of the Madras army devolving upon Major-general Braithwaite, Colonel Wellesley was entrusted with an expedition against the freebooter, Dhondia Waugh, of whom it was necessary to make a severe example, from the excesses which he had committed on the company's possessions. Having taken the field, at the head of a proper force, our hero entered the Nizam's territories, and after a series of rapid and vigorous movements, intercepted Dhondia Waugh's force at Conaghuill, where it was strongly posted, having its rear and left flank covered by a rock and the village. Although the horse only had come up, Colonel Wellesley, with his wonted intrepidity, determined on an immediate attack; and having placed himself at the head of the nineteenth and twenty-fifth light dragoons, and first and second regiments of native cavalry, which he extended into one line, to prevent his being out-flanked, he formed a sudden attack on the enemy. Dhondia's force shewed much firmness, but could not withstand the charge. His army gave way, and were pursued for several miles. Dhondia himself, with immense numbers of his followers, were killed, and the whole body completely and effectually dispersed. The thanks of General Braithwaite, and of the governor-general in council, were conveyed to Colonel Wellesley, for the great and unremitting activity, with which he had conducted these important operations.

On the commencement of the Mahratta war (November, 1802) Lord Clive, then at the head of the Madras government, having assembled an army of 19,000 men, the command of which he had entrusted to Lieutenant-General Stuart, it became necessary to detach a part of this force towards Poonah, the capital of the Perishwah, the British ally, which was menaced by Schindeah and Holkar. Colonel Wellesley, who had now attained the rank of a major-general, was selected for the important command of the proposed expedition, having under him Colonel Stevenson, and a body of 35,000 men, with a proportionable train of artillery. Of this army, two-thirds were furnished as subsidy by the Nizam, and comprised altogether about 9,000 native cavalry. The Nizam's force being placed under the command of Colonel Stevenson, General Wellesley, at the head of his army of 12,000, deemed it expedient to push on with the greatest rapidity towards Poonah, as it was known that Holkar was in possession of that capital, as well as the person of the Peishwah. On the night of the 19th of April, information having been received, that it was the determination of Holkar to plunder and burn Poonah on the approach of the British troops, General Wellesley pushed forward, over a rugged and difficult country, and through a dangerous pass; and after having accomplished a forced march of sixty miles, reached the Peishwah's capital in the short period of thirty-two hours. The astonishing and unheard-of celerity of this movement saved Poonah from its impending destruction; and in a few days General Wellesley had the satisfaction of restoring this city to its lawful sovereign.

After displaying considerable talent in taking of the city and fortress of Ameduagar, Sir Arthur Wellesley, on his arrival at Naulnair, received information that the combined Mahratta army was posted within six miles of the ground which he intended to occupy; but that the enemy had indicated an intention of breaking up his camp and retreating on the approach of the British army. With a boldness of resolve which shewed the vigour of his judgment, Sir Arthur instantly determined to move forward and force the enemy to a general engagement, although Colonel Stevenson's subsidiary division, which had marched by a different route, had not joined him as he had expected. This resolution having been adopted, he halted and refreshed his army, which had that morning marched fourteen miles. He then moved forward; and after a further march of six miles, performed under the rays of a scorching sun, he came in sight of the enemy, posted with his right on the village of Bokerdun, and his left on that of Assye on the northern bank of the river Kaitreak, near to the Adjunttee pass. Scindeah's army consisted of 38,500 cavalry, 10,500 regular infantry, 500 match locks, 500 rocket men, and 190 pieces of ordnance. General Wellesley's army consisted of only 4,500 men, of whom 2,000 alone were Europeans.

Notwithstanding this awful inequality, the British general approached in front of the enemy's right; but finding he had posted his infantry and guns on the left, he resolved to make his attack there, formed the necessary movement for that purpose, and placed the British cavalry in the rear, to cover the infantry as they moved round; while on his right flank he stationed the cavalry of the Peishwah and Nizam. He then forded the river beyond the left of the enemy, and formed his army in order of battle, extending his infantry in two lines, the British cavalry in a third, as a reserve, and posting the auxiliary native force so as to cover the left flank of the whole, menaced by a large body of the enemy's cavalry, which had followed them from the right of their own position.

The enemy had, by this time, commenced a distant cannonade, when General Wellesley evinced an intention of attacking their left; they then changed their position with great steadiness, as clearly perceiving the mode in which they were to be attacked. Hereupon the British advanced under a most tremendous fire of nearly 150 pieces of the enemy's ordnance, extremely well served. The English artillery, in turn, opened upon the enemy, at an interval of about 100 yards; but were soon rendered incapable of advancing, from the number of men and bullocks that had fallen.

Such a circumstance induced the British general to abandon his guns, and try the event of a close combat. Putting himself, therefore, at the head of his whole line, and placing the British cavalry, under Colonel Maxwell, to cover his right, he advanced with such intrepidity, as completely dismayed the Mahrattas. Notwithstanding their numerous artillery, the enemy's forces found themselves unable to withstand such a charge, and quickly retired upon his second line, which he had posted in front of the Juah river. Here the 74th regiment, which covered the right of the British line, having suffered severely by the enemy's cannon, was charged by a body of Mahratta cavalry; but the British cavalry posted on the right, having repulsed them, charged, in turn, with such resistless impetuosity, that several of the enemy's battalions were driven into the Juah with immense slaughter. The enemy's line now gave way in all directions, and were pursued by Colonel Maxwell, at the head of the British cavalry, across the Juah river, beyond which they were cut down in great numbers.

Several of the enemy's guns had been unavoidably left in the rear, during the heat of the action; at this period they were returned upon the British troops in advance, by the perfidious Mahrattas, who had thrown themselves on the ground, and were consequently passed unmolested by the British soldiers. Such a circumstance encouraged some of the enemy's regular infantry battalions, that had retired in rather better order, to face about and commence a second action, which, being maintained for a short time with great fury, again made the fortune of the day doubtful. But General Wellesley, with his usual gallantry, placing himself at the head of the 78th regiment, and 7th battalion of sepoy, compelled the parties who had seized the guns to surrender; though not without some further loss, and considerable personal danger to himself, his horse having been shot under him. The gallant Colonel Maxwell finished the destruction of the enemy, by charging with the 19th light dragoons the battalions which had rallied, and which he entirely broke and dispersed; but unfortunately fell himself in the performance of this duty. These attacks, however, proved decisive to the enemy; the Mahrattas fled in all directions, their dead, amounting to 1,200, covered the field, and their wounded strewed the adjoining country for miles. Ninety-eight pieces of cannon, the whole camp-equipages of the enemy, all their bullocks and camels, and a vast quantity of ammunition, fell into the hands of the victors.

General Wellesley now turned his attention to the Rajah of Berar's army, which, after a most fatiguing and unremitting pursuit, he defeated on the plains of Agram, in as decisive a manner as he had done that of Scindeah at Assye, capturing the whole of their elephants and baggage, thirty-eight pieces of cannon, and all their ammunition.

The general then turned his victorious arms against the only remaining important fortress belonging to the enemy—an almost impregnable citadel, named Gawilghar, seated on the summit of a steep hill; which in the course of two days was carried by escalade.

The Rajah of Berar, terrified and amazed at the rapidity of General Wellesley's operations, determined on concluding a peace, without waiting for the concurrence of his ally, Scindeah. This was instantly made known to the British general; and a treaty of peace was immediately concluded. Soon after General Wellesley had the good fortune to conclude a peace with Scindeah. Both treaties were speedily ratified by the governor-general at Calcutta, and excited the admiration of India, not only for the decision and dispatch with which these acts of diplomacy were executed, but for the moderation and equity which were evident in the conditions. General Wellesley, in the whole of this contest, proved to the world that he possessed, in an eminent degree, those talents for council, as well as for the field, which cannot, without the greatest disadvantage, be separated.

The Mahratta war being thus brought to a happy conclusion, General Wellesley found the reward of his victories in the gratitude and love of his countrymen. A sword, valued at 1,000*l.* was presented by the inhabitants of Calcutta. Thanks were voted to him by both houses of parliament; and his sovereign honoured him by creating him a knight of the Bath. Added to which, the companions of his toils and dangers, as a token of their esteem and regard, presented him with a golden vase, of 2,000 guineas value.

Soon after his return, Sir Arthur accompanied Lord Cathcart in his expedition to Hanover, as commander of a brigade; and this army having again returned to England, he was appointed to the command of a district on the coast. On the death of Marquis Cornwallis, he was gratified with the colonelcy of the 33d regiment, in which he had served thirteen years as lieutenant-colonel.

During the short-lived administration of Lord Grenville, Sir Arthur Wellesley represented an Irish borough in the British parliament, and took an active part in the debates, as far as they concerned his brother, Marquis Wellesley, whose measures, while governor-general of India, were then under discussion. On the appointment of the Duke of Richmond to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland, Sir Arthur was declared his chief secretary, and accompanied his grace to that kingdom.

The remainder of our hero's brilliant enterprises have been, and, more particularly, remain to be, the subjects of the present history.

Operations which succeeded the Battle of Talavera.—Daily Progress and Difficulties of the British Army.—Character of the Spanish Leader.—His Resignation.—Arrival of the Marquis Wellesley on a Military Mission.—Retirement of the British Army from the Scene of their recent Triumphs.—Atrocious Conduct of the French in the South and West of Spain.—Affair of St. Payo.—The British Army move towards the Portuguese Frontier.—Positions of the various Armies.—Battle of Ocana.—Action of Alba.

ON the arrival of Joseph Bonaparte, he publicly reproached Victor for not having beaten or taken the British and Spanish armies, and assured his troops that this grand object should be accomplished the next day; but on the evening of that day (July 28) he was seen retiring from the field, the picture of melancholy and despair.

It is now necessary to turn to a relation of the events which caused a gallant and successful British army to retire precipitately from the scene of their late triumphs, and act upon the defensive.

During the stay of the army at Talavera, both before and after the action, the supplies of every kind had been very insufficient, and the inhabitants of that town evinced no disposition to relieve the wants of the British, and to accommodate the sick and wounded. Their removal from Talavera, therefore, was become an object of too much interest to be any longer delayed, particularly as, by Marshal Soult's arrival at Placentia, the provisions expected from that quarter, and for which arrangements were made by the commissariat, had fallen into the enemy's hands.

On the morning of the 3d of August the British army moved from Talavera; but, for an hour after the troops were under arms, they remained uncertain whether it was Sir Arthur Wellesley's intention to advance upon Madrid, or proceed against Marshal Soult, in the contrary direction. Their doubts, however, were soon at an end, for, on leaving the wood of olives, the army began to retrace its former steps, and about two in the afternoon again halted near the town of Oropesa. Although, by this retrograde movement, the British were of necessity compelled to leave behind a considerable number of their sick and wounded, yet less anxiety was felt on this account, as they relied on the Spaniards keeping Victor in check, should he, on being informed of Sir Arthur Wellesley's departure, again attempt to advance: besides, under any circumstances, it would not have been consistent with humanity to have attempted the removal of more of the sick and wounded than were really brought off.

Cuesta, whose force remained nearly entire, having taken little share in the action, promised to maintain the position which the British had so successfully defended; but, in a few hours after their march, the Spanish leader abandoned his post, and, with the whole of his army, followed the route of the British.

This conduct of General Cuesta increased the embarrassments of the situation in which the British army was already placed by Marshal Soult's arrival at Placentia; and all hopes of any effectual co-operation being now at an end, the commander of the forces determined to withdraw his troops over the bridge of Arzobispo, with a view of covering Seville and the south of Spain, and at the same time to preserve the communication open with Lisbon.

In pursuance of these objects, on the following morning the march was resumed; and, after having experienced considerable difficulties and privations, the whole of the British army arrived in the valley watered by the Elmonite on the 11th of August.

Although there can be no pleasure in dwelling on the particulars of a march performed under such circumstances, yet, perhaps, a detail of the daily progress made by the British troops, through these inhospitable mountains, may prove somewhat interesting.

At day-break on the 4th of August, the troops were under arms, but did not move from the ground on which they bivouacked until nine o'clock. A very small quantity of bread was issued to the army, which then marched down two leagues to the bridge of Arzobispo, and crossing the Tagus, halted for the night on the opposite bank. It was reported that the Spaniards, on the approach of the enemy, had removed the bridge of Almaraz, and many expected the one at this place would have been destroyed, the more effectually to secure the rear.

The troops advanced six leagues over a difficult country, on the 5th, and about four in the afternoon bivouacked on a hill near the village of Val-de-la-Cosa.

On the 6th, their march, three leagues only, was through a mountainous district. About noon the column halted in a romantic spot, near the small river d'Ibor. Several working parties were employed in dragging the artillery up the heights until a late hour.

The country, on the 7th, was even more mountainous and rugged than that through which the army passed the preceding day; consequently, little progress was made. The heat was excessive, and the troops began to sink under their fatigues. The army had been without bread on the 5th and 6th. A small quantity of flour was received on the 6th, but no wine could be procured to raise the drooping spirits and recruit the exhausted strength of the soldiers.

Although the troops assembled at four in the morning of the 8th, yet the march was deferred nearly five hours, to give the artillery time to ascend the heights. About noon, they halted on the banks of a small stream, a league from Deleytosa. The villages through which the British had passed, since leaving Arzobispo, were nearly deserted and ruinous. Not one article of the necessities of life could be procured in any of them.

At five, on the morning of the 9th, the troops were in motion. About eight o'clock they passed the town of Deleytosa, and halted two miles beyond, in a wood on the left of the town of Truxillo, situated on a hill, apparently at the distance of six leagues. A very inadequate proportion of flour and biscuit was issued the day before, but the troops received a tolerable supply of the latter this morning.

BOOK VIII.

CHAP. LX.

1809.

Marshal Soult, after making an unsuccessful attempt to force the bridge of Arzobispo, passed the Tagus, with a body of cavalry, at a ford about two miles above, and surprised the Spaniards in their position. The latter retreated, after a slight resistance, pursued by the French. It was feared the whole of their artillery would fall into the enemy's hands. The Duke of Albuquerque had arrived at head-quarters.

In the general orders of this day the army was informed that the charge of three-pence per diem only would be made to those troops who had not received their rations regularly since the 22d of July. During the march a number of bullocks, sheep, and goats, were driven forward, for the daily consumption of the army. The provisions were cooked over-night for the following day, and being divided into messes, each man carried his dinner in his tin. This was in general the arrangement throughout the campaign.

On the 10th the troops halted, but were kept in readiness to move at a moment's notice. It was asserted, that the French were marching to the south, by the way of Guadaloupe. This halt proved extremely serviceable from the repose it afforded to the troops and to the horses of the artillery, whose labours had been very severe for some days past. The Spaniards, indeed, declared that the road by which the army marched over the mountains was impracticable; but, contrary to their opinion, the whole of the artillery and stores were ultimately brought forward. Many horses died from fatigue, and the troops, in several places, were obliged to drag the guns and ammunition-waggons up the heights.

The troops moved off their ground at day-light, Aug. 11, and about eight o'clock came upon the high-road from Madrid to Cadiz, one of the best in Europe; shortly afterwards they passed the ruined village of Iaracejo, where are the remains of a Moorish castle, and halted about mid-day on the banks of the Elmonte. Their head-quarters were at Iaracejo.

Marshal Soult was again in Placentia, and his out-posts at Coria. Some British soldiers, who were left sick in that city, fell into his hands, but afterwards made their escape, and arrived at Zarza Major, where Marshal Beresford was, with the two brigades of infantry, under the command of Generals Lightburne and Catlin Craufurd. Sir R. Wilson had retired into Portugal, after a severe action with part of Ney's corps, near the pass of Banos. The French had their piquets on the right bank of the Tagus, opposite to Almaraz, where General Robert Craufurd was stationed with a division in advance. His men bathed in the river, and exchanged civilities with the enemy, without receiving the smallest molestation.

The Spanish leader, General Cuesta, was such an infirm old man, that he was obliged to be lifted into his saddle, and as he could not remain long at a time on horseback, an ancient family-coach, drawn by six mules, was in constant attendance. He was said to possess the entire confidence of his troops, which was no doubt the reason of his being selected to command an army of patriots which ought to have had an officer of youth, vigour, and talent at its head. Cuesta, however, thought proper to resign the command, and was succeeded by General d'Eguia.

By the courtesy of Marshal Mortier, who commanded at Talavera, accounts had been received of the wounded. He had placed sentries over the quarters of the officers and hospitals, to prevent any of their property being pillaged, and had advanced money to some out of his own pocket.

On the morning of the 20th of August, soon after day-break, the 1st and 4th divisions of the army quitted the valley d'Elmonte, in which they had halted since the 11th, and, after a march of four leagues, reached Truxillo, close to which the troops bivouacked for the night, and proceeded in a similar manner on their retreat.

The resignation of General Cuesta was immediately communicated by the British general to his brother, the Marquis Wellesley, who on the 31st of July had arrived at Cadiz, on a military mission, and met with a splendid reception.

Such was the incapacity of the British forces, from want of supplies, that their retirement (as before observed) was judged absolutely necessary. The British general accordingly quitted Truxillo, and was induced to halt for a few days at Merida. He ordered Brigadier-general Catlin Craufurd to join the army with the 11th and 57th, and four of the battalions arrived from Ireland, and that the horse-artillery, and the horse for the artillery, recently sent from Cork, should come up from Lisbon.

At this time (September 4) the enemy continued nearly in the same positions they were on the 21st of August. Marshal Ney was at Salamanca, and there appeared to be another French corps in Old Castile, supposed to be the 6th corps, under the command of General Kellermann. Marshal Soult was at Coria, with his advanced posts at Moralejo and Zarza Major; but he had not with him more than from 6,000 to 8,000 men. Marshal Mortier was at Arzobispo, and two divisions of Victor's corps were at Talavera, and the remainder in La Mancha with the 4th corps, hitherto called Sebastiani's. That general was dead of his wounds.

The Spanish head-quarters had been moved from Deleytosa to Truxillo, partly in consequence of their finding it difficult to support their army in the exhausted country upon the left bank of the Tagus, and partly on account of orders received from the junta, to detach the greatest part of the army to La Carolina, leaving only 12,000 men in Estremadura. They still occupied La Mesa d'Ibor and the Puerto de Mirabete, opposite Almaraz, in which last post they relieved the British troops on the 20th. Sir Arthur Wellesley apprehended much danger from this disposition of the forces, and urged the government to make an exertion to maintain their strong position upon the Tagus. But he remained in doubt whether his remonstrances would have any effect; and expected that, if the enemy should make an attack upon Ciudad Rodrigo, he would possess himself of the Tagus, and probably of the Guadiana at the same time.

About the 8th of September, the British army was stationed near the Portuguese frontier; a part of the army was in Portugal, and the remainder on the Spanish territory, occupying a position calculated to menace the flank and rear of the enemy, if he advanced towards Andalusia.

The patriotic cause was considerably assisted by the atrocious conduct of the French in the south and west of Spain, who, finding their condition unsafe, took the strongest measures against the clergy and inhabitants who were attached to their king. The Spaniards, on the other hand, regularly announced to their countrymen the flagrance of these enormities, and failed not to hold up the conduct of those who suffered with courage and dignity as examples.

It was thus that the Seville Gazette, in July, held up the conduct of the following worthy members of the community:—

“The victims who were sacrificed here, on the 3d of June, were, Dr. Pon, Father Gayeta, Juan Massana, N. Aulet, and a serjeant from Soria. The first was a doctor of civil and canon law, of the university of Cervera, and rector of the fortress. Being asked by the judge whether he had distributed fifty muskets, he answered, yes; and that he should do it again, had he an opportunity. Being asked for what purpose he had done it, he answered, to defend his king, religion, and country. It being retorted upon him that he was doing the contrary, since his religion forbade the shedding of blood, his king did not desire it, and his country abhorred it; he replied, that they neither professed nor understood the Roman Catholic apostolic religion, nor acknowledged Ferdinand VII. as their king; that they had, therefore, another country, and it was no wonder that they should speak as they did. Being asked to whom he distributed those muskets, he said, to good and faithful Spaniards, that he would not betray their names. He suffered the garrote, a sort of swift and certain strangling to death, by means of a screw.

“The second was a priest, the superior of St. Cayetano. He died the last, having administered the last consolations of religion to the others, and suffered the garrote with the utmost serenity.

“The third was a merchant's clerk, belonging to the house of Llordella. He was convicted of offering to purchase stores belonging to the commandant. Being reproached by the French general with being a traitor, he replied, ‘it is your excellency who is the traitor; who, under the mask of friendship, seized our fortresses. I have but tried to regain what you wickedly robbed us of.’ He was hanged.

“This punishment was, in course, to mark by degradation, even in death, so abominable an insinuation.

“The fourth was also a young man, of whom, as well as of the serjeant, the particulars are not ascertained; but all accounts agree that they were both hanged, having merited the appellation of martyrs of their country, and perhaps of their religion.”

Innumerable were the instances of a similar description.

Nor was this confined to the civil classes. The Duke del Parque, as captain-general of Old Castile, finding that, on the advance of some detachments from Ciudad Rodrigo towards Salamanca, the people were so rejoiced as to venture, during the evident despondency of the French divisions there, to shout Viva Fernando septimo! and were, in consequence, subjected to punishment, published the following letter, which he had addressed to the French general commanding the troops in Salamanca:

“I have learned that some detachments of my cavalry have arrived at the gates of your city, attacking your advanced-posts, and that they have spread disorder and confusion among your followers; that the renegade Spaniards thought their last hour was come, which probably is not far distant; and that their malice availed itself of this opportunity to gratify private revenge; accusing their fellow-citizens of having affixed writings written by themselves, to furnish a pretence for their iniquities, and who, in consequence, have been thrown into prison, and loaded with irons.

“I cannot behold, with indifference, that the worthy inhabitants of Salamanca should suffer innocently, in consequence of the movements of my troops. I therefore give you notice, general, that I shall execute reprisals, inflicting the same punishment upon an equal number of French prisoners, which you may cause the people of Salamanca to suffer.

“I have also been informed that you do not consider as soldiers the officers and scouts of my army, because they do not wear an uniform, styling them robbers and insurgents, and treating such as fall into your hands as malefactors. Know, general, that they are soldiers, and deserve to be considered as such. They know the laws of war, and observe them better than your men do. One of your generals, and his two adjutants, who were those of Joseph Napoleon, fell into the hands of these partisans, were well treated, and sent to this fortress in safety and with decency. Such has not been the lot of the Spanish generals who have had the misfortune to become your prisoners. Compare the difference there is between the humanity of the Spaniards, whom you call insurgents, because they defend their country and hearths against the most horrible and tyrannical invasion, with your inhumanity, who burn, ravage, and destroy, like Vandals, whatever you reach, profaning temples, massacring women and children, violating women, and committing atrocities unknown to the Goths, Vandals, and even the Moors, when they made their irruptions into Spain. What has your boasted philosophy wrought? Where have the ancient French people hidden themselves, who were once so famed for the gentleness of their manners, and their amiable and enlightened character, and who knew for ages to carry on war, and preserve the characteristic honor of true warriors? No, you do not belong to that noble and distinguished race: or, if you have a connexion with them, it is only as their spurious descendants. As such you have comported yourselves, and as such I shall treat you, if you misuse my brave men, and commit in Old Castile the crimes and horrors you have exhibited in Galicia and Asturias."

Fortune occasionally smiled on the patriotic exertions of the Spaniards. The affair of St. Payo has claims to the title of a battle, and is thus recorded by an intelligent English officer, employed under the most peculiar circumstances on the spot.

"The division of the Minho, the left of the Marquis of Romana's army, under the command of Count Noronia, has obtained a decisive victory over the enemy, at the bridge of St. Payo.

"The division of the Minho, under the command of General Carrera, having defeated the enemy at St. Jago, obliging them to retreat precipitately to Corunna, taking from them forty arobas of church-plate, and a great quantity of other plunder, proceeded to Ponte Vedra, for the purpose of arming the peasant soldiers, and was returning in pursuit of the enemy. On his arrival at Padron, his advanced-guard met that of the enemy, who, having received reinforcements at Corunna, was advancing towards Ponte Vedra.

"The great want of arms and stores under which the Spanish army laboured, and the very heavy rains which had for some days fallen, by which about 40,000 cartridges were destroyed, from the peasants being without cartridge-boxes, induced the Count of Noronia (who had just joined General Carrera) to fall back towards Vigo, for the two-fold object of receiving the supplies he so much wanted, and securing a position where he might oppose the enemy with advantage.

"The Spanish army passed the river at St. Payo, in launches, the bridge having been previously destroyed, and occupied a strong military position on the left bank. The passage was not impeded by the enemy, who might, from the very superior number of their cavalry, and then of artillery, also have cut off, at least, their rear-guard.

"On the next morning the enemy, in force 8,000, including 600 cavalry and six pieces of artillery, headed by Marshal Ney and General Loison, commenced a vigorous attack, and seemed determined to force the passage of the river: the patriots evinced equal determination to resist. After an incessant fire of cannon and musketry on both sides for ten hours, the enemy ceased at seven in the morning.

"At day-light, the next day, the enemy renewed his attack, and seemed determined at all risks to cross the river; but those who had passed the bridge of Lodi, could not pass the bridge of St. Payo; those who had rapidly crossed the Adda and the Po were not only checked, but obliged precipitately to retreat, before the brave patriots on the banks of the Soto Major. The enemy again opened a heavy fire of shot and shells, with the object of concealing another meditated attack against the bridge of Caldenos, a league and a half higher up the river.—This position, as well as every other where the river was fordable, had been previously occupied by the vigilance of the Spanish generals.

"After a fire of five hours, the enemy, being unable to gain a foot of ground, relinquished the attempt of forcing the bridge of Caldenos, defended by an inferior force.

"In the evening, the enemy proceeded to reconnoitre and sound the river close to the sea-shore—an attempt they were soon obliged to abandon, from the well-directed fire of the regiment of Murrago, which particularly distinguished itself on this and several other occasions.

"That night the enemy devoted himself to his accustomed occupation previous to a retreat, burning houses, destroying provisions, and killing the defenceless. The flight of the peasantry, however, on the enemy's approach, prevented the perpetration of cruelties to the extent to which this barbarous army has had an opportunity, in other parts, of gratifying their inhuman disposition.

"The few, however, who were unable to escape, became victims of their cruelty. One instance is worthy of remark: an infirm old woman, unable to join her family in their flight, was inhumanly butchered in bed.

"At one o'clock the next morning, the enemy commenced a precipitate retreat, leaving thirty-nine unburied dead close to the bridge, forty muskets, a great quantity of clothes, and other plundered articles, and some provisions. Their retreat was towards St. Jago. The Spanish army consisted of 13,000, including 150 cavalry; 4,000, however, of the peasants, were without muskets. The number of cannon was equal on both sides; each had six pieces: the enemy, however, had on their side a six-inch howitzer, of which description of ordnance the Spaniards were destitute. The loss of the Spaniards in killed and wounded amounted to 111; that of the enemy, from what came under our observation, and from the information we have already received, must have been considerably above 300. The number of carts that passed to Ponte Vedra with their wounded, the bones and remains of several bodies which they had burnt, and those discovered buried and hid away, combine to prove this number rather underrated.

"Four gun-boats were fitted out, with the greatest promptness, by the orders of the Spanish commodore. This force contributed most materially to the repulse of the enemy, having kept up a heavy and well-directed fire upon the enemy's flank, wherever the tide permitted their approach to the beach. One two-gun battery was completely razed, and the guns dismounted by the well-directed fire of one of the gun-boats.

"Nothing can exceed the confidence the patriots seem to repose in their generals. Carrera, who has thrice led them to victory, appears to possess the unbounded admiration and confidence of his troops.

"If the enemy had succeeded in forcing the passage of the Soto Major, his object was to attack the castle of Castro, now committed to the custody of Colonel Carrol. The garrison consisted of a detachment of British soldiers, stragglers from Sir John Moore's army, collected in Asturias by Colonel Carrol, and some marines under Captain Craufurd."

The movement of the British army towards the Portuguese frontier became now an important crisis. On the 9th of October the guards broke up their hut encampment, and marched to Talavera la Real; as did General Campbell's brigade to Lobon.

They were next day quartered in Badajos (the capital of Estremadura); the officers on the inhabitants, the men in convents.

To gratify the Spanish feelings, the commander-in-chief (now Lord Viscount Wellington) on the 7th of October gave a ball, on occasion of Lieutenant-general Sherbrooke being invested with the order of the Bath. A splendid retinue was assembled from all the principal inhabitants, and softer victories succeeded to that of Talavera.

The birth-day of Ferdinand VII. (October 14) was duly observed, a royal salute fired from the ramparts, &c.

The following were the positions of the various armies, at this time, of the enemy:—

Victor's division was between La Mancha and Talavera de la Reyna. Of the Generals Sebastiani at La Mancha; Mortier at Oropesa, Arzobispo, and Naval Moral; Ney, at Salamanca, with 14,000 men. By the 1st of September Soult was at Placentia, Zarza Major, and Coria, with 8,000 men; Victor at Oropesa with 4,000; Mortier at Talavera, with 10,000; and Sebastiani moving to the south.

The Duke del Parque (who succeeded the Marquis Romana on his departure for the supreme junta as a member) at Ciudad Rodrigo; the Duke of Albuquerque in front, with 10,000 men; General Eguia about to join Vanegas in la Mancha, with 25,000 men, the remains of Cuesta's army.

Early in November, General Areyzaga, with whom were Colonel Roche and Lord Macduff, was at Daniel. Lieutenant-general Don Luis Bassecourt, with his troops, occupied a line between Merida and the Tagus.

On the 13th of September, Lord Blantyre, with the 2d battalion of the 42d regiment, joined General Cameron's brigade at Talavera de Real, &c. and on the 14th General Catlin Craufurd's brigade, comprising 28th, 2d battalion, Hon. Lieutenant-colonel Abercromby; 34th, Lieutenant-colonel Maister; and 39th, Lieutenant-colonel Wilson, proceeded to join Lieutenant-general Hill's division at Montijo, Puebla, Nova, and Torremajor.

Lieutenant-general Sir Stapleton Cotton was at Merida with the principal cavalry; the light-infantry, under Brigadier-general Robert Craufurd, at Campo Major; Major-general Cole at Olivenza.

The army was reinforced by a troop of horse-artillery, that under Captain Ross having lost many horses when the army retired from Talavera; and the finer brigade of light-infantry under General Craufurd. The spirit of the troops was never higher, notwithstanding the evils they had encountered in the ordinary effects of the close of autumn and a campaign, both of which were on this occasion severer than usual, from the malignance of a fever which prevailed on the frontiers of Spain and Portugal.

The battle of Ocana, however, soon occasioned a change of position in the British army.

Don Juan de Areyzaga, appointed to a Spanish army in all its circumstances respectable, by a mis-judged confidence descended from the mountains to encounter the enemy in the plain, was beaten and dispersed. To this precipitate conduct was principally ascribed the movement of the British army from the borders of Estremadura, which took place on the 8th of December.

At eight in the morning of that day the guards marched from Badajos with Captain Lawson's brigade of heavy six-pounders, and on the following the king's German legion, with General Cameron's brigade; and early in January, 1810, the whole of the British army had taken up a new position, and was settled in winter quarters.

The commander of the forces, after a visit to Lisbon, to inspect and direct the chain of works constructing there for its defence in the last resort, established himself at Vignu. The main body of the infantry was cantoned in the several towns and villages on the road to the frontier, the 2d division and Major-general Slade's brigade of cavalry excepted, which, under the command of Lieutenant-general Hill, continued in the line of the Tagus.

Brigadier-general Robert Craufurd commanded the out-works on the banks of the Coa, with the light brigade, and 1st German hussars. Next in advance was the 3d division, and Major-general Picton, supported by the 4th. Major-general Cole's was at Guarda Celerico, and the villages in the valley of the Mondego. The brigade of heavy cavalry, under General Fane, was cantoned in Coimbra, and the 16th light dragoons at S. Cambadao.

The rash ignorance of Areyzaga, the commander-in-chief at Ocana, certainly set at nought even the talents of the generals who served under him, among whom there were several who had seen service and obtained considerable credit; and indeed himself had acquired greatly the reputation of personal courage. With his army served the Baron de Crossard, a German nobleman of great experience, who had distinguished himself in the service of Austria, and was employed in a confidential mission from that court, similarly to those British officers who were sent from England on this particular service, upon the simultaneous rising of Spain. To him the Spanish general looked for advice, and from him he received it with a generous frankness that merited the highest praise, and deserved to have been of more utility to the good cause.

By this nobleman, and by the well-informed Lord Macduff, who was also (on the part of Great Britain) with this Spanish army, was laid a plan of operations that promised to produce the best possible result. The army of La Mancha was to pass rapidly through the open country, carry off the detached corps of the enemy, and place itself upon the eastern Tagus, with one division passed over. The rest of the army was to entrench in the mountains. If the positions were found not tenable, it was not to come to battle, but manœuvre so as to gain the mountains of the Guadarama. The Duke of Parque was to ma-neuvre upon the Escorial, and alarm the French on that side of Madrid; while the Duke of Albuquerque was to move in the direction of Talavera. The British were requested to favour these movements, which, as far as possible, would have been done, though it was not much in a condition to have complied. Thus, by the mere effect of manœuvre, the enemy would have been obliged to retire, until his reinforcements arrived, behind the Ebro, without being able to fight a battle. The first part of the plan was well executed; but owing to the imprudence and folly of Areyzaga, all was lost.

Lieutenant-general Areyzaga was appointed late in October to the command of the army of La Mancha, which had been for some time stationed in and about La Carolina, behind the pass of the Opincopeno, and in the mountains of the Sierra Morena. On the 3d of November, the army, consisting of 6,600 defective cavalry, 43,000 effective infantry, and sixty pieces of cannon, with eight day's provisions in waggons, left La Carolina, and, descending from the mountains into the plains of La Mancha, marched partly by Daymel to the left, and along the high road to Madrid, through Valdepenas and Mansanares, towards the Tagus, in the following order:—the advanced-guard, consisting of 2,000 cavalry, were one day's march in front; then the seven divisions of infantry, with the reserve of cavalry and the head-quarters last. The army had no tents, marched from twenty to thirty English miles a day, and slept in the towns. The French, on its approach, retired across the Guadiana. About the sixth day's march, General Freire, who commanded the cavalry, and who always marched with the advanced-guard, was very near surrounding and taking the French General-of-division Latour Maubourg, with 2,100 horse, at Madrilejos. A serjeant of the dragoons of Alcantara, having deserted at night, gave the enemy intimation; and they had just time to get out of the town, when the Spanish hussars and dragoons attacked them at day-break, with great courage, and killed a great many. The army continued its march through Tembleque to Los Barrios. For three or four days the Spanish cavalry were engaged in very spirited combats with the French cavalry, and always succeeded in driving the enemy. At La Guarda, the day before the army arrived at Los Barrios, the horse-grenadiers of Ferdinand VII. the regiments of Farnese and Pavia, sabred, for four miles, the dragoons of the French rear-guard. No prisoners were taken on these occasions.

The army marched on Ocana. The march was admirable, and the conduct of the cavalry brilliant; the infantry had not been engaged. Just in front of Ocana the French rear-guard of the cavalry presented itself, and was charged. It opened right and left, and the Spanish dragoons came upon a regiment of infantry, who were drawn up against the town, which gave them a volley, killed 200, and took two pieces of cannon of the horse-artillery: 10,000 French staid all night in the town, and retreated across the Tagus early in the morning, although 30,000 Spanish infantry bivouacked close to the town. The general-in-chief was with them, and of course bore all the blame of this fatal inactivity.

The general, on quitting Carolina, said his intention was to march rapidly upon Madrid, before the French could collect and concentrate their army; but his incapacity became soon evident. He delayed three days at Los Barrios. He then made a very dangerous flank march, by his right, parallel to the Tagus, to Santa Cruz de la Zarza, twenty English miles from Los Barrios. While the army remained at Los Barrios the cavalry was engaged every day. The royal carbiniers distinguished themselves, particularly at Mora, on the left. At Santa Cruz the general threw bridges over the Tagus, and passed a division over. The army continued in this position three days. It had suffered much; the clothing was very bad. The long marches and wet had destroyed the shoes; half the army was barefooted, but the troops were in high spirits. Nothing can exceed the Spanish soldiers for long marches, and supporting hunger and privation of every kind. The French pushed their patrols of cavalry to within half a league of the town. The next morning the general drew out his army in order of battle. The rains had now ceased, but the French did not appear.

In war, one error generally begets another. The Spanish general took the fatal resolution of quitting the mountains, which were behind him, and of going to seek the French, and give them battle in the plains, with soldiers half-famished, badly armed, and imperfectly disciplined.

On the 18th of November the army marched from Santa Cruz back to Los Barrios. The greatest part of the army was ten miles in front of Ocana. Major-general Bernez and the cavalry arrived at Ocana at four o'clock in the afternoon. They found there the French general, Paris, with 800 dragoons and Poles. About 400 Spaniards attacked them. The engagement was well contested: 400 or 500 men on both sides fell by the sword, among whom was General Paris, who was singled out and carried out of the saddle by one of the lanceros of Pavia.

The army bivouacked that night. The next morning the French army, which had been collecting some days, presented itself, having crossed the Tagus in the night. General Areyzaga drew out his army to receive them. His disposition was bad. He divided it into two equal parts; one on each side of Ocana, which stands in an immense plain, and touching the town, both wings en l'air. This was bad, because, though it was easy to communicate before and behind the town, yet it divided the line. The ground fell a little in front, and there was a gentle slope to some olive plantations about two miles in front, behind which the French were, amounting to 43,000. There was another error in the disposition: the second line was too near the first, so that there was not room to rally the latter in case of disorder. Most of the cavalry were upon the right flank, in four lines; a vicious disposition, because they made little show, and were neither column nor line. The artillery was all stationed upon the flanks of each division, and was admirably served; the Spanish artillery is their best arm.

At seven o'clock in the morning the skirmishers of the Spanish army, under the young, but distinguished General Zayes, who commanded the advanced-guard, attacked and drove back the French cavalry. Between eight and nine all the Spanish army was in order of battle, about 50,000 men, and the cannonade began on both sides. The French fired from a battery in their centre, diagonally, upon the Spanish right, and struck the cavalry often, who supported the cannonade for a long time with great steadiness and discipline. The French then advanced several strong columns from the olives, and marched towards the Spanish centre and right.

At this moment the Spanish general gave orders to the whole of the line on the right of Ocana to advance, and charge with bayonets; the cavalry moving on also in line with the infantry. The line advanced more than 200 paces. The French columns in the mean time deployed, and gave a great fire of volleys, by battalions, and grape, which checked the Spaniards. The French cavalry attacked the left, and were repulsed; but they entered with their cavalry the centre. They manœuvred under the fire of the Spaniards with several columns, and their cavalry shewed itself on their left. The 7th Spanish division, which was on the right of the infantry, and immediately next the cavalry, was thrown into some confusion, but often rallied, formed column, and returned to the attack. Two regiments of that division behaved nobly; the 1st battalion of the Spanish guards, and the 5th of Seville. They remained in line the whole time, floating backwards and forwards, but always facing the enemy. The guards, who were 900 strong, left fourteen officers and 450 men on the field; the 5th of Seville had 450 in action, and about eighty were accounted for. This was the regiment which so much distinguished itself with Sir Robert Wilson at Puerto de Banos, and which was mentioned by him.

the line, and its head came equal to the second line of cavalry. At this instant the French deployed. A great many pieces of artillery in front of the cavalry kept up a heavy discharge of grape, supported by a line of infantry, and the cavalry advanced to charge the right of the Spaniards. The battle was now lost; in a few minutes the whole of the infantry on the right gave way; and the cavalry, seeing this, turned their horses to the rear. The whole of the left of the infantry stood firm, and cheered the general as he passed them; but without saying a word, except that the left should follow him, he quitted the field.

No effort was afterwards made to make the least stand. The whole army fled in the most dreadful confusion. A few squadrons attempted to form up, but gave way again. The rapid fire of the French, their shouts of victory, and the sound of the horses' feet (a sound terrible to the Spaniards in the plains where they had so often been cut to pieces,) augmented the confusion. The cannon was abandoned, and the whole of it was instantly in the power of the French. The French cavalry found themselves in the midst of 30,000 fugitive infantry, who had no position nearer than La Carolina, and were obliged to traverse a plain more than 150 miles in many parts. The French did not pursue beyond the Guadiana.

It is impossible to ascertain what the loss on each side was. The battle lasted about five hours, and the troops were often very near each other, and sometimes mixed. Persons who were on the side of the Tagus with the French, said they lost 6,000 men, but the number was probably exaggerated. It is certain that up to the battle they had lost 1,000 cavalry. The Spaniards only saved four or five pieces of artillery, and hardly any baggage. The Spanish soldiers fought with great valour; but what folly to commit on a plain such young troops with veterans! Had they been in a position, or in mountains, the battle would have probably had a different termination. The Spaniards cannot manœuvre under fire, which the French do with almost as much facility as on parade. The regiment of Murcia was cut to pieces. The Spanish loss was 5,000 killed and wounded, and 15,000 prisoners.

Marshal Victor, who had crossed the Tagus at Villanaurique, pursued all night. At ten o'clock he overtook 800 Spanish dragoons at Sillo, twenty miles from Ocana, who were so fatigued, having been saddled thirty-six hours, and who had unbridled their horses, that they were all made prisoners.

General Areyzaga, on the first appearance of the enemy, mounted into the steeple of Ocana. On descriing the enemy he felt much alarmed, and now, for the first time, perceived what was likely to be the consequence of his rashness and presumption. He went to the left, and before the battle was quite lost, he quitted the field. At this time Lord Macduff, who had been constantly in the midst of the battle, anxiously-entreated Major-general the Marquis of Molespina, who commanded the horse, and was second in command of the army, to endeavour to retrieve the fortune of the day. At that instant the French cavalry broke the centre!

As if too render this unfortunate affair the more signal, previous to the fatal march, the Baron de Crossard thus addressed himself in writing to the Spanish general:

"Possessing too slight a claim to the confidence of your excellency, to be personally informed of your present and ulterior intentions, the situation of your army, that of the co-operating corps, and also that of the enemy, I can only form my opinion by what I see, and by the reports of those whom every appearance concurs to accredit. If I am to confide in these reports, your excellency is resolved to march against the enemy, to offer him battle.

"Upon this supposition, I should be unworthy of the confidence with which I have been honoured by the supreme governing junta of the Kingdoms of Spain and the Indies, and also of your excellency's esteem, if I had not, at the present moment, the firmness respectfully to submit to you the reflections suggested by that resolution.

"Yesterday your excellency concurred with me as to the danger there would be in putting to hazard the affairs of your country, and of thus compromising the interests of Europe, so intimately united with those of Spain. You appeared to me to be sensibly impressed with the honor of delivering Madrid and Castile, by continuing the same grand movements by which you have hitherto driven the enemy before you; and seemed to be very little influenced by the glory of gaining a battle, the success of which is almost always owing more to chance than to the talents of the general; whereas the success acquired by movements crown his trophies, by attesting his genius. But as a battle is the last resource of a general, permit me, with a view to a just decision, to state the causes which authorize a recourse to the chances of an engagement. A general offers battle when he finds his supplies cut off, or obstructed; when, by a combined operation, he is sure of totally destroying the enemy; when either from the quality of his troops, or the advantage of the ground, he possesses a manifest and decided superiority; when it is necessary to anticipate the arrival of reinforcements expected by the enemy, and whose junction would reduce him to an impossibility of keeping the field; when it is of importance to relieve a besieged place; when the consequences of a defeat can, in no case, countervail the advantages that would result from victory; in short, when his object cannot be attained but by a battle.

"These, sir, if I am not mistaken, are the principal situations in which every thing may be abandoned to the hazard of a battle. But I am of opinion, that your excellency is in no one of these situations.

"Having in your rear the most fertile provinces of Spain, and master of the main-roads that lead to them, the abundance which prevails in your excellency's camp banishes every idea of scarcity.

"It is important that a battle should be part of a combined plan between your excellency and the co-operating corps; but such a supposition, in the present case, would shew the absence of all calculation.

"With the exception of the valour and good dispositions with which your excellency has been able to animate your troops, the superiority in all military points incontestably belongs to the enemy.

"By marching voluntarily against the enemy, your excellency yields to him all the advantages of a position which he will have studied in every respect, to which he will have adapted his evolutions, and where he will have distributed his artillery; whereas the march of yesterday has proved to your excellency the difficulty of putting yours in motion.

"The same cause leaves your excellency as little hope of deriving any advantage from the services of your cavalry.

"I conceive it a physical impossibility, that the enemy should be so speedily joined by reinforcements; otherwise, the government, in communicating such information, would have enabled you to be powerfully seconded by diversions on the part of the co-operating corps.

"No besieged place expects direct succours from your excellency.

"Troops newly formed, if beaten, present only the certain prospect of dispersion; and this risk cannot be counterbalanced by any hope of success.

"The object of your excellency being the deliverance of Madrid and the Castiles, it is manifest, that by continuing those manœuvres which are already drawing to a close, this object will be attained without, in any respect, hazarding the existence of the army.

"If I now proceed to examine the advantages that may result from the gaining of a battle, in order to contrast them with the injurious consequences of a defeat, how easy it is to perceive, that the petty amount of the former can never compensate the enormous extent of the latter!

"The evacuation of Madrid and the Castiles are the only advantages which I can discover in the gaining of a battle. Your excellency would not in vain flatter yourself, that, though fighting at the very gates of the capital, you should be powerfully aided by the efforts of the inhabitants; for if the battle of Talavera furnished a proof of the patriotic attachment of those loyal Spaniards, it also demonstrated that very little is to be expected from their exertions.

"Your excellency cannot calculate on a superiority of numbers, on account of the rapidity with which the French constantly effect their junctions. Besides, certain English officers that escaped from the prisons of Madrid, have assured Colonel Dillon, that the French considered this superiority of number as an element of disorder, upon which they founded a part of their hopes.

"What evils would not, on the other hand, flow from a defeat, which a river, fordable, it is true, but extremely confined, would render destructive! Your excellency would in one instant lose your army—that army which is the hope of Spain, the focus of its forces, the school of its numerous levies, of which circumstances, now more than ever, urge and accelerate the formation, at a dead time of the year, appropriated to negotiations. How dreadful the shock which this fatal blow might give to the political system! If, by any chance, a portion of the troops co-operating in the Peninsula did not carry into their operations a spirit of unmixed and absolute good will, such portion would not neglect to lay hold of a legitimate pretext for retreating; and from that moment the activity of the other corps would not only become useless, but would be even dangerous to themselves.

"From this statement I conceive that your excellency will obtain the glory of delivering Madrid and your country, by continuing these movements, and by rigorously abstaining from committing yourself to the hazard of a general engagement. To effect this purpose, it would be sufficient that your excellency should proceed a few leagues farther to your right; and there, taking a position as near as possible to the left bank of the Tagus, you might employ all the means of nature and art to entrench yourself. From the point in question, you might push beyond the right bank of the river a strong advanced-guard, to be supported by an intermediate corps placed in echelon. These two corps, which should likewise be entrenched, might, at pleasure, send out strong detachments in all directions, in front and rear of Madrid, and upon Madrid itself. In this situation your excellency might employ the right in making incursions as far as the post of Guadarama, and by daily attacking the French, you would thus give confidence. to the inhabitants of Madrid, dishearten and intimidate the enemy, obstruct his supplies, and give experience to the Spanish troops.

"In this position it would be easy to wait for intelligence from the Dukes del Parque and d'Albuquerque, to establish a communication with them by the most simple signals, and at length to terminate with success a manœuvre completely decisive.

"But in the most unfortunate event, should your excellency be attacked and defeated in your position, that could not happen until your excellency had previously made the enemy sustain the most sensible loss; and then, falling back upon Cuenca and Valentia, and occupying, at pleasure, the chains of mountains leading into the four kingdoms, your excellency would be still formidable, even in defeat, and would powerfully protect your country."

The discomfiture of General Areyzaga operated upon the Spanish generals, as the experience of defeat did upon their unsettled armies. However, new armies, or rather bodies of men, invariably arose, though their efficiency was not what was required.

In consequence of the intelligence received by the Duke del Parque, commander-in-chief of the army of the left, of what had happened to the army of La Mancha at Ocana, he made the necessary disposition for his retreat from Carpio, which he began on the night of the 26th, and continued the whole of the 27th with the utmost order, as far as Vittoria and Cordovilla, where he halted in order to allow his troops some repose. On the same day, the 27th, at ten o'clock at night, he pursued his retreat with the same order as on the preceding day; and arrived on the 28th, at seven o'clock in the morning, at Alba de Tormes, without his march having in the least been obstructed by the enemy, although the French closely pursued him. He drew up his troops on the heights, which command that town on the right of the Tormes, and ordered part of them to take post on the other eminences, which also command the above town on the left bank of that river, in order to cover his rear-guard, the bridges, and shallows, where the depth of water was very trifling.

In this situation the enemy attacked him in his first position; but was gallantly repulsed by the infantry and artillery. A body of French thereupon appeared on his right flank; and the cavalry, which, according to the general's orders, was to charge the enemy's horse, meanly retreated before it came within pistol-shot; and although part of them were made to rally and return to their post, yet they took to flight again, abandoned the camp, and uncovered the right flank of the army. The enemy taking advantage of this incident, charged the first division of foot, which occupied that point, and although it made the most gallant resistance, yet it was at length compelled to yield to the superior force of the French horse, who broke its line, notwithstanding the exemplary valour it displayed. The van-guard, posted on the left, sustained several charges of the same cavalry, but repulsed it three times, supported by the second division. At length it formed an oblong square, in which were Don Gabriel de Mendizabal, second in command of the said army, and Don Martin de la Carrera, commanding-general of the van-guard, and in this it withstood the enemy's attacks with the greatest valour. A trumpeter was sent by the French to call upon them to lay down their arms; they listened not to this proposal, and continued their defence.

In this state of things night came on, and the van and second division, availing themselves of it, were able to retreat by the heights on the left banks of the Tormes. The Duke del Parque ordered thereupon the whole army to retreat in the direction of Tamamer, and this retrograde movement was accordingly effected with all the order that could be desired, until the following morning, when the army had arrived within a little more than two leagues distance from that town. A rumour flew through the ranks of the rear of the army that the enemy was advancing in force to charge the infantry; this rumour, and a small party of dragoons which made its appearance, occasioned some disorder, and a considerable dispersion; and part of the same soldiers, who fought like heroes on the heights of Alba, threw away their firelocks, knapsacks, and whatever else they carried, to be able to effect their escape. The army then took a position in the mountains of Franza, where the dispersed troops rejoined their corps. In the action of Alba, the van, the first division, and part of the second, behaved with distinguished gallantry, and actions were performed by several officers, which proved uncommon intrepidity and spirit. The enemy's loss was stated, by the commander-in-chief, to be considerable; but that of the Spanish army was also great, for want of horses.

In consequence of the unfortunate action of Ocana, the supreme junta came to the resolution that their excellencies the Marquis de la Romana and Don Rodrigo Riquelme should proceed to the head-quarters in Carolina, with the most ample powers, to make, jointly with his excellency Don Joas Dios Gutierrez Rare, as commissioner with the army of La Mancha, for all such arrangements as they should judge most expedient to repair the loss sustained, and prevent similar unfortunate events for the future. The Marquis de la Romana having declined this charge, the supreme junta appointed, in his stead, his excellency the Marquis of Campo Sagrado, and ordered at the same time all the generals who were in this residence town, and in whom the said commissioners placed confidence, to attend them, and execute their orders in whatever branch of the service the commissioners might deem it expedient to employ them.

The bridges of Almaraz and Arcebispo continued to be occupied by Spanish troops.

Affairs of Austria.—Bonaparte repairs to his Head-quarters at Ingolstadt.—Sanguinary Engagements.—Surrender of Vienna to the French.—Battles of Aspern and Wagram.—An Armistice.—Conditions degrading to the Emperor Francis.—A Treaty of Peace between France and Austria.

AUSTRIA, after humiliating herself in every possible way to the French emperor, found it impossible to obtain peace on terms compatible, even with her existence as an independent nation. An opportunity for war occurred whilst Bonaparte was in Spain, and the Austrian cabinet evinced a disposition to embrace it; but his sudden return to Paris totally disconcerted their measures. It was, however, too late to retract; therefore an Austrian army, under the command of the Archduke Charles, marched into Bavaria, in the month of April, the telegraphic news of which movement induced Bonaparte to quit Paris, and repair to his head-quarters at Ingolstadt.

The French emperor having, after some sanguinary engagements near Abensberg, Hausen, and Dinzlingen, in which the fortune of war favored the Austrian arms so as to force the French garrison at Ratisbon to surrender, succeeded in cutting off the left wing of the Austrian army, and driving it back to Landsbut, and afterwards in advancing by Eckmühl with a superior corps of cavalry, taking the road of Egloffsheim, and forcing to retreat those Austrian corps that were posted on the heights of Leikepoint and Talmessing; the Archduke, on the 23d of April, crossed the Danube near Ratisbon, and joined the corps of Bellegarde, who had opened the campaign by several successful affairs in the Upper Palatinate, had reached Amberg, Neumarkt, and Heman, and had by this time approached Stadt-am-Hof, in order to execute its immediate junction with the Archduke.

Bonaparte ordered the bombardment of Ratisbon, occupied by a few battalions who were to cover the passage of the Danube. On the 23d, in the evening, he became master of it, and immediately hastened along the right bank of the Danube to enter the Austrian states, in order, as he openly declared, to dictate peace at Vienna.

The Austrian army had taken a position near Cham, behind the river Regen, which was watched by some of the enemy's divisions, while the Emperor Napoleon called all disposable troops, in forced marches, from the north of Germany to the Danube, and considerably reinforced his army with the troops of Wirtemberg, Hessa, Baden, and some time after with those of Saxony.

Near Kirn and Nittenau, some affairs had happened between the out-posts, which, fortunately, had no influence upon the armies.

However easy it would have been for the Archduke to continue his offensive operations on the left bank of the Danube without any material resistance, and however gratifying it might have been to relieve provinces which were groaning beneath the pressure of foreign dominion, the preservation of his native land did not permit him to suffer the enemy to riot with impunity in the entrails of the monarchy, to give up the rich sources of its independence, and expose the welfare of the subject to the devastations of foreign conquerors.

These motives induced the Archduke to conduct his army to Bohemia, by the way of Klentsch and Neumarkt, to occupy the Bohemian forest with light troops and part of the militia, and to direct his march towards Budweis, where he arrived on the 3d of May, hoping to join near Lintz, his left wing, which had been separated from him, and which was under the command of Lieutenant-general Baron Hiller.

But the latter had been so closely pressed by the united force of the French armies, that after several spirited engagements, and even after a brilliant affair in which he had the advantage near Neumarkt, and in which the troops achieved all that was possible against the disproportionate superiority of the enemy, he was indeed able to reach Lintz, but was incapable of crossing the Danube, and obliged to content himself with destroying the communication with the left bank.

and taking up a position behind the Traun, near Ebersberg. This was the occasion of an extremely murderous engagement, during which the enemy, in storming the bridge, lost near 4,000 men; Ebersberg was set on fire, and Lieutenant-general Hiller continued his retreat, till he got so much the start as to pass the Danube near Stain, without being disturbed by the enemy, and to wait the approach of the Archduke, who, after having in vain attempted a junction of the army near Lintz, had marched from Budweis to Zwettel; still hoping, by a quick passage of the Danube, to arrest the enemy's progress towards the metropolis.

Meanwhile a corps of Wurtembergers had advanced from Passau along both the shores of the Danube, had occupied Lintz and the bank opposite to it; had restored the bridge, and signalized itself by destroying the defenceless villages and castles which could not be protected by the small advanced-guard proceeding by the side of the main army.

The enemy, by marching through the valley of the Danube in the straightest line, had got so much a-head, that all hopes of coming up with him in front of Vienna vanished; still, however, if that city had been able to hold out for five days, it might have been relieved; and the Archduke resolved on venturing the utmost to rescue that good city, which, by the excellent disposition of its citizens, the faithful attachment to its sovereign, and its noble devotion, has raised to itself an eternal monument in the annals of Austria. All his plans were now directed towards gaining the bridges across the Danube near Vienna, and endeavouring to save the imperial residence by a combat under its very walls.

Vienna, formerly an important fortress, was in vain besieged by the Turks, and would, even now, from the solidity of its ramparts, the strong profiles of its works, and the extensive system of its mines, be capable of making a protracted resistance, had not, for upwards of a century back, the luxury of a large metropolis, the wants of ease, the conflux of all the magnates in the empire, and the pomp of a splendid court, totally effaced every consideration of military defence. Palaces adorn the rampart, the casemates and ditches were converted into workshops of tradesmen, plantations mark the counter-scarpes of the fortress, and avenues of trees traverse the glacis, uniting the most beautiful suburbs in the world to the Corps de la Place.

Although, under such circumstances, no obstinate resistance of the capital was to be expected; yet, from the unexampled loyalty of the inhabitants, it was confidently hoped that Vienna might, for a few days, serve as a tête-de-pont to cover the passage of the river; whence all preparations amounted to no more than to secure the place against a coup-de-main; and, for this reason, the Archduke had some time before directed Field-marshal Hiller to send part of his corps along the right bank towards the capital, in the event of his (the Archduke's) passage to the left shore.

Field-marshal Hiller now received orders to burn the bridge near Stain in his rear, to leave a small corps of observation near Krems, to hasten by forced marches with the bulk of his army to the environs of Vienna, and, as circumstances would permit, by occupying the small islands, to keep up the communication with the city and the debouche across the bridges.

The army of the Archduke advanced, without interruption, by Neupolla, Horn, and Weikendoff upon Stockerau; and, in order to overawe such enterprizes as the enemy might project from the environs of Lintz, part of the corps of the general of artillery, Count Kollowrath, which till then had remained near Pilsen with a view to secure the north and west frontier of Bohemia, was ordered to march to Budweis.

Bonaparte had used so much expedition on his march to Vienna, that on the 9th of May his advanced troops appeared on the glacis of the fortress, whence they were driven by some cannon-shot. From 3 to 4,000 regular troops, as many armed citizens, and some battalions of country militia, defended the city; ordnance of various calibre was placed upon the ramparts; the suburbs were abandoned on account of their great extent; and the numerous islands and low bushy ground behind the town were occupied by some light troops of the corps of Hiller as well as by militia.

The corps itself was posted on what is termed "the Point," on the left shore of the river, waiting the arrival of the army, which was advancing in haste.

The occupation of Vienna formed too essential a part in the extensive plans of the French emperor; its conquest had been announced by him with too much confidence, and was of too great importance towards confirming the prejudice of his irresistible power, for him not to employ every method of taking it before the assistance which was so near could arrive.

For the space of twenty-four hours the howitzers played upon the town; and though several houses were set on fire, the courage of the inhabitants remained unshaken. But a general devastation threatened their valuable property, and when at length the enemy, availing himself of the numerous craft which he found there, crossed the smaller branches of the Danube, dislodged the troops from the nearest islands, and menaced their communication with the left bank; the city was justified in capitulating, while the troops retreated by the great bridge of Tabor, which they afterwards set on fire.

The Archduke received this intelligence in his head-quarters, between Horn and Meissau, and though it was scarcely to be expected that the city, surrounded as it was, should continue its resistance, the Archduke proceeded on his march without interruption, flattering himself that he might be able to execute his favorite project by a bold attempt to pass the Danube near Vienna. This city capitulated on the 13th of May, so that there was no further occasion to expose the army to hazard by crossing the Danube, for which no sufficient preparation had been made, and which must have been effected in the face of the enemy, and under local circumstances of the greatest disadvantage. By the surrender of Vienna the army had also lost a point of support on which to rest its military operations.

In this situation of affairs the Archduke resolved to collect his army at the foot of the hill Bisamberg, and allow it a few days of rest, which, after so many forced marches, it urgently wanted. The cavalry, for the convenience of water, was posted along the Russ, a small rivulet, which is concealed by ground covered with bushes, and the advanced-guards pushed forward to the Danube, in order to observe the movements of the enemy, and prevent his passing the river, which he had already attempted to do from Nussdorf, to what is called the Blacke Lacke, but with so little success that a battalion of his advanced-guard was taken. The chain of the outposts extended on the left side as far as the march, and on the right to Krems; this place and Presburg were occupied by some battalions; and the head-quarters of the Archduke were, on the 16th of May, at Ebersdorf, near the high road leading to Brunn.

On the 19th the outposts reported, that the enemy had taken possession of the great island of Lobau, within about six English miles of Vienna; that his numbers increased there every hour, and that he seemed to be employed in throwing a bridge across the Great Arm of the Danube behind the island. From the top of the Bisamberg, the whole of the opposite country appeared to be enveloped in a cloud of dust, and the glitter of arms evinced a general movement of troops beyond Summering, towards Kaifer Ebersdorf, whither, according to other accounts, the Emperor Napoleon had removed his head-quarters, and was by his presence hastening and promoting the preparations for passing the river.

On the following morning, at day-break, the Archduke resolved to reconnoitre the island, and employ for this purpose part of the advanced-guard, under the command of Field-marshal Lieutenant Count Klenau, supported by some regiments of cavalry. The isle of Lobau forms a convenient place of arms, which is about six English miles long, and four and a half broad, and being separated by the large arm of the Danube from the right bank, nothing prevents the building of a bridge, which is concealed by ground covered with bushes; and the great extent of the island affords the advantage of sending troops and ordnance from so many points of it, that the passage across the smaller arm to the large plain of Marchfeld, may be made good by force of arms.

It was soon perceived, by the strength of the enemy's columns which advanced upon the island, and placed their cannon so as to support the second passage, that he meditated a serious attack. The advanced-guard sustained a tolerably warm engagement, and the cavalry routed the first division of the enemy, which debouched from the low grounds on the edge of the river, late in the evening; upon which the Archduke, whose intention was not to prevent the passage of the enemy, but to attack him the following day, retreated with his cavalry to Anderklau, and ordered the advanced troops to fall back to Maass, according as the enemy should extend himself. On the 21st at day-break the Archduke ordered his army under arms, and formed it in two lines on the rising ground behind Gerasdorf, and between the Bisam-hill and the rivulet Russ. The corps of Lieutenant-general Hiller formed the right wing near Stammersdorf; on its left was the corps of the general of cavalry, Count Bellegarde, and next to that the corps of Lieutenant-general Prince Hohenzollern, in the alignment of Deutsch-Wagram. The corps of Prince Rosenberg was posted by battalions in column on the Russbach on the rivulet Russ, kept Deutsch-Wagram strongly occupied, having, for the security of the left wing, placed on the heights beyond that place a division in reserve. The whole cavalry, which the day before had advanced under the command of Prince Lichtenstein by Anderklau, was called back into the line, filling, in two lines, the space intervening between the left wing of Prince Hohenzollern and the right of Prince Rosenberg.

The vast plain of the Marchfeld spread like a carpet before the front of the line, and appeared, by the absence of every obstruction, to be destined to form the theatre of some great event. The grenadiers remained in reserve near Seienaring, and the corps of the general of artillery, Prince of Reuss, kept the Bisam-hill and the low bushy ground along the Danube strongly occupied. Part of it was still near Krems, the corps being almost broke up by having so many of its divisions detached to so considerable a distance. At nine o'clock the Archduke ordered the arms to be piled, and the troops to dine. The piquet of observation on the Bisam-hill reported, that the bridge across the Danube, behind the Isle of Lobau, being now quite finished, was plainly perceivable, and that troops were without inter-

The outposts, likewise, gave information of the gradual augmentation of the enemy in the town of Enzersdorf and in the villages of Essling and Aspern, and of his advancing towards Hirschstetten. The Archduke Charles now thought that the moment for giving battle had arrived, and hastened to Gerasdorf, where the chief of his quartermaster-general's staff, General Baron Wimpfen, sketched out the plan.

According to this plan the attack was to be made in five columns. The enemy had availed himself extremely well of the advantages of the ground to cover his passage. The extensive villages of Essling and Aspern, mostly composed of brick houses, and encircled all round by heaps of earth, resembled two bastions, between which a double line of natural trenches, intended to draw off the water, served as the curtain, and afforded every possible security to the columns passing from the isle of Lobau. Essling had a granary furnished with loop-holes, and whose three stories afforded room for several hundred men, while Aspern was provided with a strong church-yard. The left side of the latter village borders on an arm of the Danube. Both villages had a safe communication with the bushy ground near the Danube, from which the enemy had it constantly in his power to dispatch, unseen, fresh reinforcements. The Isle of Lobau served at once as a place of arms, and as a tête-de-pont, a bridge-head for the bridge in the rear, across the main arm of the river.

The enemy with the divisions of Generals Molitor, Boudet, Nansouty, Legrand, Espagne, Lasalle, and Ferrand, under the Marshals Massena and Lannes, as well as Marshal Bessieres, together with the guards of the Wirtemburgh, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Baden Auxiliaries, had already left this position, and was directing his march towards Hirschstetten, when the first Austrian advanced-guards met him.

On the 21st of May, exactly at twelve o'clock, the five Austrian columns began to put themselves in motion for the attack. A general enthusiasm had taken possession of the troops: joyful war-songs, accompanied by Turkish music, resounded through the air, and were interrupted by shouts of "Long live our Emperor, long live the Archduke Charles!" whenever the Imperial General appeared, who had placed himself at the head of the second column. Every breast panted with anxious desire and high confidence after the decisive moment; and the finest weather favored the awful scene.

The advanced-guard, under General Nordman, consisting of two battalions of Gyulay and Lichtenstein hussars, had formed near the destroyed bridge of Tabor, and leaving the villages of Kagran and Hirschstetten to the left, and Stadelau to the right, marched in the plain towards Aspern.

It was followed by the first column, which, having left the high-road before the Post-office at Stammersdorf, had marched from the right by half divisions. Its right flank along the Danube was covered by a battalion of St. Georgians, by the first battalion of Vienna volunteers, and by a battalion of militia, under the command of Major Count Colledero. Within a cannon-shot of Stadelau the outposts met the enemy's piquets, which gradually retreated to their original divisions. At this time General Nordman ordered two battalions of Gyulay to draw up en echelon, in order to favor the advance of the column. The enemy, drawn up in large divisions, stood immediately before Aspern, having, to cover his front, occupied all the ditches of the fields, which afforded excellent breast-works. His right was covered by a battery, and his left by a broad and deep ditch (one of those that carry off the waters of the Danube when it overflows), as well as by a bushy ground, which was likewise occupied by several bodies in close order.

Though the enemy had the advantage of position all to himself, inasmuch as the freshes of the Danube were only passable by means of a small bridge, at which he kept up a vigorous fire from behind the ditches, both with cannon and small arms, it did not prevent the second battalion of Gyulay, immediately after the first had penetrated as far as the bushy meadow, to pass the bridge in a column, to form without delay, and with charged bayonets to attack the enemy, who precipitately retreated to Aspern, on which occasion that village, after a vigorous but not very obstinate resistance, was taken for the first time. It was, however, not long before the enemy had it in his power, by the arrival of a fresh reinforcement, to expel again the battalions of Gyulay. By this time some battalions of the column had arrived, the chasseurs of Majon-Schneider, of the second column, joined the advanced-guard of the first; Gyulay formed again, and the enemy was a second time pushed to the lower end of the village, though he succeeded again in regaining what he had lost.

Both parties were aware of the necessity of, maintaining themselves in Aspern at any rate, which produced successively the most obstinate efforts both of attack and defence; the parties engaged each other in every street, in every house, and in every barn; carts, ploughs, and harrows were obliged to be removed during an uninterrupted fire, in order to get at the enemy; every individual wall was an impediment of the assailants, and a rampart of the attacked; the steeple, lofty trees, the garrets and the cellars were to be conquered before either of the parties could style itself master of the place, and yet the possession was ever of short duration; for no sooner had the Austrians taken a street or a house, than the enemy had gained another, forcing them to abandon the former. So this murderous conflict lasted for several hours; the German battalions were supported by Hungarians, who were again assisted by the Vienna volunteers, each rivalling the other in courage and perseverance. At the same time the second column combined its attacks with those of the first, having to overcome the same resistance, by reason of the enemy's constantly leading fresh reinforcements into fire. At length General Bacquant, of the second column, succeeded in becoming master of the upper part of the village, and maintaining himself there during the whole of the night. By the shells of both parties many houses had been set on fire, and illuminated the whole country around. At the extremity of the right wing on the bushy meadow the combats were not less severe. The left flank of the enemy was secured by an arm of the Danube: impenetrable underwood, intersected only by footpaths, covered his front; and a broad ditch and palisades afforded him the advantage of a natural rampart.

Here fought, at the beginning of the battle, the first battalion of Gyulay under Colonel Mariassy; then the battalion of chasseurs under Major Mihailovich; and, finally, the two battalions of Vienna volunteers, under Lieutenant-colonel Steigentesch, and St. Quentin. Here, also, the enemy was defeated; and the first day of this sanguinary engagement terminated by the occupation of Aspern by General Bacquant, at the head of eight battalions of the second column, while Lieutenant-field-marshal Hiller drew the troops of his corps from the village, placed them again in order of battle, and passed the night under arms.

The advanced-guard, commanded by Lieutenant-general Fresnel, advanced by Leopoldau and Kagrau towards Hirschstetten, and consisted of one battalion of chasseurs, and two battalions of Anton Mitsovsky, under General Winzingerode, as well as the brigades of cavalry, Klenau and Vincent, under General Veesev. It was followed in the same direction by the second column, from its position near Gerasdorf. The enemy having been discovered, from the eminences near Hirschstetten, to be near Aspern and Esslingen, the brigade Veesev was detached against the latter place, and the brigade Winzingerode to dislodge the enemy from Aspern. The column deployed before Hirschstetten in two lines, in order to support the advanced-guard, and leaving Aspern to the right, followed upon the plain at a proper distance.

The brigade of Winzingerode, however, met with so spirited a resistance in its attempt upon Aspern, that an attack upon the front alone was not likely to be attended with success; the cavalry, therefore, of the advanced-guard was pushed forward from Aspern on the left, in order to support the attack on the flank with the two batteries of cavalry, as well as to facilitate the junction with the third column, which was advancing by Breitenlee. At the same time the regiment of Reuss Plauen was ordered to the right side of Aspern, with a view to an attack on that place, the rest of the corps was formed into close columns of battalions.

Meanwhile the enemy formed his left wing, without delay, towards Aspern, and his right upon Esslingen. Thus he advanced with columns of infantry and cavalry upon the main army, while an extremely brisk cannonade supported him. A line of twelve regiments of cuirassiers formed the centre of the second line of the enemy, giving to the whole an imposing aspect. Meanwhile the attack of a battalion of Reuss-Plauen on Aspern was repulsed, and it gave way, being thrown into consternation by the loss of its commander, but it rallied immediately after. Count Bellegarde ordered General Bacquant to renew the attack with the regiment of Vogelsang, and to carry the village at all hazards. The latter obeyed the order with the most brilliant success, and Aspern, though defended by 12,000 of the best of the enemy's troops, was carried by storm; Bacquant being assisted by the regiment of Reuss-Plauen, by a battalion of Archduke Rainer, and by the brigade of Maier, of the third column.

To frustrate this attack, the enemy advanced with two columns of infantry, supported by his heavy cavalry, upon the main army, repulsed the two regiments of Klenau and Vincent's light horse, and fell upon the infantry. The latter expecting him with their firelocks ready, and with cool intrepidity, fired at ten paces distance, so effectually as totally to rout the enemy, upon which General Veesev, at the head of a division of Klenau, attacked the enemy's cuirassiers with such energy, that their retreat was followed by that of the infantry. Hereby the army along the whole of its line was disengaged from the enemy, obtained communication on the left with the corps of Prince Hohenzollern, and became possessed of the important post of Aspern. The enemy being in full retreat attempted no further attack, and confined himself merely to a cannonade. The corps remained during the night under arms. The enemy repeated, indeed, his attacks on Aspern, but they all proved unsuccessful.

The third column, according to its destination, had begun its march from its position at Seiering, by the road of Sussenbrunn and Breitenlee. Some divisions of O'Reilly's light-horse and chasseurs formed the advanced-guard of the column, and at three o'clock in the afternoon met near Hirschstetten, the left wing of the enemy, which consisted mostly of cavalry. As about this time the first and second columns advanced intrepidly upon Aspern, and the enemy began to fall back to his position between Esslingen and Aspern, Lieutenant-general Hohenzollern ordered up his batteries, and a very brisk cannonade commenced on both sides.

The first line formed in close columns of battalions, and advanced with the greatest resolution upon the enemy, when his cavalry suddenly rushed forward in such disproportionate numbers, and with such rapidity, that there was scarcely time to save the artillery which had been brought up, and the battalions were left to defend themselves by their own unsupported exertions. This was the remarkable moment in which the regiments of Zach, Joseph Colloredo, Zettwitz, Froon, a battalion of Stein's, and the second battalion of the Archduke Charles's legion, under the conduct of Lieutenant-general Brady, and Generals Buresch, Maier, and Koller, demonstrated, with unparalleled fortitude, what the fixed determination to conquer or die is capable of effecting against the most impetuous attacks. The enemy's cavalry turned these battalions on both wings, penetrated between them, repulsed the squadrons of O'Reilly's light-horse, who were unable to withstand such a superior force, and in the confidence of victory, summoned these corps of heroes to lay down their arms. A well-directed and destructive fire was the answer to this degrading proposition, and the enemy's cavalry abandoned the field, leaving behind them a considerable number of dead. This corps, as well as the others, passed the night on the field-of-battle.

The fourth and fifth were both composed of the corps of Lieutenant-general Prince Rosenberg, on either bank of the Russbach, and directed their march from their position, to the right and left of Deutsch-Wagram. The fourth proceeded through Roschdorf straight to Esslingen. Colonel Hardegg, of Schwarzenberg's Uhlans, conducted the advanced-guard. The fifth directed its march towards the left, in order to go a circuit round the little town of Enzersdorf, and drive the enemy out of the place. It was reinforced by Stipsic's hussars, under the command of Colonel Frolich. Lieutenant-general Klenau led the advanced-guard of both columns. As this circuit round Enzersdorf obliged the fifth to describe a longer line, it was necessary for the fourth to advance more slowly. Enzersdorf, however, was quickly taken possession of by a detachment of Stipsic's hussars, and of the Wallacho-Illyrian frontier regiment, as it was already for the greatest part evacuated by the enemy, from whom no more than thirty prisoners could be taken. Both columns now received orders to advance upon Esslingen. The fourth in close columns of battalions of Czartorisky's, Archduke Louis's and Coburgh's, who were twice successively attacked by upwards of 2,000 of the enemy's heavy cavalry; but these were each time put to flight by the brave infantry with considerable loss. Of the fifth column, two battalions of Chastellar's advanced directly upon Esslingen, while two battalions of Bellegarde's were ordered to penetrate the left flank of the village, and the small contiguous wood. Two battalions of Hiller's and Sztarray's, besides the Archduke Ferdinand's and Stipsic's regiments of hussars, and two divisions of Rosenberg's light horse, were in the plain in readiness to support them. These combined attacks were made twice successively with uncommon intrepidity, the enemy's troops were repulsed at all points, and driven into the village of Esslingen which had been set on fire. But as the enemy's army, drawn up in several lines between Esslingen and Aspern, met each new attack with fresh reinforcements, because the safety of his retreat depended on the possession of this village, the Austrian troops were obliged to abandon it at the approach of night, and to await, under arms, the arrival of morning.

The reserve corps of cavalry had marched in two columns, under the command of General Prince of Lichstentein, and advanced upon the New Inn, between Raschdorf and Breitenlee, General Count Wartensleben, with Blankenstein's hussars, conducted the advanced-guard. No sooner did the enemy perceive the general advance of the army, than he placed the bulk of his cavalry, supported by some battalions of infantry, in order of battle between Esslingen and Aspern, and commenced a brisk cannonade upon the columns of Austrian cavalry as they approached.

Prince Lichtenstein directed his columns to march forward in two lines, on which the enemy detached 4 or 5,000 cavalry from his position to the right by way of Esslingen, and excited some apprehension that he would impede the progress of the fourth column, or even break through it. The Prince therefore ordered four regiments to the left, and kept the second column formed in two lines, till he was convinced that the fourth would not meet with any impediment to its march.

During this movement the remainder of the enemy's cavalry advanced with the greatest confidence towards the right wing of the Austrians. They were received with a firmness which they probably did not expect. The intrepidity of the cavalry which had marched up, particularly Maurice Lichtenstein's regiment, and the Archduke Francis's cuirassiers, the former headed by its gallant colonel, Roussel, frustrated the repeated assaults of the enemy by counter-attacks, by which they at length put a stop to his impetuous advance, and completely repulsed him with considerable loss. In these conflicts, the French General of Division, Durosnel, equerry to the emperor, was taken prisoner a few paces from him, as was also General Foulcr, equerry to the empress, after having been slightly wounded. Notwithstanding the fire of musketry which now ensued, the Prince ordered a general advance, by which the enemy was straightened in the alignment between Esslingen and Aspern; but, on account of the flanking fire from Esslingen, could not be pursued any further. The fire of his guns was answered with spirit by the horse-artillery. About seven in the evening, 3,000 horse were again detached towards the point of Union between the cavalry of reserve and the left wing of Prince Hohenzollern, and fell en masse upon the brigades of cuirassiers of Generals Kroyher, Klary, and Siegenhal; but by the steady intrepidity of the Blankenstein's and Riesch's regiments, who with the utmost gallantry made a sudden attack on the enemy's flanks, his cavalry was again repulsed, and part of it, which had fallen upon some of the regiments of the new levies, placed in the third line, was cut off, and there taken. Meanwhile night came on, and it was passed by the Prince in the best state of preparation on the ground which he had gained from the enemy.

For the first time Bonaparte had sustained a defeat in Germany. His glory was obviously at stake. New efforts were to be expected the following day; but he was also obliged to fight for his existence. By means of fire-ships sent down the Danube, the Archduke had caused the enemy's bridge on the Lobau to be broken down, and its repairs would take up several hours. Meanwhile Napoleon had already in the evening been joined by the corps of General Oudinot; and all the disposable troops followed from Vienna and the Upper Danube, and were transported across the river in vessels as fast as they arrived. The Archduke, on his part, ordered the grenadier corps, which had not had any share in the first engagement, to advance from its position near Gerasdorf to Breitenlee; and the short night was scarcely sufficient to complete the respective preparations for the commencement of a second tragedy.

Early on the 22d the enemy renewed his attacks, which far surpassed in impetuosity those of the preceding day. It was a conflict of valour and mutual exasperation. Scarcely had the French guards compelled General Bacquant to abandon Aspern, when the regiment of Klebek again penetrated into the burning village, drove back the choicest troops of the enemy, and engaged in a new contest, in the midst of the conflagration, till, at the expiration of an hour, it was also obliged to give way. The regiment of Benjowsky now rushed in, and at the first onset gained possession of the church-yard, the walls of which Field-marshal Lieutenant Hiller immediately ordered the first division of pioneers to pull down, and the church, together with the parsonage, to be set on fire. Thus was this regiment, supported by some battalions commanded by General Bianchi, at length enabled to maintain itself at the entrance of the village, after overcoming the resistance, bordering on despair, opposed by the flower of the French army. Neither could the enemy produce any farther effect upon the bushy meadow, after Lieutenant-general Hiller had ordered the force there to be supported by two battalions of Anton Mitsowsky's, and a battery: on which the Jagers, St. George's, and two battalions of Vienna volunteers, drove him from his advantageous position, which he never afterwards attempted to recover.

As about this time the left wing of the corps was likewise placed in security by three batteries sent by the lieutenant-general, to support the general of cavalry, Count Bellegarde, and the latter maintained his ground against the most desperate attacks of the enemy; the Lieutenant-general Hiller kept his position on the left flank of the enemy, and the victory was decided in this quarter. The corps was therefore again formed in two lines, and thus awaited the approaching events.

Count Bellegarde having received a message from General Bacquant, that the enemy were assembling in force near Aspern, before the bushy meadow, and apparently had in view an assault upon that point, was going to throw a fresh battalion of Argenteau's into Aspern, when the enemy, in heavy columns of infantry and cavalry, supported by a numerous artillery, began to advance upon the centre of the corps in the plain.

The troops stationed at Aspern, exhausted as they were with the incessant ~~fire~~ kept up during the night, were unable to withstand the impetuosity of the attack; their ammunition, both for artillery and musketry, began to fail, and General Bacquant retreated in good order to the church-yard. This post, gained at so dear a rate, was again taken from him, after several attacks sustained in conjunction with Lieutenant-general Hiller; the place was alternately taken and lost, till at length the fire obliged the enemy to abandon the houses, and a last assault of Hiller's corps prevented all further attempts.

From the moment of the re-taking of Aspern, it became possible to oppose an offensive movement to the enemy advancing upon the centre, and to operate upon his left flank and communication. The defence of Aspern was therefore left entirely to Hiller's corps; and while Count Bellegarde employed his right wing on Aspern, he formed his left and the centre in the direction of Esslingen, in such a manner that by degrees he gained the right flank of the enemy, compelled him to retreat, and by the complete effect of the artillery, brought to bear upon the left wing, which commanded the whole space from Aspern to Esslingen, gave him a most severe defeat.

Vain was every effort to shake the intrepidity of the Austrian troops. Napoleon rode through his ranks, and according to the report of the prisoners, made them acquainted with the destruction of the bridge, but added, that he had himself ordered it to be broken down, because in this case there was no alternative, but victory or death. Soon afterwards the whole of the enemy's line put itself in motion, and the cavalry made its principal attack on the point where the corps of cavalry of Prince Lichtenstein communicated with the left wing of Lieutenant-general the Prince of Hohenzollern. The engagement now became general; the regiments of Rohan, D'Aspre, Joseph Colloredo, and Stain, repulsed all the attacks of the enemy. The generals were every where at the head of their troops, and inspired them with courage and perseverance. The Archduke himself seized the colours of Zach's, and the battalion, which had already begun to give way, followed with new enthusiasm his heroic example. Most of those who surrounded him were wounded; his adjutant-general, the Count Colloredo, received a ball in his head, the wound from which was at first considered dangerous; a squeeze of the hand signified to him the concern of this sympathising commander, who, filled with contempt of death, now fought for glory and for his country.

About this time, Lieutenant-general the Prince of Hohenzollern observed on his left wing, near Esslingen, a column, which had been formed during the heat of the engagement, and afforded an advantageous point of attack. Frolich's regiment, commanded by Colonel Mecsery, was ordered thither in three corps, and repulsed four regiments of cavalry, accompanied with infantry and artillery. The corps remained in the position which they had taken, till the grenadiers of the reserve, which the Archduke had ordered forward from Breitenlee, arrived to relieve the battalions exhausted with the sanguinary conflict, and continued the attack upon the centre of the enemy's position. Lieutenant-general D'Aspre penetrated with the four battalions of grenadiers of Przezinsky, Puteany, Scovaux, and Scharlach, without firing a shot, to the enemy's cannon, where he was flanked by such a destructive fire from Esslingen, that nothing but the presence of the Archduke, who hastened to the spot, could have induced his grenadiers to maintain their ground. Captain Count Dombasle had already reached the enemy's battery, when he was wounded by two balls, and quitted the field. About noon the Archduke ordered a new assault upon Esslingen, which was immediately undertaken by Field-marshal Lieutenant D'Aspre, with the grenadier battalions of Kirchenbetter and Scovaux on the left, and Scharlach and Georgy in front. Five times did these gallant troops rush up to the very walls of the houses, burning internally and placed in a state of defence; some of the grenadiers thrust their bayonets into the enemy's loop-holes; but all their efforts were fruitless, for their antagonists fought the fight of despair. The Archduke ordered the grenadiers to take up their former position; and when they afterwards volunteered to renew the assault, he would not permit them, as the enemy was then in full retreat.

Both divisions of Prince Rosenberg's corps, which, in advancing to the engagement, had composed the fourth and fifth columns, were formed before break of day for a new attack, for which the enemy likewise made preparation on his side, but with a manifest superiority in numbers. Prince Rosenberg resolved to attack the village of Esslingen with the Archduke Charles's regiment of infantry, to push forward his other troops in battalions, and in particular to go and meet the enemy, who was advancing in the open country between Esslingen and the nearest arm of the Danube. The village was already gained, and battalions advancing on the left, obliged the enemy, drawn up in several lines, to yield. The most violent cannonade was kept up incessantly on both sides, and it was sustained by the troops with the greatest fortitude.

Favored by a fog which suddenly came on, the enemy's heavy cavalry ventured to attack on all sides the corps formed by Sztarray's and Hiller's regiments of infantry. These brave fellows received him with fixed bayonets, and at the last moment poured in their fire with such effect, that the enemy was compelled to betake himself to flight with considerable loss. Five times were these attacks of Sztarray's and Hiller's regiments repeated, and each time were they repelled with equal courage and resolution. The cavalry contributed all that lay in their power to the pursuit of the enemy, and the support of the infantry. Coburg's, the Archduke Louis's and Czartorisky's regiments, belonging to the division of Lieutenant-general Dedovich, stationed on the right, renewed the exertions of the preceding day with the same distinction and the same success. After this severe conflict, the enemy seemed to have no inclination to expose himself to any fresh disaster, and confined himself merely to the operation of his superior artillery. About eleven A. M. Prince Rosenberg received orders from the Archduke, commander-in-chief, to make a new attack upon Esslingen, and a message to the same effect was sent to Lieutenant-general Dedovich, who commanded the right division of this corps. Prince Rosenberg immediately formed two columns of attack under the conduct of Lieutenant-generals Princes Hohenlohe and Rohan, while Lieutenant-general Dedovich advanced against the citadel of the place, and the magazine surrounded with walls and ditches. The attack was made with redoubled bravery, and the troops rushed with irresistible impetuosity into the village. Still, however, they found it impossible to maintain this post, into which the enemy kept continually throwing new reinforcements, which was of the utmost importance for covering his retreat, which he had already resolved upon, and which he defended with an immense sacrifice of lives. Prince Rosenberg, therefore, resolved to confine himself to the obstinate maintenance of his own position, to secure the left flank of the army, and to increase the embarrassment of the enemy by an incessant fire from all the batteries. In the night between the 22d and 23d, the enemy accomplished his retreat to the Lobau, and at three in the morning his rear-guard also had evacuated Esslingen, and all the points which he had occupied on the left bank of the Danube. Some divisions pursued him closely, and took possession as near as possible of the necessary posts of observation.

Thus terminated a conflict of two days, which will be ever memorable in the annals of the world and in the history of war. The loss of the French during these two days could not be under 30,000 men; and that of the Austrians was admitted to be 20,000.

In the middle of a dark tempestuous night the French crossed the Danube, from Lobau, July 4, and having, by a feint, deceived the Austrians, took up a position on their left flank, and thus compelled them to abandon their works and offer Bonaparte battle, on the spot most convenient to him, at Enzersdorff. A series of hard fighting then commenced, and continued the whole of the 5th; but in which neither party had any decided advantage: the two armies remained on their ground, preparing for a renewal of the combat on the following morning. At break of day on the 6th, the battle was resumed at Wagram, with great fury; but the superiority of numbers, on the part of the French, and the advantage of those positions which they had obtained the day before, ultimately turned the battle in their favor.

The following account of this fatal battle appeared in the Austrian journals:

"By the 4th, the enemy had completed the new bridge from the Isle of Lobau across a branch of the Danube, in which he was much favored both by the ground and by an immense number of artillery. The imperial and royal army was drawn up on the eminence behind the rivulet Russ, extending its right wing beyond Sussessbrunn and Kagan, and its left beyond Mackgrafen-Neusiedel. The centre was posted near Wagram. The enemy having, in the night between the 4th and 5th, crossed over to the left bank of the Danube, large masses appeared very early in the morning in the plain. Not long before noon he attacked the line of the imperial and royal army in all its points. But his greatest exertions were directed against the centre, probably with a view of forcing it. His attacks, though repeated with the greatest impetuosity, and supported by an immense number of ordnance, among which were many batteries of the heaviest calibre, proved this day abortive. The firing ceased at ten o'clock at night. The imperial and royal army had, on the whole of its line, maintained its positions, and made a considerable number of prisoners, among whom there are many Saxon, Badenese, Italian, and Portuguese soldiers.

"On the 6th, in the morning, at four o'clock, the enemy renewed his attacks with still larger masses and greater impetuosity than on the preceding day. Even thus his efforts against the centre and the right wing were attended with so little success, that the latter had even gained such advantages, as to justify the expectation of the completest victory, when the enemy, with fresh divisions and great superiority, suddenly penetrated the left wing near Mackgrafen-Neusiedel, and succeeded, after an obstinate engagement, in compelling it to retreat. One of the wings of the royal and imperial army being thereby exposed, his imperial and Royal Highness the Archduke and Generalissimo has directed the retreat by the way of Siammersdorf and the Bisamhill, in consequence of which the army occupies a new position, covering the communication with Bohemia. This retreat was made good in the best order, and without material loss.

"In the centre, as well as in the right wing, the enemy suffered very considerably. Six thousand prisoners were taken from him, among whom were three generals. He likewise lost twelve cannon with ammunition, and was in every respect so much weakened, that he has not attempted since to pursue the royal and imperial army further.—General Lasalle is among his dead.

"The imperial and royal army has also to lament a great loss. In General Nordman it has been deprived of a very eminent officer. Generals Peter Vecsal, D'Aspre, and Vukassovitz, are without hopes of recovery. Generals Prince of Hesse-Homberg, Stutterheim, and Paah, are less severely wounded. His Imperial Highness the Generalissimo himself, and Prince Lichtenstein, received slight musket-wounds, which, however, will not be attended with any dangerous consequences. It remains to be observed, BOOK VIII. that the whole army has again afforded such proofs of courage and perseverance, as not to cloud our future prospects with any apprehensions."

CHAP. X.

Though this official account appeared in some degree of a favorable nature, the results of the battle were very humiliating to the Emperor Francis and his dominions. Bonaparte, whose active and uneasy spirit was ever on the alert, pushed the advantages he had thus gained to the uttermost; his numerous hosts bore down all before them; and as neither he nor his armies were particular in their destructive policy of marauding and indiscriminate spoil, wherever they gained advantage, we must not be surprised that no terms of regular warfare were attended to, and that every method was devised, to strike terror among the vanquished. The Archduke Charles retired in disgust, and on the 12th an armistice was solicited and agreed to; though subsequent to the battles of the 5th and 6th, no engagement took place between the armies of any great importance. Massena, indeed, attacked and defeated the rear of the Austrians, on the 10th, at Hollabaren; and on the 11th, Znaim was attacked; but these partial affairs did not seem of sufficient moment, to compel the Emperor Francis to apply for an armistice; far less to accede to one on such humiliating conditions; viz.

Art. 1. "There shall be a suspension of arms between his majesty the Emperor of the French, and his majesty the Emperor of Austria.

2. "The line of demarkation shall be on the side of Upper Austria, the frontier that separates Austria from Bohemia, the circle of Znaim, that of Brunn, and a line traced from the frontier of Moravia, on Raab, which shall begin at the point where the frontier of the circle of Brunn touches the March, and descending the March to its confluence with the Taya; from thence to St. Johann and the road to Presbourg and a league round the town; the great Danube to the mouth of the Raab; the Raab to the frontiers of Stiria; Stiria, Carniola, Istria, and Fiume.

3. "The citadels of Brunn and Gratz shall be evacuated immediately after the signing of the present armistice.

4. "The detachment of Austrian troops which are in the Tyrol and the Voralberg, shall evacuate these two countries. Fort Sachsenbourg shall be given up to the French troops.

5. "The magazines of provisions and clothes which shall be found in the countries to be evacuated by the Austrian army, and which belong to it, may be emptied.

6. "In relation to Poland, the two armies shall take the line which they at present occupy.

7. "The present suspension of arms shall continue for a month, and fifteen days notice shall be given before hostilities recommence.

8. "There shall be named commissioners respectively for the execution of the present dispositions.

9. "The Austrian troops shall evacuate the countries pointed out in the present armistice, and shall retire by daily marches.

10. "The fort of Brunn shall be surrendered on the 14th to the French army, and that of Gratz on the 16th."

After a protracted negociation, a treaty of peace between France and Austria was signed, at Vienna, on the 15th of October. According to the terms of this treaty the Emperor of Austria ceded a great portion of his territory to Napoleon; agreed to a contribution to indemnify France for the expences of the war; and to acknowledge Joseph Bonaparte King of Spain. To the King of Bavaria she gave up Saltzburg, and a tract of country along the banks of the Danube, from Passau to Lintz. To the King of Saxony she yielded the whole of Western Gallia; to Russia so much of the eastern part of that province as contained a population of 400,000 souls. To France she ceded Fiume and Trieste, with the whole of the country south of the Saave, to where that river enters Bosnia. She also gave up the inhabitants of the Tyrol, on condition of their receiving from Bonaparte a full and free pardon.

This brave people had manifested an heroic spirit of independence, and continued to resist the French, long after they were abandoned by the government in whose cause they fought. After repeatedly expelling the invaders of their country, they were at length subdued, their gallant chief, Hoffer, was taken, and, as no further mention was made of him by the captors, his fate may be readily conjectured by the reader.

CHAPTER XI.

Affairs of Sweden.—Denmark.—Russia.—Turkey.—Holland.—Prussia.—America.—East-Indies.—Great Britain.—Expedition against Italy.—Expedition under the Earl of Chatham.—A new Administration.—French Affairs.

DURING this eventful period, Sweden had become the prey of French intrigue. Impoverished by the loss of her detached province of Pomerania, she had been engaged in an arduous and unequal war against Russia, by which the whole of Finland had also been wrested from her. The distress and misery occasioned by these misfortunes were aggravated by the eruption of an infectious disorder, which greatly thinned the population. But undismayed by the triple scourge, war, pestilence, and famine, the Swedish monarch persisted in an unavailing opposition to France, which urged popular discontent, and fomented a revolution, which removed him from the throne. He was succeeded by his uncle, Charles, Duke of Sudermania, who became a willing agent in the blockading system of Bonaparte, and agreed to close his ports against the commerce of Great Britain.

Denmark, too weak, since the loss of her navy, to maintain even a shadow of independence, exposed to the maritime hostility of Great Britain on the one hand, and to the military thralldom of France on the other, suffered greatly from the pressure of the war. Her interest obviously inclined her to cultivate a commercial intercourse with Great Britain, yet she was compelled to forego that interest almost wholly, as the small portion of her trade that remained lay entirely at the mercy of the French Emperor and his subjects.

Russia, though jealous of the growing power of France, remained under her control; this may be gathered from the declaration of the two emperors at Erfurth. She had concurred, with apparent reluctance, in the war against Austria; an army under Prince Gallitzin penetrated into Galicia; but its movements were so tardy, that there is reason to believe it was destined to wait the result of the contest, and to side with the victor. This demonstrative co-operation was required at the peace by the cession of territory before-mentioned. In the war with Sweden she had acquired the province of Finland, the rivers Tornes and Meconio, the sea of Oland and the gulph of Bothnia being fixed, by treaty, as the future boundaries of the two states. On the establishment of peace between Great Britain and Turkey, her arms were directed against the latter powers, but, notwithstanding the advantage of another revolution at Constantinople, they were attended with no decisive success. On viewing, therefore, the internal condition of the Russian empire, it was apparent that great inconvenience and much dissatisfaction arose from the adoption of the French anti-commercial system; and these effects might be considered as tending to advance the interests of Napoleon, in weakening the government, by alienating the people from their monarch.

During the negociation of peace between France and Austria, (mentioned in the close of the preceding chapter) Bonaparte dispatched the following extraordinary epistle to the Emperor of Russia:

“Monsieur my Brother,

“The Duke of Vicenza informs me that your imperial majesty wished for peace with Sweden, and that you have obtained the advantages which you desired. Will your majesty permit me to congratulate you upon the event?”

“The negociations of Altenburg have been transferred to Vienna. Prince John, of Lichtenstein, conducts them with M. De Champagny, and I expect I shall soon be able to inform your majesty of peace being concluded with Austria. You will see by the treaty, that, conformably to your wishes, the greater part of Galicia will not change masters; and that I have managed your interests as you would have done yourself, conciliating every thing with what honor required of me. The prosperity and welfare of the duchy of Warsaw require that it should possess the favorable regards of your majesty; and your majesty's subjects may rest assured that, in no case, nor under any circumstances, have they to expect any protection from me.

“I have given to Austria the most advantageous peace she could expect. She only loses Saltzburgh, and a mere trifle on the side of the Inn. She cedes nothing in Bohemia. On the CHAP. XI.

1809.

BOOK VIII. side of Italy she cedes only what is indispensable for my communication with Dalmatia. The CHAP. XI. Austrian monarchy, therefore, remains entire.

This is the second experiment which I have been willing to make. I have used towards her a moderation which she had no right to expect. In this I hope I have done what is gratifying to your majesty.

"I send your majesty the English journals last received. You will there see, that the English ministers are fighting with each other; that there is a revolution in the ministry, and that all is perfect anarchy. The folly and absurdity of that cabinet are beyond description. They have recently occasioned the destruction of from 25 to 30,000 men in the most horrible country in the world; it would have been just as well to have thrown them into the sea; so pestilential are the marshes of Walcheren! In Spain they have lost a very considerable number of men. General Wellesley has had the extreme imprudence to commit himself in the heart of Spain with 30,000 men, having on his flanks three armies, consisting of 90 battalions, and from 40 to 50 squadrons, whilst he had in his front the army commanded by the king, which was of equal force. It is difficult to conceive such an act of presumption. It remains at present to be ascertained who are to succeed the late ministry.

"The United States are on the worst terms with England, and seem disposed, sincerely and seriously, to approximate to our system.

"I pray God, Monsieur my brother, to have you in his high and holy keeping.

(Signed)

"Schoenbrunn, Oct. 10, 1809."

The Turkish empire was at this time a prey to intestine commotions, and seemed ready to follow the fate of all those governments which, in the successive convulsions of Europe, by their own imbecility, and disgraceful adherence to feudal tyrannies, had been overthrown or enthralled.

The kingdom of Holland, fitted by nature and the habits of its people for the pursuits of commerce, suffered so severely by the continental system, that its ruler, in order to relieve the distresses of his subjects, relaxed the severe restrictions which his brother had obliged him to impose on their trade with England. This conciliatory policy by no means suited the arbitrary views of the French despot, who, bent on the total exclusion of the English from the continent, determined to reduce all the states of that vast tract under an entire submission to his will. He doubled the number of custom-house-officers in all the Dutch ports and trading-towns, and ordered his pacific brother to Paris, to receive new lessons of discipline in the art of governing;

which was a measure preparatory to an important change, which Bonaparte had in contemplation, to affect the affairs of Holland.

For this purpose, Napoleon found, in his younger brother Jerome, a more tractable, if not a more apt pupil. The kingdom of Westphalia he had consolidated from portions of territory and population wrested from Prussia, Hesse, Hanover, Brunswick, and other states, in which he also formed a complete epitome of the French empire, in the nature of its legislation and government. The law of conscription and the system of commercial exclusion prevailed there in full force, and reduced the heterogeneous mass to a condition purely military. A state so constituted, in the midst of what was denominated the Rhenish confederacy, operated as a powerful check on them, and served France in the future extension of her conquests.

With respect to Prussia, that nation, paralyzed by the shock of the French arms, its finances ruined, and its resources destroyed by the dire effects of war, monopoly, and abusive restrictions, had indeed become equally insignificant, both as a military and as a commercial state.

In Bonaparte's letter to the Emperor of Russia, (already quoted) the United States are represented to be inimical to England. Indeed, the intercourse of America with Europe had been completely interrupted by the prohibitory decrees of Napoleon, and by the orders in council of the British government. The Americans, considering these measures as equally an invasion on their commercial rights, that government passed a non-intercourse act against both the belligerents. The differences of America with Great Britain originated in two sources, the attack on the Chesapeake frigate, and the above orders in council. The British minister, Mr. Erskine, had offered reparation for the one, and a suspension of the other, on condition that America should renew her intercourse with Great Britain. These proposals were received with great satisfaction, and preparations were making to revive the trade, when orders arrived for the recall of Mr. Erskine, declaring that the arrangement he had made was unauthorised by his instructions. Mr. Jackson, who succeeded him, had to renew the negotiation under the disadvantages arising from the disappointment of the Americans, among whom he was, on other accounts, unpopular. A correspondence took place between him and the secretary of the United States, which, as it consisted chiefly in recrimination on their respective governments, tended rather to aggravate than to assuage the dispute; and at length Mr. Jackson became so obnoxious, that the American ministers declined all further intercourse with him.

The Americans sought an equivalent for the loss of commerce, by promoting agriculture and domestic manufactures; and it was a subject of exultation in Mr. Jefferson's (the president's) speech, "that the arbitrary edicts of the contending powers had produced a revolution in the pursuits and habits of the people, and had directed them to improve their internal resources, and thus to render themselves less dependent on foreign intercourse."

Among the other transatlantic states, the extraordinary events of revolutionary principles produced in Europe had tended to foment changes. France lost her few remaining possessions, and was frustrated in her design of subjugating the Spanish colonies. The arbitrary and absurd policy which the mother-country had, from the earliest times, exercised towards these dependencies, did not entirely alienate them; and, probably, their attachment was rather strengthened by a sense of indignation at the insults and oppressions of their new enemy. Yet many expressions of public feeling testified that the time was fast approaching, when, by the natural course of human affairs, they should assert their independence. The conduct of Great Britain towards them grounded her alliance with Spain, and she abjured every project of seconding revolutionary proceedings, and of severing those possessions from the dominion of Ferdinand VII. With respect to the Brazils, the trade of Great Britain, though necessarily limited, was rendered more productive by the abolition of certain vexatious imports, and by other beneficial measures to which the Portuguese court acceded, for the mutual benefit of the two countries.

The East Indies were at this period threatened by foreign hostilities, and internal disputes; for Bonaparte, by means of his diplomatic and military emissaries, had endeavoured to persuade the court of Persia to make war on the English possessions. The governor-general made war-like demonstrations against that empire, but at the same time dispatched Sir Harford Jones as ambassador, who succeeded in destroying the French influence; and the good understanding thus restored with Great Britain, was testified on the part of the Persian government by the arrival of an embassy to London. At Madras, however, discord gained its malign influence, by disputes of a serious nature which took place between the civil and military governments, arising from certain allegations of grievances, by the officers who commanded the native troops; and matters grew so serious, that an appeal was made to the governor in council, who was compelled to adopt severe and rigorous measures before the restoration of tranquillity could be established.

In reverting to the affairs of Great Britain, during this period, we find that the labours of ministers, for the deliverance of the continent, were interrupted by concerns of a domestic nature, which occupied parliament during almost the whole of the session of 1809. An investigation into conduct highly reprehensible, soon led to the discovery of many public abuses wherein persons of high rank and office were implicated. For the prevention of the sale of seats in the house of commons, (a practice destructive of all public and private integrity,) several plans were brought forward and rejected. The enactment of Mr. Curwen's bill, for better securing the purity of parliament, was, however, at length, after several modifications, enacted.

The correspondence, occasioned by the overtures of the Russian and French emperors from Erfurth, was laid before both houses, and plainly demonstrated the impossibility of making peace, consistently with those principles which Great Britain had proclaimed, and acted upon throughout the war, and more particularly after the commencement of the war in Spain. On the renewal of war between Austria and France, it was resolved to second the exertions of the former, by creating a most powerful diversion in her favor. With this view, preparations had been made for a most extensive and formidable expedition, which should not only relieve Austria from the pressure of the war, by distracting the attention of the enemy, but at the same time accomplish an object highly important to the interests of Great Britain. While the most anxious endeavours were making to hasten the execution of this plan, it was also deemed expedient to commence hostilities in another quarter. With this view, Sir John Stuart, who commanded the British forces in Sicily, undertook an expedition against the south of Italy and the kingdom of Naples. He embarked with 15,000 British, and was soon afterwards joined by a body of Sicilians, under one of the native princes. The better to secure the object of his expedition, he sent a detachment to Lower Calabria, which seized the line of posts that the French had formed opposite Messina. With his main body he proceeded against the islands of Ischia and Procida, and in a short time captured both these islands; but this success only afforded the means for ascertaining that the great object of the expedition was unattainable. Murat had recalled a considerable force which was on its march to co-operate with the French in the north. He had likewise collected a body of national guards, and was further reinforced by the troops which had taken possession of the papal states. In addition to the resistance to be expected from this concentrated force, the apathy of the Neapolitans, to any proposal of deliverance, operated as a serious obstacle. They chose to submit to the tyranny of their usurpers rather than make any effort to restore their legitimate sovereign, from whom they had not been taught to expect any very earnest endeavours for the bettering of their condition. Yet, notwithstanding this disappointment, Sir John Stuart deemed it advisable to retain Ischia, in order to control the operations of the enemy, and to prevent him from sending any assistance to the army in Upper Italy. After some further hostilities, however, during which the castle of Scilla was taken, and for a short time held by the British, the increased force of the French rendered it necessary to evacuate these conquests, and the British troops at length returned to Sicily.

Meanwhile, the preparations that were making on the English coast for a grand expedition, were stimulated and encouraged by the reverses of the French on the Danube, and by the reviving spirit of the German patriots. A force amounting to upwards of 40,000 men, aided by nearly thirty sail of the line, and a full quota of frigates, gun-boats, &c. forming the most numerous and well-appointed armament that ever left the shores of this country, was at length in perfect readiness for sailing, when intelligence arrived announcing the defeat of the Austrians at Wagram, and the armistice between the Emperors of Austria and France. A reverse, so untoward, occasioned serious embarrassment, but the cause was not on that account given up for lost; the impression made by a force so mighty, might give new impulse to the war, and at all events might answer the other purpose for which it was destined, the capture of Antwerp and of the French navy in the Scheldt. The expedition, under the command of the Earl of Chatham, sailed, and landing at Walcheren, after a fortnight's siege took Flushing. It was soon afterwards discovered that the ulterior objects of the enterprise were defeated. The French had by some means or other acquired an early intimation of the point to which this great armament would be directed; and before it left the English coast, had taken measures for the defence of Antwerp, and for the protection of the navy stationed there. Lord Chatham, determining not to sacrifice the lives of his soldiers to the attainment of a fruitless victory, embarked with the greater part of the army and returned home. The troops that remained gave up all their conquests except Walcheren, which the British ministry determined to retain, as a key to the Scheldt, in order to assist the trade between Great Britain and Holland. Here the troops were attacked by an enemy far more formidable than the French army, a pestilential fever incident to the climate. Against this foe a reinforcement of physicians was sent, whose operations, combined with that of the frost, partly checked its ravages. Still the mortality was dreadful, and therefore a greater loss to the nation than could ever be compensated by the retention of so dear-bought a conquest. The army, thinned and weakened by disease, quitted and destroyed the barracks they had built, blew up the fortifications they had repaired, evacuated this ill-fated island, and returned to England.

Bonaparte, in his letter to the Emperor of Russia, stated "that the English ministers were fighting against each other." A duel had indeed taken place between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, which was attended with no serious consequences. The only letters which passed on this unhappy occasion were the following:

St. James's Square, 19th Sept. 1809.

"SIR,

"It is unnecessary for me to enter into any detailed statement of the circumstances which preceded the recent resignations. It is enough for me, with a view to the immediate object of this letter, to state, that it appears a proposition had been agitated, without any communication with me, for my removal from the War-Department; and that you, towards the close of the last session, having urged a decision upon this question, with the alternative of your seceding from the government, procured a positive promise from the Duke of Portland (the execution of which you afterwards considered yourself entitled to enforce), that such removal should be carried into effect. Notwithstanding this promise, by which I consider you pronounced it unfit that I should remain charged with the conduct of the war, and by which my situation as a minister of the crown was made dependent upon your will and pleasure, you continued to sit in the same cabinet with me, and to leave me not only in the persuasion that I possessed your confidence and support as a colleague, but you allowed me, in breach of every principle of good faith, both public and private, though thus virtually superseded, to originate and proceed in the execution of a new enterprise of the most arduous and important nature, with your apparent concurrence, and ostensible approbation.

"You were fully aware that if my situation in the government had been disclosed to me, I could not have submitted to remain one moment in office, without the entire abandonment of my private honor and public duty. You knew I was deceived, and you continued to deceive me.

"I am aware, it may be said, which I am ready to acknowledge, that when you pressed for a decision for my removal, you also pressed for its disclosure, and that it was resisted by the Duke of Portland, and some members of the government supposed to be my friends. But I never can admit, that you have a right to make use of such a plea, in justification of an act affecting my honor, nor that the sentiments of others could justify an acquiescence in such a delusion on your part, who had yourself felt and stated its unfairness. Nor can I admit that the head of any administration, or any supposed friend, (whatever may be their motives) can authorize or sanction any man in such a course of long and persevering deception. For, were I to admit such a principle, my honor and character would be from that moment in the direction of persons wholly unauthorized, and known to you to be unauthorized, to act for me in such a case. It was therefore your act and your conduct which deceived me; and it is impossible for me to acquiesce in being placed in a situation by you, which no man of honor could knowingly submit to, nor patiently suffer himself to be betrayed into, without forfeiting that character.

"I have no right, as a public man, to resent your demanding, upon public grounds, my removal from the particular office I have held, or even from the administration, as a condition of your continuing a member of the government. But I have a distinct right to expect, that a proposition, justifiable in itself, shall not be executed in an unjustifiable manner, and at the expense of my honor and reputation. And I consider that you were bound, at least, to avail yourself of the same alternative, namely, your own resignation, to take yourself out of the predicament of practising such a deceit towards me, which you did exercise in demanding a decision for my removal.

"Under these circumstances, I must require that satisfaction from you to which I feel myself entitled to lay claim.

"I am, &c.

"CASTLEREAGH.

"The Right Hon. George Canning, &c. &c. &c."

Gloucester Lodge, Sept. 20, 1809.

"MY LORD,

"The tone and the purport of your lordship's letter, which I have this moment received; of course preclude any other answer on my part to the misapprehensions and misrepresentations with which it abounds, than that I will cheerfully give to your lordship the satisfaction which you require.

"I am, &c., and GEORGE CANNING.

"Lord Viscount Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c."

The consequence of these dissensions was, that a new administration was formed, at the head of which was placed Marquis Wellesley.

It was hinted in the preceding chapter, that Sir Arthur Wellesley had been raised to the peerage of Great Britain. The London gazette, August 26, stated "that the Right Honorable Sir Arthur Wellesley, Knight of the most honorable order of the Bath, and lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, (and his heirs male lawfully begotten) is raised to the dignity of the peerage, by the names, styles, and titles of Baron Douro of Wellesley, in the county of Somerset, and Viscount Wellington of Talavera, and of Wellington, in the said county.

The Emperor of France now appeared sole uncontrolled lord of the continent; all submitted to his will; and only one consolation appeared to remain, that he himself was under the will of a higher power. The blockade system adopted by Napoleon for the purpose of crippling the British trade, which confirmed his inveterate malignity against the country, having been improved upon by the British cabinet by similar measures, induced M. Champagny, the minister for foreign affairs in France, to transmit the following official letter to General Armstrong, minister of the United States of America, at Paris.

"SIR,

"His majesty understanding that you are about to dispatch a ship to the United States, commands me to make known to you the unalterable principles which have and will regulate his conduct in the great question respecting neutrals.

"France admits the principle, that the flag protects trade. The trading vessel which carries the license of its government may be considered as a moving colony. To insult such a vessel by search, pursuit, or any act of arbitrary power, is a violation of the fundamental law of colonization, and is an attack upon the government of the same. The seas belong to every nation, without exception; they are the common property, and the domain of all mankind.

"Consistently with this doctrine, merchant vessels belonging to individuals may pass by inheritance to persons who never exposed themselves to be made prisoners of war. In all her conquests France has considered sacred private property deposited in the warehouses of the vanquished state, and such have had the complete disposal of matters of trade; and at this moment convoys by land of merchandise, and especially cottons, are passing through the French army and Austria, to proceed to the destination commerce directs. If France had seized the monopoly of the seas, she would have accumulated in her territory all the products of the earth, and she would have obtained unmeasurable wealth.

"Undoubtedly, if England had the dominion of land which she has acquired on the ocean, her acquisitions would have been equally enormous. She would, as in the times of barbarism, have sold the conquered, and distributed them as slaves throughout her land. The avarice of trade would have absorbed every thing, and the government of an enlightened nation, which has brought the arts of civilization to perfection, would have given the earliest instances of the return of the savage ages. That government is fully impressed with the injustice of its naval code. But what has that government to do with justice, which only inquires for profit?

"When France shall have established her naval power, which, with the extent of her coasts and her population, will be soon accomplished, then will the emperor reduce these principles to practice, and apply his mandate to render it universal. The right, or rather usurpation, of blockading rivers and coasts by proclamation is palpably contrary to reason and equity. A right cannot possibly spring from the will of an interested party, but must always be founded on the natural relations of things. A place is not properly blockaded unless it be besieged by land and water. It is blockaded to prevent the introduction of assistance, by which the surrender of the place might be protracted; and then we have only the right to prevent neutral ships from entering the port, when the place is thus circumstanced, and the possession of it is matter of doubt between the besiegers and besieged. On this is grounded the right to prevent neutrals from entering the place.

"The sovereignty and independence of its flag, like the sovereignty and independence of its territory, is the property of every neutral. A state may transfer itself to another state; it may destroy the archives of its independence, and pass from prince to prince; but the right of sovereignty is indivisible and unalienable; no one can renounce it.

"England has placed France in a state of blockade. The emperor has, in his decree of Berlin, declared the British Islands in a state of blockade. The first of these regulations forbid neutral vessels to proceed to France; the second prohibited their entering English harbours.

"England has, by her Orders of Council of the 11th of November, 1807, levied an impost on neutral ships, and obliged them to enter its ports before they sail to France. By the decree of the 17th of December of the same year, the emperor has decreed, that all such ships be denationalized which had entered English ports; or submitted to be searched.

"In order to ward off the inconveniencies with which this state of things threatened her commerce, America laid an embargo in all her harbours; and although France had done nothing more than used the right of retaliation, its wants, and those of its colonies, suffered much from this measure; yet did the emperor magnanimously connive at the proceeding, in order rather to endure the privation of commerce than to acknowledge the authority of the usurpers of the seas.

"The embargo was raised, and a system of non-intercourse was substituted for it. The powers on the continent, in alliance with England, having the same object in view, made a common cause with her, that they might derive the same advantages. The harbours of Holland, of the Elbe, of the Weser, of Italy, and of Spain, were to enjoy those benefits from which France was to be excluded; and the one and the other were to be opened or closed to commerce as circumstances rendered expedient, so as France was bereft of it.

"Thus, Sir, in point of principle, France recognizes the freedom of neutral commerce, and the independence of the maritime powers, which she respected up to the moment when the maritime tyranny of England, that respects nothing, and the arbitrary proceedings of its government, compelled her to adopt measures of retaliation, to which she resorted with regret. Let England revoke her blockade with France, and France will recall her declaration of blockade against England. Let England revoke her Cabinet Orders of the 11th November, 1807, and the Milan Decree will expire of itself. The American commerce will then recover its complete freedom, and be assured of finding in the harbours of France favour and protection. But it belongs to the United States to attain this happy object by their firmness. Can a nation, resolved to remain free, hesitate between certain momentary interests and the great cause of maintaining her independence, her honour, her sovereignty, and her dignity?

"M. CHAMPAGNY."

There was certainly more virulence than truth exercised towards the British government in the above document. It was natural and prudent in that government, when threatened by France by every mode that could argue inveterate rancour, to provide for its own defence and security against the malignant efforts of the common enemy; consequently, the Orders of Council were justified by the reasons which caused their publication, whatever plea of justification France could assert to the contrary.

Bonaparte, not satisfied with secular victories and dominion, aimed at another conquest, and thought it right to attack the apostolic see of Rome. Pius VII. who filled the papal throne, alive to all the feelings of his situation, entered his protest against the encroachments suggested by Bonaparte, in which he declared, that

"The dark designs, conceived by the enemies of the apostolic see have been accomplished.

"After the violent and unjust spoliation of the fairest and most considerable portion of our dominions, we behold ourselves, under unworthy pretexts, and with so much the greater injustice, entirely stripped of our temporal sovereignty, to which our spiritual independence is intimately united. In the midst of this cruel persecution we are comforted by the reflection, that we encounter such a heavy misfortune, not for any offence given to the Emperor of France, which has always been the object of our affectionate paternal solicitude, nor for any intrigue of worldly policy, but for an unwillingness to betray our duties.

"To please men and to displease God is not allowed to any one professing the catholic religion, and much less can it be permitted to its head and promulgator.

"As we, besides, owe it to God and the church, to hand down our rights uninjured and untouched, we protest against this new violent spoliation, and declare it null and void.

"We reject, with the firmest resolution, any allowance which the Emperor of the French may intend to assign us; and to the individuals composing our college.

"We should all cover ourselves with ignominy in the face of the church, if we suffered our subsistence to depend on him who usurps her authority.

"We commit ourselves entirely to providence, and to the affection of the faithful, and we shall be contented piously to terminate the bitter career of our sorrowful days.

"We adore, with profound humility, God's inscrutable decrees; we invoke his commiseration upon our good subjects, who will ever be our joy and our crown; and after having in this hardest of trials done what our duties required of us, we exhort them to preserve always untouched the religion and the faith, and to unite themselves to us, for the purpose of conjuring with sighs and tears, both in the closet and before the altar, the supreme Father of Light, that he may vouchsafe to change the base designs of our persecutors.

"Given at our Apostolic Palace, del Quirinale, this 10th of June, 1809.

"PIUS PAPA VII."

This protest was accompanied by the following excommunication against Napoleon Bonaparte:

"Pius VII. Pontiff.

"By the authority of God Almighty, and of St. Paul and St. Peter, we declare you and all your co-operators in the act of violence which you are executing, to have incurred the same excommunication, which we, in our apostolic letters, contemporaneously affixing in the usual places of this city, declare to have been incurred by all those who, on the violent invasion of this city on the 2d of February last year, were guilty of the acts of violence against which we have protested, as well really in so many declarations, that by our order have been issued by our successive secretaries of state, as also in two consistorial colloquations of the 16th of March, and the 11th of July, 1808, in common with all their agents, abettors, advisers, or whosoever else have been accessory to, or himself been engaged in, the execution of those attempts.

"Given at Rome, Santa Maria Maggiore, June 10th, in the tenth year of our Pontificate.

"PIUS PAPA VII."

On the 3d of October, the prince arch-chancellor, pursuant to instructions from his majesty the emperor, repaired to the senate to officiate at their meeting as president. Having been received with the accustomed ceremonies, and taken his seat, he addressed them as follows:

"Messieurs,—A message from his majesty, which you will hear read, acquaints the senate with fresh proofs of the magnanimous bounty with which his majesty has been pleased to acknowledge important services.

"His illustrious highness, the Prince of Neuchâtel, vice-constable, is created Prince of Wagram. Marshal the Duke of Auerstadt, is created Prince of Ekmul, Marshal the Duke of Rivoli, is created Prince of Eslingon.

"To these hereditary titles are annexed considerable estates, which the emperor has purchased from the legion of honour.

"The appellations given to the new principalities forcibly impress on our remembrance the victories and valour of the titulars, who have co-operated with the genius of his majesty.

"By means of this happy association, the reward which the emperor confers in honour of personal services, becomes, at the same time, a monument of national glory.

"The senate will feel no less satisfaction in receiving this communication, than I experience in making it, in conformity to the orders of his majesty the emperor and king."

Count Semonville, the secretary, then read the emperor's message, which described the various domains respectively attached to the new titles.

THE reduction of Spain was a circumstance of the utmost consequence to Bonaparte, as it furnished no further hindrance to his favourite object of subjugating all the nations of Europe under his control. The humiliation which Austria had experienced, joined to the mortifying consent of Russia and Sweden, exhibited in their late treaty of alliance, favorable to the insidious views of France, were also indicative demonstrations of the powers with which they seemed willing to invest that autocrat, who was so desirous to reduce the whole of Europe under his absolute authority, though nominally under the obedience of the several branches of his family. Thus a confederacy was about to be formed by a family originally obscured, but which the most extraordinary circumstances had raised in an equally surprising manner. Their interest and safety necessarily depending on their chief, they consequently considered themselves only as the ministers of a system suggested and maintained by the vast abilities of their chief, and could only cohere so long as the master-spring and principal movement remained unimpeded. Bonaparte, aware of the strength and necessity of such a principle, spared no efforts to keep it up, by the most munificent rewards to his adherents. Hence that apparent liberality which he exhibited about this period, so contrary to his selfish nature; and hence arose the various kingdoms, principalities, and dukedoms which he thought it convenient to confer.

On the 3d of December, at six o'clock in the morning, a discharge of artillery, at Paris, announced the opening of the legislative body, which was about to take place on that day.

At half-past ten Bonaparte left the Thuilleries to proceed to Notre Dame. He was in the coronation coach with his majesty the King of Westphalia. The King of Naples, the princes, grand dignitaries, ministers, grand officers of the empire and of the crown, preceded him. He was received by the clergy at the entrance of the church, and conducted to the choir, under a canopy. The tribunals of the choir were occupied by his consort Josephine, the imperial family, the Kings of Wirtemberg and Saxony, and the Queen of Westphalia. One of the almoners said the mass. His eminence Cardinal Fesch, Grand Almoner, celebrated Te Deum. Bonaparte, reconducted under the canopy, as on his entrance to the church, proceeded to the palace of the legislative body. Being seated, the members of the legislative body newly elected took the oaths; after which the emperor made the following speech:—

"Gentlemen deputies of departments to the Legislative Body—Since your last session I have reduced Arragon and Castile to submission, and driven from Madrid the fallacious government formed by England. I was marching upon Cadiz and Lisbon, when I was under the necessity of treading back my steps, and of planting my eagles on the ramparts of Vienna. Three months have seen the rise and termination of this fourth Punic war. Accustomed to the devotedness and courage of my armies, I must, nevertheless, under these circumstances, acknowledge the particular proofs of affection which my soldiers of Germany have given me.

"The genius of France conducted the English army—it has terminated its projects in the pestilential marshes of Walcheren. In that important period I remained 400 leagues distant, certain of the new glory which my people would acquire, and of the grand character they would display. My hopes have not been deceived—I owe par-tiular thanks to the citizens of the departments of the Pas de Calais and the North. Frenchmen! Every one that shall oppose you shall be conquered and reduced to submission. Your grandeur shall be increased by the hatred of your enemies. You have before you long years of glory and prosperity. You have the force and energy of the Hercules of the ancients. I have united Tuscany to the empire. The Tuscans were worthy of it by the mildness of their character, by the attachment their ancestors have always shewn us, and by the services they have rendered to European civilization.

"History pointed out to me the conduct I ought to pursue towards Rome: the popes, become sovereigns of part of Italy, have constantly shewn themselves enemies of every preponderating power in the peninsula—they have employed their spiritual power to injure it.—It was then demonstrated to me that the spiritual influence exercised in my states by a foreign sovereign, was contrary to the independence of France, to the dignity and safety of my throne. However, as I acknowledge the necessity of the spiritual influence of the descendants of the first of the pastors, I could not conciliate these grand interests, but by annulling the denative of the French emperors, my predecessors, and by uniting the Roman states to France.

"By the treaty of Vienna, all the kings and sovereigns my allies, who have given me so many proofs of the constancy of their friendship, have acquired and shall acquire a fresh increase of territory.

"The Illyrian provinces stretch the frontiers of my great empire to the Save. Contiguous to the empire of Constantinople, I shall find myself in a situation to watch over the first interests of my commerce in the Mediterranean, the Adriatic, and the Levant. I will protect the Porte, if the Porte withdraw herself from the fatal influence of England. I shall know how to punish her, if she suffer herself to be governed by cunning and perfidious counsels.

"I have wished to give the Swiss nation a new proof of my esteem, by annexing to my titles that of their mediator, and thus putting an end to all the uneasiness endeavoured to be spread among that brave people.

"Holland, placed between England and France, is equally bruised by them. Yet she is the debouche of the principal arteries of my empire.—Changes will become necessary; the safety of my frontiers, and the well-understood interests of the two countries imperiously require them.

"Sweden has lost, by her alliance with England, after a disastrous war, the finest and most important of her provinces. Happy would it have been for that nation, if the wise prince that governs her now had ascended the throne some years sooner! This example proves anew to kings that the alliance of England is the surest BOOK IX.

presage of ruin.

"My ally and friend, the Emperor of Russia, has united to his vast empire, Finland, Moldavia, Wallachia, and a district of Gallicia.—I am not jealous of any thing that can produce good to that empire. My sentiments for its illustrious sovereign are in unison with my policy.

"When I shall shew myself beyond the Pyrenees, the frightened leopard will fly to the ocean, to avoid shame, defeat, and death. The triumph of my arms will be the triumph of the genius of good over that of evil, of moderation, order, and morality over civil war, anarchy, and the bad passions. My friendship and protection will, I hope, restore tranquillity and happiness to the people of Spain.

"Gentlemen deputies of departments to the legislative body—I have directed my minister of the interior to lay before you the history of the legislation, of the administration, and of the finances of the year just expired; you will see that all the ideas I had conceived for the amelioration of my people, have been followed by the greatest activity—that in Paris, as in the most distant parts of my empire, the war has not produced any delay in the public works. The members of my council in state will submit to you different projects of law, and especially the law upon the finances; you will see in it their prosperous condition. I demand of my people no new sacrifice, though circumstances have obliged me to double my military means."

The design which Bonaparte was supposed to have long entertained of dissolving his marriage with Josephine, he at length avowed.—The happiness of France, involved in the tranquil transmission of the sovereignty to a scion from the stock of Bonaparte, was assigned as the motive for this extraordinary proceeding. Thus the governor of a nation still assuming the name of Christians, repudiated his wife with as much indifference as he would put off his robes, and without paying even the common homage of seeking a seeming concurrence from his church.—A sacrament of his religion was about to be annulled by a mere ordinance of the French state! Before the face of a whole people; and to the astonishment of the world, the French emperor, in contempt of the first ordinances of the religion he seemed to profess, took upon himself to promote a release from an obligation which he had solemnly contracted upon the altar! A divorce from his wife, against whom no neglect of duty, no want of affection, nor any other cause could reasonably be adduced.

The projet of a decree on this subject was submitted to the senate, December 16, and the following were the legislative proceedings on the occasion:

"By desire of his majesty the emperor, all the members of the senate assembled at eleven o'clock in the morning, in full dress, in the hall of their usual sittings. The sitting of the senate at which the Kings of Westphalia and Naples, Grand Admiral the Prince Vice-Roy of Italy, the Arch-Chancellor of State, the Prince Vice-Grand-Constable, and the Prince Vice-Grand-Elector, assisted, and at which the Prince Arch-Chancellor of the Empire presided, formed, on account of the importance of the subjects which were discussed, an epoch in the annals of France. On that day was presented to the senator a projet of a Senatus Consultum, respecting a dissolution of the marriage between the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Josephine. This dissolution of marriage, required by the two high parties, and approved of by a family council, at which all the princes and princesses of the imperial family, at present in Paris, assisted, received the same day the assent of the senate, after having been the object of examination of a special commission, named for this purpose. After having read the contents of the imperial decree, which enacted the convocation of the senate, and of that which directed that it should be presided by the prince arch-chancellor, and that the princes of the imperial family, hereafter named, should be present in the senate, the official journal gave an account of this memorable sitting in the following terms:— [Here followed a speech from the arch-chancellor of state, the prince arch-chancellor of the empire, president, and Duke of Parma.]

"The Count Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely laid before the senate the projet of the Senatus Consultum, and explained the motives of it, which were, that they mutually sacrifice their conjugal happiness to the welfare and interests of their country." [Here followed a speech from the Prince Vice-Roy of Italy; after which the Count Garnier, annual president, proposed to refer the projet of the Senatus Consultum to the examination of a special commission of nine members, which was named, and made its report during the sitting.]

"At half past four the senate resumed its sitting; and Count Lacépède, one of the members of the special commission, made the report, which terminated in proposing the adoption of the projet of the Senatus Consultum, and also the adoption of two addresses, one to the emperor and the other to the empress.

Extract from the Register of the Conservative Senate, of Saturday the 16th December, 1809.

"The conservative senate, assembled to the number of members prescribed by article 90th of the act of the constitution, and dated the 13th December, 1799, having seen the act drawn up, the 15th of the present month, by the prince arch-chancellor of the empire, of which the following is the substance:—

"In the year 1809, and the 15th day of December, at nine o'clock in the evening, we, Jean Jacques Regis Cambaceres, Prince Arch-Chancellor of the Empire, Duke of Parma, exercising the functions prescribed to us by title the 2d of the 14th article of the statute of the imperial family, and in consequence of orders addressed to us by his majesty the emperor and king, in his private letter, dated that day, of the following tenor:—

"My cousin, our desire is, that you repair this day, at nine o'clock in the evening, to our grand cabinet of the palace of the Thuilleries, attended by the civil secretary of state of our imperial family, to receive from us, and from the empress our dear consort, a communication of great importance; for this purpose we have ordered that this present private letter should be sent you.

—We pray God to have you, my cousin, in his holy blessed keeping.

"Paris, December 15, 1809."

On the back was written, "To our cousin, the Prince Arch-Chancellor, Duke of Parma."

"We accordingly proceeded to the hall of the throne of the Palace of the Thuilleries, attended by Michel-Louis-Etienne Regnault (de St. Jean d'Angely,) count of the empire, minister of state, and secretary of state to the imperial family. A quarter of an hour afterwards we were introduced to the grand cabinet of the emperor, where we found his majesty the emperor and king, with her majesty the empress, attended by their majesties the Kings of Holland, Westphalia, and Naples, his imperial highness the prince vice-roy; the Queens of Holland, Westphalia, Naples, and Spain; madame, and her imperial highness the princess Pauline. His majesty the emperor and king condescended to address us in these terms:—

"My cousin, prince arch-chancellor, I dispatched to you a private letter, dated this day, to direct you to repair to my cabinet, for the purpose of communicating to you the resolution which I and the empress, my dearest consort, have taken. It gives me pleasure that the kings, queens, and princesses, my brothers and sisters, my brothers and sisters-in-law, my daughter-in-law, and my son-in-law, become my adopted son, as well as my mother, should witness what I am going to communicate to you.

"The politics of my monarchy, the interest and the wants of my people, which have constantly guided all my actions, require that after me, I should leave to children, inheritors of my love for my people, that throne on which providence has placed me. Notwithstanding, for several years past, I have lost the hope of having children by my marriage with my well-beloved consort the Empress Josephine. This it is which induce me to sacrifice the sweetest affections of my heart, to attend to nothing but the good of the state, and to wish the dissolution of my marriage. Arrived at the age of forty years, I may indulge the hope of living long enough to educate, in my views and sentiments, the children which it may please providence to give me: God knows how much such a resolution has cost my heart; but there is no sacrifice beyond my courage, that I will not make, when it is proved to me to be necessary to the welfare of France. I should add, that far from ever having had reason to complain, on the contrary, I have had only to be satisfied with the attachment and the affection of my well-beloved consort. She has adorned fifteen years of my life, the remembrance of which will ever remain engraven on my heart. She was crowned by my hand. I wish she should preserve the rank and title of empress, but, above all, that she should never doubt my sentiments, and that she should ever regard me as her best and dearest friend."

"His majesty the emperor and king having ended, her majesty the empress and queen spoke as follows:

"By the permission of our dear and august consort, I ought to declare, that not preserving any hope of having children, which may fulfil the wants of his policy and the interests of France, I am pleased to give him the greatest proof of attachment and devotion which has ever been given on earth. I possess all from his bounty; it was his hand which crowned me; and from the height of his throne I have received nothing but proofs of affection and love from the French people.

"I think I prove myself grateful in consenting to the dissolution of a marriage, which heretofore was an obstacle to the welfare of France, which deprived it of the happiness of being one day governed by the descendants of a great man, evidently raised up by providence to efface the evils of a terrible revolution, and to re-establish the altar, the throne, and social order. But the dissolution of my marriage will, in no degree, change the sentiments of my heart. The emperor will ever have in me his best friend. I know how much this act, demanded by policy and by interests so great, has chilled his heart; but both of us exult in the sacrifice which we make for the good of the country."

"After which their imperial majesties having demanded an act of their respective declarations as well as of the mutual consent contained in them, and which their majesties gave to the dissolution of their marriage, as also of the power which their majesties conferred on us to follow up as need shall require the effect of their will, we, Prince Arch-Chancellor of the Empire, in obedience to the orders and requisitions of their majesties, have given the aforesaid act, and have in consequence executed the present proces verbal, to serve and avail according to law, to which proces verbal their majesties have affixed their signatures; and which, after having been signed by the kings, queens, princes, and princesses present has been signed by us, and countersigned by the secretary of the imperial family.

"Done at the Palace of the 'Tuilleries,' the day, hour, and the year aforesaid.

"Having seen the projet of the Senatus Consultum, drawn up in the form prescribed by the fifty-seventh article of the act of the constitution of the 4th August, 1802; after having heard the motives of the said projet, the orators of the council of state, and the report of the special commission, appointed in the sitting of this day; the adoption having been discussed by the number of members prescribed by the fifty-sixth article of the act of the constitution of the 4th August, 1802, decree,

"Art. I. The marriage contracted between the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Josephine is dissolved.

"II. The Empress Josephine shall preserve the title and rank of Empress Queen crowned.

"III. Her dowry is fixed at an annual income of two millions of francs, on the revenue of the state.

"IV. All the assignments which may be made by the emperor in favor of the Empress Josephine on the funds of the civil list, shall be obligatory on his successors.

"V. The present Senatus Consultum shall be transmitted by a message to his imperial and royal majesty."

The two addresses proposed by the commission were afterwards put to the vote, and adopted.

The arch-chancellor, in consequence of the authority received from the emperor and empress, presented a petition to the diocesan court of the officiality of Paris. The court, after examining witnesses, and going through the usual forms of proceeding, pronounced a sentence of nullity as to their marriage, so far as regarded the spiritual bond of union, and on the 12th of January, 1810, the said sentence was confirmed by the Metropolitan officiality.

At this time Bonaparte received addresses from some of his dependent establishments, to which he returned answers in his usual style of selfish ostentation. One of them contained the following expressions:—"Myself and my ally, the Emperor of Russia, have made every effort to give peace to the world, but without success." Another: "I desire that such of your fellow-citizens, as have their children in foreign-service, should recal them." In another answer he uttered one of his accustomed vulgar and vindictive philippics against the King of England, whom he falsely accused of being the cause of the prolongation of the war, and boasted that the longer the contest was continued, the more would his means increase of distressing England, whom he described as being in the last stage of existence.

The kingdom of Holland was now pitched upon as necessary to be added to the French empire; for the Exposé expressly said, "Holland is, in fact, only a part of France. A definition of that country may be given, by saying, that it is a continuation of the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt—that is to say, of the great arteries of the French empire."

The consequence of Bonaparte's divorce was, as might naturally be expected, a second marriage. On the meeting of the senate, Feb. 27, the prince arch-chancellor, who presided on the occasion, read the following message from the emperor: "Senators, we have dispatched to Vienna, as our ambassador extraordinary, our cousin, the Prince of Neufchatel, to solicit the hand of the Arch-duchess Maria-Louisa, daughter of the Emperor of Austria. We have given orders to our minister for foreign relations to lay before you the articles of the treaty of marriage between us and the Arch-duchess Maria-Louisa, which has been concluded, signed, and ratified. We have been desirous of eminently contributing to the happiness of the present generation. The enemies of the continent have founded their prosperity upon its dissensions and divisions. They can no longer nourish war, by imputing to us projects incompatible with the ties and duties of affinity, which we have just contracted with the imperial house reigning in Austria. The brilliant qualities which distinguish the Arch-duchess Maria-Louisa have acquired her the love of the people of Austria. They have fixed our regards. Our people will love this princess from their love for us, until, being witnesses of all the virtues which have given her so a high a place in our thoughts, they shall love her for herself.—Given at our palace of the Tuilleries, the 27th of February, 1810.

Signed

"NAPOLEON."

After the message was read, the Duke de Cadore communicated to the senate the articles of the marriage treaty, which were in the usual form. The articles were, with regard to portion, dowry, and jewels, in all respects the same as those in the marriage treaties, in preceding reigns, between the kings and dauphins of France and the princesses of Austria. The value of the jewels, and the nuptial ornaments which Napoleon had destined for his bride, was estimated at eighteen millions of francs.

The marriage was celebrated at Vienna on the 11th of March, at six o'clock in the evening, and the empress set off on the 13th on her way to Paris, where the ceremony took place on the 1st of April. The train of the Empress Louisa was supported by four queens, and after the marriage the royal pair set off for St. Cloud. Three days after they received the congratulations of the senate. Bonaparte's answer was short and general; and the empress, contrary to the practice of her predecessors, made no reply.

By this marriage, the Emperor Napoleon became related to almost all the royal families of Europe. Besides being son-in-law to the Emperor of Austria, and nephew to the Archduke Charles, he became great nephew to the Queen of Naples (before Joachim Murat was king,) first cousin to Ferdinand VII. of Spain, and to the Prince-regent of Portugal; he was also nephew to the daughter of Louis XVI. the Duchess of Angouleme.

By a decree of the senate, which adopted a senatus consultum at Paris, Rome was united to the French empire.

By a decree dated at Fontainebleau, October 19, all prohibited articles of English manufacture at that time in France, or that might after that period be brought into it, were ordered to be burned. A similar order was applied to Holland, the duchy of Berg, the Hans Towns and all the country between the Maine and the sea. By this decree, all British merchandize introduced into the kingdoms of Italy or Naples, the Illyrian provinces, the parts of Spain occupied by the French, and generally in all the places within the reach of the French troops, was to be burned also. It likewise ordered that those who introduced them should be branded on the forehead, and imprisoned from three to ten years.

By a decree of the 12th of November, Napoleon united to the French empire the territory of the Valais, under the name of the department of Simplon. The pretexts to this annexation were, that the Simplon, connecting France and Italy, had cost both treasuries eighteen millions of livres; that the Valais had not adhered to its engagements, and that it was necessary to put an end to the struggles for power among the population.

A convention was concluded between France and Austria; by the articles of which, the sequestrations upon the property of the partizans of either in the Austrian territories, or in those of the Rhenish confederation, were done away, in order, as the preamble stated, to efface all traces of the late war in Germany. In conformity with this arrangement, all the Austrian nobles, having possessions in the states of the Rhenish confederation, were requested to declare, within the first days of the year 1811, whether they would choose to remain in the service of the court of Vienna, or return to their possessions within the limits of the confederation. In the first case they were required to sell such estates within the space of five years, or transfer them to some branch of their family who would be resident.

The Austrian monarchy, by the loss of the quicksilver mines of Istria, in consequence of the late war, and the lead mines of Bleyberg, the customs at Trieste, the salt works at Hallein, Saltzburgh, and Wicheza in Gallicia, with the customs of the ceded countries, sustained an annual deficiency in her revenues of forty millions of francs. It may likewise be added, that the sum total of the war contributions paid by Austria to France, amounted to eighty-five millions of francs, of which thirty millions were paid in cash, and the rest in bills of exchange, at five millions per month; the last payment of which was to take place in October, 1810.

The annexation of the Hanoverian territory to the kingdom of Westphalia, was definitively settled. A proclamation issued by King Jerome to his new subjects, was dated from Cassel, the 1st of March; and after stating that Napoleon had, by a convention concluded at Paris on the 14th of January, resigned all his rights and claims on that country to him, he congratulated the Hanoverians on being relieved from the painful state of uncertainty in which they had hitherto lingered, adverted to their present misery and wretchedness, engaged to protect them against all attacks of continental powers, and to secure them from the insults incident to a maritime war; and concluded with expressing a hope, that they would render themselves worthy of the brilliant prospect which this union opens to their view. The deputies of Hanover took the oath of allegiance to their new sovereign, on the part of the people, at Cassel, on the 14th of March. Hanover, by this determination, was divided into three departments, viz. those of the Aller, of the Ilmenau, and of the mouths of the Elbe and Weser.

CHAPTER II.

Disposition and Number of the combined British and Portuguese Army, and of the French.—Narrow Escape of King Joseph.—State of Seville.—Expedition under Captain Mends.—Events at Santona.—Siege of Ciudad Rodrigo.—Its Surrender to the French.—The Enemy take Sanabria and Almeida.—Expedition from Cadiz under Captain George Cockburne, of the Implacable.—Battle of Busaco.

DURING the early part of the year 1810, the combined British and Portuguese army continued stationary. A division, under the command of Major-general Hill, occupied the line to the south of the Tagus, while the main army, extended from the right bank of that river to the Douro. Portuguese militia chiefly garrisoned the fortress of Almeida, under Major-general Cox, a British officer; the light troops were under Major-general Craufurd, in front of that fortress, and patroled as far as Ciudad Rodrigo, in Spain. The French, composed of three corps, under Ney, Junot, and Regnier, commanded by Marshal Massena, were collected at Salamanca, and on the Portuguese frontiers, to the number (it was said) of 80,000 men. The combined army did not exceed 60,000, besides the Portuguese militia, the greater part of which were in the northern provinces with General Francisco de Silveira, and at Oporto and Coimbra with Colonels Trant and Millar.

On the 7th of July, a party of 400 cavalry made an attempt to surprise King Joseph at his country-seat near Madrid, whither he occasionally resorted to visit a chere amie. They killed the guard which was constantly kept there, but did not meet with their object, the usurper having gone that night to the play at the Coliseo del Principe. Informed of this, they pursued their course to the palace, where they cut down the guards at the gate. They did the same to those whom they found guarding the theatre. This occasioned an immediate uproar, and from the great confusion that took place in the interior, they were prevented from passing to the box where King Joseph was seated, which gave him an op-

BOOK IX. opportunity of escaping by a private door to the main guard, who defended him for a short time till he got off. The generale was then beaten, but before any considerable force was collected from their quarters, the enterprising Spaniards were safe out of Madrid.

Seville was at this time in the most deplorable condition, owing to the incessantly renewed demands of the French, the rudeness of their troops, and the tyranny of their general (Soult). In Valentia the greatest energy prevailed, and Arragon also became aroused to fresh exertions.

After a consultation with the junta of Asturias, June 24, Captain Mends consented to receive on board of the squadron placed under his command by Lord Gambier, the Spanish brigadier-general Porlier and 500 of his soldiers, with the intention of beating-up the enemy's quarters along the coast of Cantabria and Biscay, in order to make a diversion of his troops towards the sea-ports in his possession, and thus afford an opportunity for a combined movement of the Spanish armies in Asturias, by compelling the enemy to detach more of his forces to oppose them, and thereby weaken the interior of that province and St. Andero, or to suffer his sea-defences to be destroyed, and his supplies coastways cut off; the one or other alternative appearing an inevitable result of such movements.

Captain Mends completely succeeded in the maritime part of the expedition without the loss of a single man, having destroyed all the batteries (with the exception of Castro) from St. Sebastian to St. Andero, on which were found about 100 pieces of heavy cannon altogether; and laid that whole extent of sea-coast entirely bare of defence.

Communications were then opened with these provinces, and the strong port of Santona and the numerous batteries round Bermeo being dismantled, two good anchorages were obtained for British vessels. The brigade of seamen and marines from the squadron were commanded by the Hon. Captain Aylmer, of the Narcissus, who, in his letter to Captain Mends, dated July 9, thus relates the events which took place on their landing at Santona.

SIR,—Herein I beg leave to detail the proceedings of the battalion of seamen and royal marines which you did me the honor to place under my command, acting in conjunction with, and under the orders of, Brigadier-general Porlier.

“On the morning of the 5th instant we landed with the Spanish force on the beach to the westward of Santona, and immediately went forward to the town, which we entered without any loss, the French retiring across the river; our advanced guard, under Lieut. Desbrisay, of the marines of the Amazon, with the Spanish tirailleurs, succeeded in stopping a part of the rear-guard of the French, after killing two, and wounding a few more, and taking some prisoners; in the course of the day, Brigadier-general Porlier sent off some of his men on the road to St. Andero, and Lieutenant Pearson, of the Arethusa, was detached with a party of seamen to destroy the guns in the forts, which was completely effected.

“The sixth was employed in examining the place, in case of being attacked by the French, whom we had reason to expect would advance in force from St. Andero.

“On the morning of the 7th, we placed the boats' carronades on a hill which commanded the isthmus leading to the town, and posted the men along the hedges and vineyards in front of the position, the Spaniards on the right on a sand-hill, and the English, with the Spanish tirailleurs, in the centre and left. At about eleven o'clock, A. M. a firing was heard, and our advanced parties retired, closely followed by the French. The marines composing our out-post, under Lieut. Fennel, of the Arethusa, retired in the most perfect order. Very shortly the enemy was observed advancing rapidly in three columns, one making for the right, the other for the left, keeping the third in reserve; their principal object appeared the right, where the Spaniards were posted; but they were almost immediately checked by the steadiness of the reception they there met with; and a few shot being fired from the battery, the other column on our left scarcely advanced, but fired at a distance; finding, probably, our preparations made with more strength than they imagined, they faced about and retired, leaving several killed and wounded. The enemy's force appeared to consist of between seven and eight hundred men; and I have only to regret that they did not advance nearer, for had they done so, I am convinced a most complete and entire destruction of their whole force would have taken place. Brigadier-general Porlier detached his sharp-shooters to harass their rear; they succeeded in killing and wounding several, and making some prisoners; on the whole, I conceive the loss of the French in the three several days, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, amounts to about one hundred and fifty men.—The whole of the guns, &c. in Santona and Laredo are destroyed, consisting of twenty-two twenty-four pounders and four thirteen-inch brass mortars.

“On the 8th in the morning, according to your directions, I withdrew the guns and ammunition, &c. and re-embarked with the people, without any loss; the Spaniards only having seven men wounded.

“I have now to acknowledge the obligation I am under to Captain Bowles, of the Medusa, for his indefatigable activity in getting every thing arranged, and having the men in such perfect order when the enemy advanced, as well as to express the great satisfaction I felt at the steadiness and firmness with which the men awaited the attack. Lieutenant Rees, of the Dryad, who did the duty of adjutant to the battalion, has also my sincere thanks for the assistance he gave me in the different directions, and for his unremitted attention to the order of the whole. The only officers who had the least opportunity to distinguish themselves, were; Lieutenants Desbrisay and Fennel, of the marines, who commanded the advanced-guards during the two little affairs.

"I am, &c. F. W. AYLMER."

The campaign of this year had begun with the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo. The enemy took up their ground before this place on the 26th of April; they invested it completely June 11, and on the 24th opened their fire upon it. There was a large practicable breach in the place, and the enemy had made preparations for a storm; when Marshal Ney having offered terms of capitulation, the garrison surrendered. This place had made a most obstinate defence during a terrific and destructive fire of sixteen days. Marshal Massena (Prince of Essling) in his report said, "it is impossible to form an idea of the state to which Ciudad Rodrigo is reduced. Every thing is battered down and ruined, not so much as a single house standing entire." Upwards of 2,000 men were killed, including the troops and inhabitants. The garrison, consisting of 7,000 men, laid down their arms in the arsenal, on the entrance of the French troops. At this place the French took six stand of colours, 125 excellent pieces of artillery, the greater part of them brass, 200,000 pounds of powder, 120,000 cartridges, and a considerable quantity of shot and artillery stores.

On the 29th of July, the French general, Count Serras, attacked the fort of Senabria, which was defended by 3,000 Spaniards. This post was important, as the French account stated, because it commanded the entrance into Portugal, and shut up the communications with Galicia. After a slight resistance the Spanish general abandoned the town, and the French found therein twenty pieces of artillery, and provisions for 3,000 men for six months.

The Portuguese general, Silveira, had, on the 23d, obtained some advantages over a body of the enemy, which had advanced into the neighbourhood of Outeira.

A treaty of alliance and friendship between his Britannic majesty and the Prince Regent of Portugal having been made public, the French commander-in-chief issued the following proclamation:

"Portuguese,—The armies of Napoleon the Great are on your frontiers, and we are on the point of entering your country as friends, not as conquerors. They do not come to make war upon you, but to fight those who have induced you to take up arms. Portuguese, awake to your true interests. What has England done for you, that you endure her troops in your native soil? She has destroyed your manufactures, ruined your commerce, paralyzed your industry, for the sole purpose of sending into your country articles of her own manufacture, and making you her tributaries. What does she do at present, that you should embrace the unjust cause which has roused the whole of the continent against her? She deceives you respecting the issue of a campaign in which she seems determined to incur no risk. She puts your battalions in advance, as if your blood was to reckon for nothing. She is prepared to abandon you when it will suit her interest, however disastrous the consequences may be to you; and to complete your misfortunes and her insatiable ambition, she sends her ships into your ports to transport to her colonies such of you as may escape from the dangers to which she has exposed you on the continent. Does not the conduct of her army before Ciudad Rodrigo sufficiently explain to you what you are to expect from such allies? Did they not encourage the garrison and the unfortunate inhabitants of that fortress, by deceitful promises, and did they discharge a single musket to assist them? Again; lately have they placed any of their troops in Almeida, except a commander who is put there to invite you to as ill-judged a resistance as that of Ciudad Rodrigo? What! is it not an insult to place one Englishman thus in the scale against 6,000 of your countrymen? Portuguese, be no longer deceived. The powerful sovereign whose laws, strength, and genius, receive the grateful praises of so many nations, wishes to establish your prosperity. Put yourselves under his protection. Receive his troops like friends, and you will find security both for your persons and property. You are not ignorant of the miseries of war; you know that they extend to every thing that is most dear to you, your children, relatives, friends, property, private and political lives. Come to a determination then, that will secure to you all the advantages of peace. Remain quiet in your habitations, attend to your domestic affairs; and consider those only as your enemies who excite you to a war, by every event of which your country must suffer.

"The Marshal Prince of Essling, commander-in-chief of the army in Portugal,

"Ciudad Rodrigo, Aug. 1. MASSENA."

Massena afterwards issued another address to the Portuguese nation, dated from Ciudad Rodrigo, in which he estimated the French force employed for the invasion of Portugal at 110,000 men. The address was drawn up with little art, and some passages were replete with falsehoods. He said:—"Against you his majesty the emperor has no animosity; on the contrary, it is his highest wish to promote your happiness; and the first step to secure it is to dismiss from the country those locusts who consume your property, blast your harvests, and palsy your efforts. Believe me, in opposing the emperor, you oppose your true friend; a friend who has it in his power to render you the happiest people in the world. Were it not for the insidious councils of England, you might now have enjoyed peace and tranquillity, and have been put in possession of that happiness." Again:—"The King of England is actuated by selfish and narrow purposes; the Emperor of the French is governed by the principles of universal philanthropy." In the following, the mask was thrown off; and the sanguinary path which the ferocious monster whom he served would pursue to attain universal dominion was clearly shewn:—"Snatch the moment that mercy and generosity offer. As friends you may respect us, and be respected in return; as foes you must dread us, and in the conflict must be subdued. The choice is your own, either to meet the horrors of a bloody war, and to see your country desolated, your villages in flames, and your cities plundered, or to accept an honorable and happy peace, which will obtain for you every blessing that by resistance you would resign for ever."

On the 15th of August, Massena caused the trenches to be opened before Almeida, when a false attack, directed against the north of the town, had drawn the attention of the besieged to that quarter. After a most obstinate defence, which continued till the 26th, the governor sent some officers to request a cessation of hostilities. Marshal Massena made known to them the terms of capitulation which he intended to offer, and several hours were employed in negotiation; but as this did not answer the expectations of the French general, he ordered the fire to recommence at eight in the evening, and three hours after the governor signed a capitulation, by which the garrison surrendered prisoners of war, and the Portuguese militia deposited their arms, and were permitted to return home. The French found on the batteries ninety-eight pieces of cannon, and seventeen requiring repair, 3,000 rations of biscuit, 100,000 rations of salt meat, and a great quantity of other provisions.

The following dispatch, relative to the fall of Almeida, was addressed to the Earl of Liverpool by Lord Wellington.

"My Lord.—I inclose a letter from Colonel

Cox, late Governor of Almeida, to Marshal Beresford, containing a copy of the capitulation of Almeida, and an account of the circumstances which occasioned the early surrender of that place. It was impossible to expect that Colonel Cox should continue the defence of the place, after the unfortunate occurrence which he mentions; and I am happy to add, that all the accounts which I have received from officers and soldiers of the militia, who have come into the interior under the capitulation, concur in applauding the conduct of the governor throughout the siege, and in the unfortunate situation in which he was placed towards its close. It is certain that, till the explosion of the magazine of the place, the garrison had sustained but little loss, and were in the highest spirits; and, encouraged by the example of the governor, and the confidence they had in him, were determined to hold out till the last moment.—I have the honor to inclose the copy of a letter, which I received from Marshal Beresford, in which he inclosed the letter from Colonel Cox; to which I have to add, that the two officers mentioned in that letter, the Tenente del Rey, and the major of the artillery, have entered the service of France, and that the latter has been promoted to the rank of colonel. I am also informed, that when sent out by the governor into the enemy's lines to negotiate the capitulation, and after he had informed the enemy of the unfortunate situation of the garrison, he did not return to the place when hostilities recommenced, but continued in the enemy's lines.

"WELLINGTON."

Extract of a letter from Marshal Beresford to Viscount Wellington, dated Moimenta da Serra, Sept. 4.

"I have the honor to transmit to your lordship a copy of a letter I have received from Colonel Cox, late governor of Almeida, and a copy of the capitulation of that place. With whatever regret it was we witnessed the unexpected fall of that place, uninformed as we then were of the cause, I think the circumstance related in the governor's letter of the unfortunate loss of his entire ammunition, and the injury sustained by the town and works, and loss to the garrison by the effects of the explosion, will prove sufficiently the impracticability of a protracted defence; and I regret to say, the conduct of the Lieutenant-governor (Tenente Rey), Francisco Bernardo da Costa e Almeida, and of the major commanding the artillery, Fortunato Joye Barreros, increased the difficulties occasioned by the explosion. The former had, until the commencement of the enemy's fire, acted with much zeal and propriety; but, on that commencing, shut himself up in bomb-proofs; and after the explosion, from personal fear, and to avoid any further firing, took advantage of the consternation and confusion which must be ever attendant in such a case, to counteract the governor's attempt to hold out at least some short time longer. The major of artillery, it appears, had acted well during the siege, but after the explosion appears to have added treachery to cowardice, and, to gain favor with the enemy, communicated to him the real state of the garrison, and that it had no ammunition whatever left; which caused Marshal Massena to refuse the terms demanded by the governor. Until the unfortunate accident of the explosion of the magazine, the garrison appears to have been in the highest spirits, and in the best possible disposition and resolution to defend the town, and which, they unanimously state, their governor's conduct inspired them with, as every officer and man gives the highest applause to his unremitting zeal and activity, encouraging all by his own example. Your lordship will see, that it was of very little consequence what capitulation the garrison had got; as it is obvious the enemy would not have observed it, where it was his interest to break it, and which will be witnessed by his having detained by force, and contrary to the terms of the capitulation, seven officers and 200 men from each of the three regiments of militia that were in the garrison, and this with the object of forming them into a pioneer corps. The officers and soldiers of the militia regiments, to a man, continued to refuse to enter voluntarily into the service of the enemy, and the seven officers and 200 men of each regiment were detained forcibly. Such are the circumstances which have come to my knowledge of the conduct of the garrison of Almeida, and which I think it necessary to communicate to your lordship."

Aldea del Obispo, Aug. 30.

"Sir,—The painful task has fallen to my lot, of acquainting your excellency, that I was reduced to the necessity of surrendering the fortress of Almeida, which I had the honor to command, on the 27th inst. at ten o'clock at night, in consequence of the unfortunate explosion of the great magazine of powder in the castle, and the small magazines contiguous to it; by which dreadful accident I was deprived of the whole of my artillery and musket-ammunition, with the exception of a few made-up cartridges which remained in some of the expence magazines on the ramparts, and thirty-nine barrels of powder which were deposited in the laboratory. Upwards of half of the detachment of artillery, and a great number of infantry soldiers, besides several of the inhabitants, were destroyed by the effect of this terrible explosion. Many of the guns were dismounted upon the ramparts, the works were materially injured, and a general dismay spread amongst the troops and inhabitants of the place. —In this distressing situation, I received a letter from the commander-in-chief of the French army of Portugal, proposing to me that I should surrender the place to the French army under his command upon honorable terms, which, he said, he was ready to grant: I answered, that I wished to know the terms which he proposed; upon which the articles were transmitted to me, and which, after using every effort in my power to obtain more favorable terms, I accepted, with an exception in favor of the militia regiments. I hope my conduct on this trying occasion will meet your excellency's approbation, and that I shall remain justified by the circumstances in the eyes of my country. The Prince of Essling has been good enough to allow me to return to England on my parole, accompanied by Major Hewit and Captain Foley, of the 24th regiment; and we are now on our way to France, to embark from thence for a British port. "W. Cox."

Captain George Cockburne, of the Implacable, undertook an expedition from Cadiz bay, to the town of Moguer, in order to attack a strong corps of French troops posted there. The success of this expedition is thus related in the captain's letter to Rear-admiral Sir R. G. Keats.

"H. M. sloop Jasper, in Huelva River.

"Sir,—I have the honor to inform you that, in pursuance of your orders, I sailed from Cadiz on the night of the 22d current, with the vessels and boats you were pleased to place under my command, for the purpose of co-operating with the Spanish armament under the orders of General Lascy. On the night of the 23d, being about four leagues to the southward of the entrance of this river, I received intimation from the general, that he wished to land without farther loss of time on the coast then abreast of us, as it would enable him to get to Moguer (where the French army was supposed to be) considerably sooner than he could do by water; the whole fleet being accordingly directed to anchor as close to the shore as they could with safety. I began about ten o'clock to disembark the troops; and the whole of them, as well as their horses, &c. being safely landed, between one and two o'clock the general commenced his march, keeping along the beach, and being attended by eleven of our flat boats (under Lieutenant Westphal, of the Implacable,) for the purpose of transporting the army across a large branch of the river, which (after our landing) we were informed, intersected the way to Moguer, and extended a very considerable distance into the country. This precaution having, however, prevented their being delayed in the slightest degree, the army got to Moguer (a distance of twenty-two miles from the point of debarkation) about eleven o'clock yesterday morning, and the French army being there (according to the information) the Spaniards forgot their fatigues, and proceeded immediately to attack them. The French, not being prepared for such a visit, were soon driven from the town: but, having collected and rallied in the neighbourhood, they attempted to regain what they had lost, and in their turn made several desperate attacks on the Spanish advanced line; but, being worsted in every attempt by the valour and steadiness of the Spanish troops, they retreated at the close of day, and will, I fear, owing to their being principally cavalry, succeed in getting to Seville. General Lascy will, however, I believe, follow them as long as he sees any chance of destroying them; and, on his return from pursuing them, will re-embark and return to Cadiz, or St. Lucar, as circumstances may authorise.—The loss of the Spaniards during yesterday was but trifling; that of the French has not yet been ascertained; but I saw several of them lying dead on the field, and about twelve of them were taken prisoners, who say they were about 1,100 strong. The cheerfulness with which the Spanish troops bore the fatigue of marching twenty-two miles, after being without rest for three successive nights, and the steadiness and valour they displayed in the action that ensued, has excited my highest admiration, and made me more sanguine than ever in the hope, that such people in such a cause must be ultimately successful. The inhabitants of this neighbourhood also shew scarcely less enthusiasm than the army come to their deliverance, and the manner in which they have greeted our arrival amongst them sufficiently proves their attachment to their legitimate government, and their detestation of the French usurpation. I cannot, Sir, close this account of the transactions of the Spanish army, without paying my humble but sincere tribute of admiration of General Lascy, who has proved himself worthy of commanding such men, and appears, by his coolness, judgment, and active bravery, to be peculiarly adapted for such services as that on which he is now employed. It is now, Sir, a pleasant duty incumbent on me, to assure you that nothing can exceed the good conduct of the officers and men you have placed under my orders; and I must beg leave particularly to mention to you the unremitted assistance I have received from Captain Daniell, of this sloop, and from Lieutenant Westphal (1st of the Implacable), who by his conduct on this service has added to the many claims he already has to my particular notice and recommendation.

“GEORGE COCKBURN.”

Between the commencement of the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo and the fall of Almeida, the corps of Regnier was stationed on the frontiers of Spanish Estremadura, to the south of the Tagus, kept in check by General Hill's division. When Almeida surrendered, Regnier crossed the Tagus in order to turn Lord Wellington's right flank, and occupy the road to Lisbon by the way of Castello Branco, which movement was anticipated by General Hill, who crossed the Tagus at Villa Velha, and gained possession of the important road at that place. The French army broke up from Almeida on the 16th of September, marching towards Guarda and Celeres; afterwards crossing the Mondego by the bridge of Fornos, the three corps of Ney, Junot, and Regnier, under their commander-in-chief, united on the 21st at Vizen, where they remained for two days to bring up their artillery, which had been retarded by the badness of the road. Colonel Trant made some prisoners, but was under the necessity of returning towards the Douro. Finding his communication with the main army cut off, he retired in the direction of Meilhada, where he expected to have been joined by General Millar and Colonel Wilson; but finding they were detained in the neighbourhood of Busaco for want of supplies, he resolved to advance alone, for the purpose of dislodging the French who continued at Coimbra. Having reached that place with little opposition, he took about 5,000 prisoners, chiefly composed of sick and wounded, and captured nearly 4,000 muskets.

We shall here subjoin Lord Wellington's official account of the battle of Busaco, addressed to the Earl of Liverpool, and dated Coimbra, September 30.

“My Lord,—While the enemy was advancing from Celorico and Francoso upon Viseu, the different divisions of militia and Ordenanza were employed upon their flanks and rear; and Colonel Trant, with his division, attacked the escort of the military chest and reserve artillery, near Tojal, on the 20th inst. He took two officers and 100 prisoners, but the enemy collected a force from the front and rear, which obliged him to retire again towards the Douro. I understand that the enemy's communication with Almeida is completely cut off; and he possesses only the ground on which his army stands.

“On the 21st the enemy's advanced-guard pushed on to St. Cambadao, at the junction of the rivers Criz and Dao; and Brigadier-general Pack retired across the former, and joined Brigadier-general Crawford at Mortagoa, having destroyed the bridges over those two rivers. The enemy's advanced-guard crossed the Criz, having repaired the bridge, on the 23d, and the whole of the 6th corps was collected on the other side of the river; and I therefore withdrew the cavalry through the Sierra de Busaco, with the exception of three squadrons, as the ground was unfavorable for the operations of that army. On the 25th, the whole of the 6th and of the 2d corps crossed the Criz, in the neighbourhood of St. Cambadao; and Brigadier-general Crawford's division and Brigadier-general Pack's brigade retired to the position which I had fixed upon for the army on the top of Sierra de Busaco. These troops were followed in this movement by the whole of the corps of Ney and Regnier (the 6th and 2d), but it was conducted by Brigadier-gen. Crawford with great regularity, and the troops took their position without sustaining any loss of importance. The 4th Portuguese caçadores, which had retired on the right of the other troops, and the piquets of the 3d division of infantry, which were posted at St. Antonio de Cantaro, under Major Smith, of the 45th, were engaged with the advance of Regnier's corps in the afternoon; and the former shewed that steadiness and gallantry which others of the Portuguese troops have since manifested.

"The Sierra de Busaco is a high ridge, which extends from the Mondego, in a northerly direction, about eight miles. At the highest point of the ridge, about two miles from its termination, is the convent and garden of Busaco. The Sierra of Busaco is connected by a mountainous tract of country with the Sierra de Caramula, which extends in a north-easterly direction beyond Visen, and separates the valley of the Mondego from the valley of the Douro, on the left of the Mondego. Nearly in a line with the Sierra de Busaco is another ridge of the same description, which is called the Sierra de Murcella, covered by the river Alva, and connected by other mountainous tracts with the Sierra d'Estrella. All the roads to Coimbra, from the eastward, lead over one or the other of these Sierras. They are very difficult for the passage of an army, the approach totheto of the ridge on both sides being mountainous.

"As the enemy's whole army was on the ridge of the Mondego, and as it was evident that he intended to force our position, Lieut-general Hill crossed the river by a short move to his left, on the morning of the 26th, leaving Colonel le Cor with his brigade on the Sierra de Murcella, to cover the right of the army; and Major-general Fane, with his division of Portuguese cavalry and the 13th light dragoons, in front of the Alva, to observe and check the movements of the enemy's cavalry on the Mondego. With this exception, the whole army was collected upon the Sierra de Busaco, with the British cavalry observing the plain in the rear of its left, and the road leading from Mortagoa to Oporto, through the mountainous tract which connects the Sierra de Busaco with the Sierra de Caramula. The 8th corps joined the enemy in our front on the 26th, but he did not make any serious attack on that day. The light troops on both sides were engaged throughout the line. At six in the morning of the 27th, the enemy made two desperate attacks upon our position, the one on the right, the other on the left of the highest point of the Sierra. The attack upon the right was made by two divisions of the 2d corps, on that part of the Sierra occupied by the 3d division of infantry. One division of French infantry arrived at the top of the ridge, when it was attacked in the most gallant manner by the 88th regiment, under the command of the Hon. Lieut.-col. Wallace, and the 45th regiment, under the command of the Hon. Lieut.-col. Meade, and by the 8th Portuguese regiment, under the command of Lieut.-col. Douglas, directed by Major-gen. Picton. These three corps advanced with the bayonet, and drove the enemy's division from the advantageous ground which they had obtained. The other division of the 2d corps attacked farther on the right, by the road leading by St. Antonio de Cantaro, also in front of Major-general Picton's division. This division was repulsed before it could reach the top of the ridge, by the 74th regiment, under the command of the Hon. Lieut.-col. French, and the brigade of Portuguese infantry, under the command of Colonel Champelmond, directed by Colonel Mackinnon. Major-general Leith also moved to his left, to the support of Major-general Picton, and aided in the defeat of the enemy on this post, by the 3d battalion royals, the 1st battalion and the 2d battalion 38th regiment. In these attacks, Major-generals Leith and Picton, Colonels Mackinnon and Champelmond, of the Portuguese service, who was wounded, Lieut.-col. Wallace, the Hon. Lieut.-col. Meade, Lieut.-col. Sutton of the 9th Portuguese regiment, Major Smith of the 45th regiment, who was unfortunately killed, Lieut.-col. Douglas, and Major Birmingham of the 8th Portuguese regiment, distinguished themselves. Major-gen. Picton reports well of the 9th and 21st Portuguese regiments, commanded by Lieut.-col. Sutton, and by Lieut.-col. de Arouje Bacellar, and of the Portuguese artillery, commanded by Lieut.-col. Arenschild. I have also to mention, in a particular manner, the conduct of Captain Dansey of the 88th regiment. Major-general Leith reports the good conduct of the royals, 1st battalion 9th, and 2d battalion 38th regiment; and I beg to assure your lordship, that I never witnessed a more gallant attack than that made by the 38th, 45th, and 8th Portuguese regiments on the enemy's division which had reached the ridge of the Sierra.

"On the left, the enemy attacked, with three divisions of infantry of the 6th corps, that part of the Sierra occupied by the left division, commanded by Brigadier-general Crawford, and by the brigade of Portuguese infantry, commanded by Brigadier-general Pack. One division of infantry only made any progress towards the top of the hill; and they were immediately charged with the bayonet by Brigadier-general Crawford with the 48th, 52d, and 95th regiments, and the 3d Portuguese caçadores, and driven down with immense loss. Brigadier-general Cleman's brigade of Portuguese infantry, which was in reserve, was moved up to support the right of Brigadier-general Crawford's division; and a battalion of the 19th Portuguese regiment, under the command of Lieut.-col. Macbean, made a gallant and successful charge upon a body of another division of the enemy, which was endeavouring to penetrate in that quarter. In this attack Brigadier-general Crawford, Lieut.-colonels Beckwith, of the 95th, and Barclay, of the 52d, and the commanding officers of the regiments engaged, distinguished themselves. Besides these attacks the light troops of the two armies were engaged throughout the 27th, and the 4th Portuguese caçadores, and the 1st and 16th regiments, directed by Brigadier-general Pack, and commanded by Lieutenant-colonel de Rego Bonito, Lieutenant-colonel Hill, and Major Armstrong, shewed great steadiness and gallantry. The loss sustained by the enemy in his attack on the 27th, has been enormous. I understand that the general of division Merle and General Maucun are wounded, and General Simon was taken prisoner by the 52d regiment, and three colonels, 33 officers, and 250 men. The enemy left 2,000 killed upon the field-of-battle; and I understand, from the prisoners and deserters, that the loss in wounded is immense. The enemy did not renew his attack excepting by the fire of his light troops on the 28th, but he moved a large body of infantry and cavalry, from the left of his centre to the rear, from whence I saw his cavalry in march on the road which leads from Mortagoa over the mountains towards Oporto. Having thought it probable that he would endeavour to turn our left by that road, I had directed Col. Trant, with his division of militia, to march to Sardao, with the intention that he should occupy those mountains; but unfortunately he was sent round by Oporto by the general officer commanding in the north, in consequence of a small detachment of the enemy being in possession of St. Pedro de Sul; and, notwithstanding the efforts which he made to arrive in time, he did not reach Sardao till the 28th at night, after the enemy was in possession of the ground. As it was probable, that in the course of the night of the 28th the enemy would throw his whole army upon that road, by which he could avoid the Sierra de Busaco, and reach Coimbra by the high road to Oporto, and thus the army would have been exposed to be cut off from that town, or to a general action on less favorable ground; and as I had reinforcements in my rear, I was induced to withdraw from the Sierra de Busaco. The enemy did break up in the mountains at eleven at night of the 28th, and he made the march expected. His advanced-guard was at Avelans, in the road from Oporto to Coimbra, yesterday; and the whole army was seen in march through the mountains; that under my command, however, was already in the low country, between the Sierra de Busaco and the sea; and the whole of it, with the exception of the advanced-guard, is this day on the left of the Mondego. Although, from the unfortunate circumstance of the delay of Colonel Trant's arrival at Sardao, I am apprehensive that I shall not succeed in effecting the object which I had in view in passing the Mondego, and in occupying the Sierra de Busaco, I do not regret my having done so. This movement has afforded me a favorable opportunity of shewing the enemy the description of troops of which this army is composed; it has brought the Portuguese levies into action with the enemy for the first time in an advantageous situation; and they have proved that the trouble which has been taken with them, has not been thrown away, and that they are worthy of contending in the same ranks with British troops in this interesting cause, which they afford the best hopes of saving. Throughout the contest upon the Sierra, and in all the previous marches, and in those which we have since made, the whole army has conducted themselves in the most regular manner. Accordingly, all the operations have been carried with ease, the soldiers have suffered no privations, have undergone no unnecessary fatigue, there has been no loss of stores, and the army is in the highest spirits. I have received, throughout the service, the greatest assistance from the general and staff officers. Lieutenant-general Sir Brent Spencer has given me the assistance which his experience enables him to afford me; and I am particularly indebted to the adjutant and quarter-master-general, and the officers of their departments, and to Lieutenant-col. Bathurst, and the officers of my personal staff, to Brigadier-general Howarth and the artillery, and particularly to Lieutenant-colonel Fletcher, Captain Chapman, and the officers of the royal engineers. I must likewise mention Mr. Kennedy, and the officers of the commissariat, which department has been carried on most successfully. I should not do justice to the service, or to my own feelings, if I did not take this opportunity of drawing your lordship's attention to the merits of Marshal Beresford. To him exclusively, under the Portuguese government, is due the merit of having raised, formed, disciplined, and equipped the Portuguese army, which has now shown itself capable of engaging and defeating the enemy. I have besides received from him, upon all occasions, all the assistance which his experience and abilities, and knowledge of this country, have qualified him to afford me. The enemy has made no movement in Estremadura, or in the northern provinces, since I addressed your lordship last.—I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) "WELLINGTON."

After the battle of Busaco, in which the French are said to have lost 10,000 men, but according to their own account only 1,100, Massena did not renew his attack on the 28th, except by the fire of his light troops; but he moved a large body in such a direction as induced his lordship to withdraw from the mountains of Busaco, and to take his army nearer Lisbon, to his shipping and reinforcements. After this long retreat from Busaco, Lord Wellington took up a strong position between Alhandra and Torres Vedras, from which he afterwards retired, and occupied a range of mountains from Alhandra to the coast near Mafra. The right of his position was covered by the Tagus, on which were stationed a number of gun-boats, to annoy the enemy, should he be inclined to make any assault in that direction. Soon after Lord Wellington had taken up this line of defence, he was reinforced by about 9,500 Spaniards, under the Marquis de Romana.

CHAPTER III.

Louis Bonaparte's Address to the Dutch Legislative Body, on his Retirement to Bohemia.—Position of the Allies at the End of the Campaign.—The British obtain Possession of Guadeloupe.—Amboyna.—Bourbon.—Isles of France and Banda.

THE sentiments of Louis Bonaparte, the Ex-King of Holland, not agreeing with those of his brother the French emperor, he resolved on retiring to Bohemia. The following are extracts from the remarkable address which he presented to the Dutch legislative body, informing it of the resolution he had been compelled to take, in consequence of the entry of French troops into Amsterdam, of abdicating his throne.

"I should be much to blame if I consented to retain the title of king, being no more than an instrument, no longer commanding, not only in the country, but even in my own capital, and perhaps soon not even in my palace.

"My brother, so violently irritated against me, is not so against my children; and, doubtless, he will not destroy what he has done, and deprive them of their inheritance, since he has not, nor can have, any subject of complaint against the young king, who will not for a long time come to reign himself. His mother, to whom the regency appertains by the constitution, will do every thing that shall be agreeable to the emperor, my brother, and will succeed better than myself, who have had the misfortune never to be successful in my endeavours of that kind.

"Perhaps I am the only obstacle to the reconciliation of this country with France; and should that be so, I might find some kind of consolation in dragging out the remainder of a wandering and languishing life at a distance from the first objects of my whole affection, this good people, and my son. These are my principal motives: there are others, equally powerful, with respect to which I must be silent, but they will easily be divined. The emperor, my brother, though strongly prejudiced against me, must feel that I could not act otherwise: he is great, and he ought to be just.

"I should be nevertheless a witness of every thing that might be going on, without being able to do any thing for my people; responsible for all occurrences, without the power to prevent them or their influence, I should have exposed myself to the complaints of both sides, and perhaps have occasioned great misfortunes, by doing which I should have betrayed my conscience, my people, and my duty. I have for a long time foreseen the extremity to which I am now reduced; but I could not have prevented it without sacrificing my most sacred duties, without ceasing to have at heart the interest of my people, and without ceasing to connect my fate with that of the country. Now that Holland is reduced to that condition, I have, as King of Holland, but one course to take, and that is, to abdicate the throne in favor of my children; any other course would have only augmented the misfortunes of my reign.

"In whatever place I may happen to terminate my days, the name of Holland, and the most lively prayers for its happiness, will be my last words, my last wish."

This address of Louis gained him high esteem, and placed the character of Napoleon, if possible, in a more detestable light. His son, the Grand Duke of Berg, arrived soon after in Paris, and was received in a very favorable manner by his uncle (the emperor) who told him that the conduct of his father had wounded him to the heart, and that his infirmity alone could account for it; thus, insinuating, and doubtless wishing all the world to believe, that his brother was insane.

The crafty emperor took great pains to ascribe the utmost cruelty to the allies, particularly to the British: "The cries of the inhabitants of Ciudad Rodrigo," said he, in the Moniteur, "were heard in Lord Wellington's camp, which was only six leagues distant; but all ears were shut against them." A battle was daily expected between Lord Wellington and Massena, but the latter retired, continuing his retreat to Santarem, where he halted and posted himself, being followed by Lord Wellington as far as Cartaxo, where he established his head-quarters. About 400 prisoners were taken from the enemy during these movements. Massena secured the passage of the Zezure by means of this retreat, as well as the power of withdrawing into Spain by Castello Branco; a junction with the reinforcements he expected, and a country as yet not exhausted, from which his army obtained support. At the end of the campaign the allies retained a position which it was not in the power of the French to force. They were in a country which afforded no supplies, whilst the combined army obtained provisions by sea.

During this year, the British gained possession of the island of Guadaloupe, with a naval and military force under the orders of Admiral Cochrane and General Beckwith. The French general, Ernouf, was apprised of the intended attack, in consequence of which he concentrated all his forces at Basse Terre. A general engagement took place on the 23d of February, when victory declared in favor of the British, the French having lost 500 men. So dangerous did the situation of Ernouf become, that he hoisted flags of truce on the 24th, whilst the British troops were advancing; and next morning a capitulation was agreed on, by which the garrison were to have the honors of war, and be sent to England till regularly exchanged.

The British arms were also attended with success in the capture of Amboyna, one of the Malacca islands, by a squadron of ships under Captains Tucker, Montague, and Spencer, who, with 176 troops, and the seamen and marines of the Dover, Cornwallis, and Samarang, the whole force amounting only to 401 men, including officers, proceeded up the harbour on the 9th of February, and made good their landing on the 15th, under the command of Captain Court, of the India Company's coast artillery. The ships commenced the attack by cannonading the fort and surrounding batteries, which was continued for two hours and a half, though exposed to a heavy fire of red-hot shot from the heights on the left of the town. In the mean time, the force on shore had stormed the battery of Wanatoo, notwithstanding the determined opposition of the enemy, who had two officers killed, and one dangerously wounded, and the guns were turned upon the enemy in their retreat. Captain Court then proceeded in the arduous undertaking along the heights to turn the enemy's position at Batter Gantong, which commanded the town of Amboyna. After a fatiguing march, ascending and descending hills over which there was no road, and many of them so extremely steep as to require the assistance of the bushes for the men to get up and down by, they reached an eminence which effectually commanded the enemy, who retired immediately, and the battery was entered without opposition. In this state of things, a summons was sent to the governor on the morning of the 17th, and a capitulation was agreed to, by which the island was given up to the British on the 19th; the garrison to be sent to Java at the expence of the captors. The island was defended by 130 Europeans and upwards of 1,000 Javanese and Mandurese troops, exclusive of the crews of three vessels sunk in the inner harbour, amounting to 220 men, aided by the Dutch inhabitants. The loss sustained by the British at Amboyna, and at the destruction of a Dutch fort at Poolo Combu, in the Celebes, was only five killed and nineteen wounded.

The English took seven vessels of war of various descriptions, forty-two government supply vessels of different descriptions, and three neutrals; in all fifty-two. By another letter from Captain Tucker, dated from Amboyna, March 1, it appeared that the valuable islands from Saparona, Harouka, and Nassau-Laut, as well as those of Bouro and Manippa, likewise surrendered to his Britannic majesty's forces.

The British were also successful in another expedition in the Indian seas, by which the island of Bonaparte (late Bourbon) was added to his dominions. The expedition consisted of the Boadicea, Neriade, Sirius, and Iphigenia, under the command of Commodore Rowley, and a force of 3,650 European and Indian troops, under Lieutenant-colonel Keating. On the 7th of July, a partial landing was effected on the island, but, owing to the violence of the surf, the remainder of the force was not put on shore till the next day, when Colonel Keating advanced to the attack of the capital (St. Denis.) Every thing was in readiness, and the grand attack would have taken place in less than half an hour, when a suspension of arms was demanded by "a brave, though vanquished enemy," and thus, said the colonel, "in a few hours has this rich, extensive, and valuable colony, been added to his gracious majesty's dominions, with a population of upwards of 100,000 souls, and with a loss on our part comparatively trifling." By the capitulation, the French troops (fifteen hundred) were allowed the honors of war; they were to be sent to the Cape of Good Hope; and the laws, customs, and religion of the inhabitants, as well as their private property, was to be insured to them. The loss of the British consisted of eighteen men killed, and seventy-nine wounded.

The isles of France and Banda, the only remaining possessions of the French in the Indian seas, also fell into the hands of the British. By the capitulation of the Isle of France, the land and sea forces, officers, subalterns, and privates, were to retain their effects and baggage; not to be considered as prisoners of war, but to be conveyed at the expence of the English, with their families, to some parts of European France. Private property, of course, was to be respected, and the inhabitants maintained in their religion, customs, and laws. The following vessels were found at Port Napoleon; La Minerve, fifty-two guns; La Bellona, forty-eight; L'Astrée, forty-four; La Manchée, forty-four; Iphigenia, thirty-six; Nereide, thirty-six; (these two were formerly English frigates;) Le Victor, sloop, twenty-two; L'Entreprenant, fourteen; and a new brig (name unknown,) fourteen; the Charlton, Ceylon, and United Kingdom, (formerly English East Indiamen;) and twenty-eight merchant-vessels of various burdens, from 150 to 1,000 tons; besides five gun-brigs.

CHAPTER IV.

Indisposition of his Britannic Majesty.—Consequent Proceedings in Parliament.—The Prince of Wales appointed Regent, under certain Restrictions.—Interesting Debates on the Subject.

GREAT was the interest and anxiety excited by the known indisposition of his majesty, and the doubts which were generally entertained, whether the royal signature could be obtained to a commission for a further prorogation of parliament pursuant to notice.

On the 1st of November, the house of lords met about half-past three o'clock. About four the lord-chancellor rose, and addressed the house from the woolsack.

"My lords.—Your lordships are now assembled without any notice having been given that parliament was to meet for the dispatch of business, and after a notification had been published directing that this parliament should be prorogued to the 29th of this month, and authorising the chancellor to issue a commission under the great seal for such prorogation. My lords, I have to state to your lordships, and I do it with the greatest concern and regret, that in consequence of his majesty's personal indisposition, that commission has not received his majesty's signature. There may be a question, whether the chancellor is authorised to put the great seal to such a commission, without the king's sign manual—and whether such commission would be legal? But upon this question, looking to the precedents in our proceedings, and to the records of parliament, I do not think it proper to enter into any discussion. Under the circumstances of his majesty's indisposition, I have thought it my duty to abstain from proffering the commission to his majesty for his royal signature: It is, therefore, for your lordships, in your wisdom, to determine what course of proceeding it will be expedient to adopt. It remains for me to state, that the indisposition of his majesty has arisen from the pressure of domestic affliction operating upon his paternal feelings, and I have the satisfaction to add, that a confident expectation is entertained of his majesty's speedy recovery."

The Earl of Liverpool.—"My lords, under the afflicting circumstances stated by my noble and learned friend, circumstances which have arisen entirely from the domestic causes to which my noble and learned friend has alluded, I think it my duty to move an adjournment for the shortest period, within which, by law, the parliament can be summoned to meet for the dispatch of business. It is my intention, therefore, to move, in conformity to a precedent before us, that this house do adjourn till Thursday the 15th instant; that the house be summoned for that day; and that letters be sent to the lords, informing them, that their attendance on that day is required. It would not be proper for me to enter into any discussion, whether any, and if any, what proceeding it may be expedient to adopt on that day, should his majesty's indisposition unfortunately continue; but it is highly requisite, whatever course it may be deemed adviseable to adopt, or, although no proceeding may be then requisite, to take the necessary steps to ensure as full an attendance as possible. I have great satisfaction in adding to what has been stated by my noble and learned friend, that the physicians attending his majesty entertain the most confident hopes of his majesty's speedy recovery."—His lordship concluded by moving an adjournment.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. IV.

Lord Holland.—"I trust, my lords, under the melancholy circumstances in which we are assembled, it will not be supposed that in rising upon this question, I intend to offer any opposition to the motion of the noble lord, neither do I wish to make any remark that can lead to discussion. I cheerfully acquiesce in the motion, founded as it is upon a precedent within recollection. Were that precedent to be made over again, I should rather prefer a proceeding de die in diem; but the motion of the noble lord being founded upon the precedent, and being aware of the importance of unanimity upon such an occasion, I cheerfully acquiesce in the proposition for adjournment."

The motions of the Earl of Liverpool were then put by the lord-chancellor—

"That this house do, at its rising, adjourn till Thursday, the 15th day of this instant November.

"That the lords be summoned to attend the service of this house on Thursday, the 15th instant.

"That the lord-chancellor do write letters to all the lords, informing them that their attendance is required on Thursday, the 15th day of this instant November."

Which were severally agreed to.

The lord-chancellor then put the question upon the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, "That the house do now adjourn," which was also agreed to; and the lord-chancellor notified, "that this house is adjourned till Thursday the 15th inst."

On the same day, and at the same time, the speaker addressed the house of commons to the following effect:—

"This house is now met upon the day to which it was last prorogued. But I have to inform the house, that notwithstanding his majesty's royal proclamation in the Gazette, intimating his pleasure that parliament should be still further prorogued to a future day, we are not to expect any message from his majesty's commissioners on this occasion; no commission having been issued further to prorogue parliament. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to take the chair of this house, in order that this house may be enabled to adjourn itself to such time as the house in its wisdom shall deem fit; and I do therefore take the chair accordingly."—(General cries of chair, chair!)

The chancellor of the exchequer said, he was persuaded it would be unnecessary for him to state, that the house was then assembled upon the day to which it had in the last instance been prorogued. After the proclamation, however, which had already appeared in the gazette, intimating his majesty's pleasure that parliament should be further prorogued to a future day, the house would very naturally be anxious to hear, why, after such declaration of his majesty's servants, they were unable to carry into effect his majesty's wishes, and were not prepared with a royal commission for that purpose. To relieve this anxiety, it became his duty, his most painful duty, to state, that it was owing to the indisposition of his majesty that his majesty's servants had been unable to give effect to his royal proclamation—that it was owing to the severity of that indisposition that the lord-chancellor, whose immediate duty it was to take his majesty's orders on such subjects, could not obtain the royal signature to a commission further to prorogue parliament. It would not be necessary for him, he was persuaded, to inform the house, that, under such circumstances, it would not be consistent with his duty or the principles of the constitution, for the lord-chancellor to affix the great seal to such a commission without the sanction of the royal sign manual.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—Perhaps the house would permit him, on that occasion, to add one or two observations on the actual state of his majesty's health. In doing this, he was persuaded that it would be wholly unnecessary for him to say any thing with a view to increase those feelings of anxiety and concern, entertained by the public at large respecting the disorder affecting his majesty; nor should he then mention the circumstance which he meant to state to the house, but that he was persuaded the public would derive from it very considerable consolation respecting the nature and duration of his majesty's present indisposition. If any thing could afford real consolation to the feelings of unfeigned affection and affliction which pervaded all classes of the public, it must be the consideration that the cause of his majesty's present illness was to be ascribed to his steady and unremitting attention to the painful and protracted sufferings of a beloved daughter.—(Hear, hear!)—He did not mention this circumstance as new to those who heard him, for it was notorious to the nation at large, that from that cause, principally, the illness of his majesty had arisen; but he could not omit to observe, that the knowledge of that fact must give rise to considerable and well-founded hopes of his majesty's early and complete recovery. He had the satisfaction also to inform the house, that the symptoms of his majesty's complaint were peculiarly mild, as well as that his majesty's physicians entertained and expressed strong and sanguinary expectations of his recovery.—(Hear, hear, hear!) Having said thus much upon this most interesting subject, it remained only for him to touch briefly upon the practical question as to the course which it would be proper for the house to pursue on this occasion; and in that respect he apprehended, that the statement of the speaker, which the house had just heard, pointed out the only proper course to be adopted. He agreed with that statement, that the house could not then proceed to the discussion of any public business; but was bound to adjourn over for the present. But whether it were competent to that house to enter upon the discussion of public business at that time, or not, he would but intreat gentlemen to reflect upon the situation in which they were thus met, and he was persuaded the house would readily concur in the expediency of an immediate adjournment. They must be aware that they had not been assembled in consequence of any intimation of his majesty's royal pleasure, to call together his parliament at this particular time. On the contrary, they had been apprised by the most authoritative statement (his majesty's proclamation in the Gazette), that it was not his intention to assemble parliament for the dispatch of public business at this time. How, then, could the house, in such a situation, proceed with any propriety to the discussion of public business? Upon this head, he was sure there could be no difference of opinion; and the only question, therefore, then to be considered would be, as to the period for which it would be proper to adjourn. On this point he should observe, that it was his intention before he sat down to move, that the house, at its rising, do adjourn to this day fortnight. He proposed this adjournment as the shortest period within which such an attendance could be procured as would enable them, on their meeting, with decency to pronounce a parliamentary expression of their sentiments, or to discuss the propriety of a still farther adjournment. But beside this consideration, they had an instance of parliamentary enactment authorising the calling together of parliament within fourteen days upon any sudden emergency happening during a recess. They had also a case in modern times, which, as it appeared to be analogous, should be considered a guide for their proceeding, and afforded a precedent of a similar adjournment (alluding to the case of his majesty's first melancholy indisposition in 1788). Upon these various considerations it was, that he meant to propose an adjournment for a fortnight, and he trusted the house would feel them so forcibly as to go along with him in his motion. He had but one other consideration to suggest, and that was solely confined to what would be necessary to forward the main object of the adjournment. The house was already aware that the object of adjournment was to obtain a fuller attendance than in the present instance could possibly be expected; and in order to promote that object, he proposed to move for a call of the house, as had been the case in the recent instance to which he had alluded, for this day fortnight. But to give the more effect to this call, he should also move, that circular letters be transmitted by the speaker to all the members of that house, to apprise them of the order for calling over the house on this day fortnight. Having thus put the house in possession of his views on the subject, he had nothing further to add, and should conclude with moving, that the house, at its rising, should adjourn to this day fortnight.

On the question being put—Mr. Sheridan declared that he concurred entirely in all the sentiments which had been so well and so forcibly expressed by the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down. He was most highly gratified, as he was convinced every gentleman present and every individual in the nation must be, at the consolation held out in the statement of the right hon. gentleman, that the most sanguine expectation might be entertained of the speedy recovery of his majesty. Impressed with such feelings, he should not take up more of the time of the house, but simply to say, that he should second the motion.

The question of adjournment was then agreed to, nemine contradicente.

The motion for a call of the house on that day fortnight was also agreed to, and the speaker ordered to write circular letters to the knights, citizens, and burgesses, members of that house.

On the 29th of November, the Earl of Liverpool moved in the house of lords that the house should adjourn to Dec. 13.

Earl Spencer conceiving that the house was departing from the precedent of 1788, moved, as an amendment, that the house should appoint a committee to examine the physicians.

Lords Moira, Holland, Grenville, Erskine, Stanhope, Marquis Lansdown, and the Duke of Sussex, spoke in favour of the amendment; as, by suspending the functions of the executive, they were bringing the regal authority into contempt.

Lord Harrowby contended that the appointment of a regency would be dethroning the king; but, being called to order, was followed by the lord-chancellor, who implored their lordships, as they valued the interests and feelings of the 1810. ment.

Several adjournments took place, Lord Grenville having urged the necessity of making a legislative provision, and Lord Holland contending that they ought first to establish a representative of the royal authority, for the purpose of giving a constitutional sanction to such a legislative measure.

On the 20th of December, Earl Camden presented the report of the committee appointed to examine the physicians. It appeared by this report, that the king's illness began in a gentle form on October 3; that it continued unabated till the 25th, when his majesty himself consulted Sir H. Hall on the propriety of taking medicine; on the 28th he became incapable of transacting business. In the first week of November, his disorder was at the highest pitch to which it had ever yet reached. All the physicians, however, were of opinion, that his majesty would recover and be capable of transacting business. The report of the committee appointed by the house of commons, was nearly to the same purpose.

The house of commons having resolved itself into a committee on the state of the nation, the chancellor of the exchequer submitted the three following propositions: 1. "That it is the opinion of this house, that his majesty is prevented, by indisposition, from coming to his parliament, and from attending to public business, and that the personal exercise of the royal authority is thereby for the present interrupted." 2. "That it is the opinion of this house, that it is the right and duty of the lords spiritual, and temporal, and commons of Great Britain, now assembled and lawfully, fully, and freely representing all the estates of the people of this realm, to provide the means of supplying the defect of the personal exercise of the royal authority, arising from his majesty's late indisposition, in such a manner as the exigency of the case appear to require." 3. "That for this purpose, and for maintaining entire the constitutional authority of the king, it is necessary that the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons of Great Britain, should determine on the means whereby the royal assent may be given in parliament to such bill as may be passed the two houses of parliament, respecting the exercise of the powers and authorities of the crown, in the name and on the behalf of the king, during the continuance of his majesty's indisposition." The hon. gentleman then proceeded to state, that he should propose that his royal highness the Prince of Wales should be appointed to exercise the office of regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty during the continuance of the king's indisposition; that generally all the powers of the government should be committed to his hands; that to her majesty the queen, should be entrusted the care and guardianship of the king's person: that due provisions should be made to notify the king's recovery, and chalk out the course of proceedings by which his majesty might be enabled to resume his functions. These three provisions should have no limit in point of time, except what should arise from the duration of the king's indisposition. Taking all the circumstances connected with the king's indisposition into consideration, a limit should be placed on the prerogatives of the crown, when in the hands of the regent for a twelvemonth, taking care that the limitation should expire during the sitting of parliament, and at least six weeks after it was convened. It would then be open for parliament to re-consider the subject; or, if they did not think that duty necessary, the termination of the restriction would have the advantage of having occurred under the eye and superintendence of the legislature. Upon these grounds, he thought there should be a suspension for the same period, of the power of granting any rank or dignity in the peerage, with certain exceptions. Also, that all pensions and offices granted, should continue only during the continuance of the regent in office, unless subsequently proved and confirmed by his majesty: and lastly, that to her majesty the queen, with the care of his royal person, should be committed the appointment to the several offices connected with his majesty's household, subject to the reconsideration of parliament. He had the authority of Dr. Willis for stating, that the shortest period in which recovery from such disorders could be expected was six weeks: that the average period was five or six months, and that from twelve months to twelve and a half, was the extreme point at which, if the most encouraging symptoms of recovery did not present themselves, the prospect became almost hopeless. The honorable gentleman concluded by moving the first resolution, which was carried: on the second, a warm discussion took place, and a division being called on, the 2d and 3d resolutions were carried by 269 to 157.

On the 31st of December, the chancellor of the exchequer stated, that the resolutions, declaring the king's incapacity to exercise the royal functions, the right and duty of both houses to provide for the deficiency, and the mode of supplying that deficiency by means of a bill, having been agreed to by the lords, it now remained for the commons to consider of the measures that were proper to be adopted to supply the defect in the executive government. He then stated, that it would be his duty to submit a proposition to the house, calling upon his royal highness the Prince of Wales to take upon him the exercise of the royal authority, subject to certain restrictions in the use of it, and which restrictions it was intended should be limited in point of duration. He would propose, in the first place, That the regent should not have the power of creating peers; in the second, That he should be debarred from granting places or pensions for life; and the third restriction would apply to making provision for the custody of his majesty's person, which he would propose should be confided to the queen, and a council nominated to assist her.—He would now read the first of the series of resolutions he intended to propose, which he did as follows:—

“Resolved, That for the purpose of providing for the exercise of the royal authority during the continuance of his majesty's illness, in such manner, and to such extent, as the present circumstances and the urgent concerns of the nation appear to require, it is expedient, that his royal highness the Prince of Wales, being resident within the realm, shall be empowered to exercise and administer the royal authority, according to the laws and constitution of Great Britain, in the name, and on behalf of his majesty, and under the style and title of regent of the kingdom; and to use, execute, and perform, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, all authorities, prerogatives, acts of government, and administration of the same, that belong to the king of this realm to use, execute, and perform, according to the law thereof, subject to such limitations and exceptions as shall be provided.”

He wished the committee to keep in mind the nature of the duty they were called on to discharge on the present occasion. They were not called upon to supply a vacancy in the throne, but they were called upon to supply a temporary suspension of the royal authority; which suspension there was every reason to hope, both from the opinion of eminent medical persons, and the experience of similar instances of the royal indisposition, would not be protracted to a long period, but might shortly be put an end to by his majesty's restoration to the full exercise of his faculties. The committee had two very important objects to obtain: one, to provide for the security of the crown—the other, to provide an efficient government for the direction of the civil and military affairs of the country. There was another object, also, which it would be their duty to keep in view, namely, to remove every possible obstacle to the restoration of his majesty to the full exercise of the regal authority, whenever it should please Providence to establish his recovery. They were not only to provide for the effectual resumption of the royal functions, but to guard also against the creation of any obstacles to prevent the exercise of those functions, when the king should resume his authority. With this view it seemed to him, that at a time when the absolute necessity of the case required that powers should be given so highly important as those with which the regent must be invested; it became peculiarly the duty of parliament to take especial care the regent should not be able to misuse those powers; and particularly where the regent is the person that is to succeed to the crown, the utmost care should be taken to shew plainly that the power is not the regent's, but the king's, for whom he holds it in trust. He was of opinion, that the regent, with respect to all foreign relations, should be made as strong as possible; that he should have the free use of all those prerogatives which would enable him to carry on and prosecute the war with vigor, and as much as possible to distress our enemies: but, with respect to the internal transactions of the empire, he thought great caution should be used in giving him any powers which might be misused, as that of granting pensions certainly might. Mr. Percival proceeded to read the remaining resolutions:—

“Resolved, That the power so to be given to his royal highness the Prince of Wales shall not extend to the granting of any rank or dignity of the peerage of the realm to any person whatever, except to—(persons who have rendered eminent service to the country by sea or land.)

“Resolved, That the said power shall not extend to the granting of any office whatever in reversion, or to the granting of any office, salary, or pension, for other term than during his majesty's pleasure, except such offices as are by law required to be granted for life or during good behaviour, and except—(an exception was here introduced in favor of persons rendering eminent services to the country by sea or land.)

“Resolved, That the said power shall not extend to the granting of any part of his majesty's real or personal estate, except as far as relates to the renewal of leases.”

He then read the fifth resolution, as follows:—

“Resolved, That the care of his majesty's royal person, during the continuance of his majesty's illness, shall be committed to the queen's most excellent majesty; and that her majesty shall have the power to remove from, and to nominate and appoint such persons as she shall think proper to the several offices in his majesty's household; and to dispose, order, and manage, all other matters and things relating to the care of his majesty's royal person, during the time aforesaid; and that for the better enabling her majesty to discharge this important task, it is also expedient, that a council shall be appointed to advise and assist her majesty in the several matters aforesaid; and with power, from time to time, as they may see cause, to examine upon oath, the physicians and others attending his majesty's person, touching the state of his majesty's health, and all matters relative thereto.”

1811.

The Hon. W. Lambe moved an amendment to the first resolution, by leaving out all the words which contained the restriction.

After a warm debate a division took place on the first question and amendment, viz. whether there should or should not be restrictions:—

For restrictions, 224.—Against them, 200.—Majority, 24.

On the second resolution, for restricting the prerogative as to the grant of peerages:—

For it, 226.—Against it, 210.—Majority, 16.

On the third resolution, respecting the grant of pensions, &c.:—

For the restriction, 223.—Against it, 214.—Majority, 19.

The fourth resolution, relative to the disposition of the king's private property, was agreed to without a division; and the discussion on the fifth resolution, respecting the household-establishment, was postponed.

On the 1st of January, 1811; the fifth resolution was again read, which, however, the minister lost by a majority of three.—The resolution, as amended by the opposers of administration, was, that the care of his majesty's person, during his indisposition, should be committed to the queen, with the sole direction of such a portion of his majesty's household, as might be thought suitable to a proper attendance and regard to his royal person.

Her majesty was to be allowed a council, to assist her in the discharge of the important trusts which the act had committed to her care and superintendence.

Her majesty's council were empowered to examine the physicians, and others in waiting on his majesty, upon oath.

Her majesty's council should meet at stated times, to declare the state of his majesty's health, and transmit a report to the president of the privy-council, who should publish a copy in the London gazette.

Her majesty and council were eventually to make known his majesty's restoration to health, by an instrument sent to the privy-council; and when such instrument had been received and entered by the privy-council, his majesty might require the privy-council to assemble, by virtue of a sign-manual.

If his majesty, by and, with the advice of his privy-council, should signify his royal pleasure to resume the exercise of the executive power, and order a proclamation to be issued to that effect, the powers of the act should be considered as null and void.

On the event of the regent's demise, or that of her majesty, or the resumption of royal authority by the king, parliament should meet, if at that time either adjourned or prorogued; or if it be dissolved, the members of the former parliament should meet. Members of the two houses thus assembling, should be regarded as the two houses of parliament; but their sitting should not continue beyond the period of six months.

The election of members to be declared void, if appointed to office either by the regent or her majesty.

Commissioners having been appointed to wait upon the Prince of Wales, the resolutions and accompanying request of both houses of parliament were duly communicated to his royal highness; when his royal highness was pleased to return the following answer:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—I receive the communication which the two houses have directed you to make to me, of their joint resolutions on the subject of providing for 'the exercise of the royal authority, during his majesty's illness,' with those sentiments of regard which I must ever entertain for the united desires of the two houses.

"With the same sentiments I received the expressed 'hopes of the lords and commons, that from my regard for the interest of his majesty, and the nation, I should be ready to undertake the weighty and important trust proposed to be invested in me,' under the restrictions and limitations stated in those resolutions.

"Conscious that every feeling of my heart would have prompted me, from dutiful affection to my beloved father and sovereign, to have shewn all the reverential delicacy towards him, inculcated in these resolutions, I cannot refrain from expressing my regret that I should not have been allowed the opportunity of manifesting, to his afflicted and loyal subjects, that such would have been my conduct.

"Deeply impressed with the necessity of tranquillizing the public mind, and determined to submit to every personal sacrifice, consistent with the regard I owe to the security of my father's crown, and the equal regard I owe to the welfare of his people, I do not hesitate to accept the office and situation proposed to me, restricted as they are; still retaining every opinion expressed by me upon a former and similarly distressing occasion.

"In undertaking the trust proposed to me, I am well aware of the difficulties of the situation in which I shall be placed; but I shall rely with confidence upon the constitutional advice of an enlightened parliament, and the zealous support of a generous and loyal people. I will use all the means left to me to meet both.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—You will communicate this my answer to the two houses, accompanied by my most fervent wishes and prayers, that the Divine Will may extricate us and the nation from the grievous embarrassments of our present condition, by the speedy restoration of his majesty's health."

The following was the answer of the queen:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—That sense of duty and gratitude to the king, and of obligation to this country, which induced me, in the year 1789, readily to promise my most earnest attention to the anxious and momentous trust at that time intended to be reposed in me by parliament, is strengthened, if possible, by the uninterrupted enjoyment of those blessings which I have continued to experience, under the protection of his majesty, since that period; and I should be wanting to all my duties if I hesitated to accept the sacred trust which is now offered to me.

"The assistance in point of counsel and advice, which the wisdom of parliament proposes to provide for me, will make me undertake the charge with greater hopes that I may be able satisfactorily to fulfil the important duties which it must impose upon me.

"Of the nature and importance of that charge I cannot but be duly sensible, involving, as it does, every thing which is valuable to myself, as well as the highest interests of a people endeared to me by so many ties and considerations; but by nothing so strongly, as by their steady, loyal, and affectionate attachment to the best of kings."

The 6th of February, being the day appointed for swearing his royal highness into office before his majesty's most honorable privy-council, the prince went in grand procession, preceded by the officers of his own household, and several of his council, among whom were Earl Moira, Lords Keith, Cassilis, Hutchinson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. M. Angelo Taylor, Mr. Tyrwhitt, Colonel Mac Mahon, Colonel Bloomfield, General Hulse, Mr. Bicknell, &c. &c. (His chancellor was by accident not present, and there was a delay in consequence of his royal highness's anxious desire of his presence.) The prince was also accompanied by all the royal dukes. They passed through the room where the privy-councillors were assembled, through the circular drawing-room, into the grand saloon (a beautiful room in scarlet drapery, embellished with portraits of all the most distinguished admirals who have fought the battles that have given England the dominion of the seas), and here the prince seated himself at the top of the table—his royal brothers and cousin seating themselves on each hand according to seniority, and all the officers of his household, not privy-councillors, ranging themselves on each side of the entrance to the saloon. The privy-councillors then proceeded, all in full dress, according to their rank—the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of York, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, &c. &c. and as they severally entered, they made their reverence to the prince, who made a graceful return to each, and they successively took their places at the table; and lastly, Mr. Faw-

as clerk and keeper of the records.

The prince then spoke to the following effect:—

"My Lords,—I understand that by the act passed by the parliament appointing me regent of the united kingdom, in the name and on behalf of his majesty, I am required to take certain oaths, and to make a declaration before your lordships, as prescribed by the said act. I am now ready to take these oaths, and to make the declaration prescribed."

The lord privy seal then rose, made his reverence, approached the regent, and read from a parchment the oath as follows—The prince, with an audible voice, pronounced after him:—

"I do sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to his majesty king George. So help me God."

"I do solemnly promise and swear, that I will truly and faithfully execute the office of regent of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, according to an act of parliament passed in the 51st year of the reign of his majesty King George the Third (intituled, An Act, &c.) and that I will administer, according to law, the power and authority vested in me by virtue of the said act; and that I will in all things, to the utmost of my power and ability, consult and maintain the safety, honor, and dignity of his majesty, and the welfare of his people. So help me God."

And the prince subscribed the two oaths. The lord president then presented to his royal highness the declaration mentioned in an act made in the 30th year of King Charles II. intituled, "An Act for the more effectually preserving the king's person and government, by disabling papists from sitting in either house of parliament," and which declaration his royal highness audibly made, repeated, and subscribed.—The lord president signed first, and every one of the privy-councillors in succession signed these instruments as witnesses—and the same was delivered into the hand of the keeper of the records.

The prince then delivered to the president of the council a certificate of his having received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, at the chapel royal of St. James, on Sunday, the 27th January ult. which was also countersigned and delivered to the keeper of the records, who deposited all these instruments in a box at the bottom of the table.

The lord president then approached the regent, bent the knee, and had the honour to kiss his hand. The royal dukes followed, and afterwards the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the rest, according to the order in which they sat at the long table, advancing to the chair on both sides.—During the whole of this ceremony, his royal highness maintained the most dignified and graceful deportment, and there was not the slightest indication of partiality of behaviour to one set of men more than another.

On the 12th, the lord-chancellor stated to the house of lords, that it being inconvenient for his royal highness the prince-regent to be personally present in parliament, he had given directions for the issuing of a royal commission; and therefore he moved, "That the house do now adjourn for the purpose of robing."—Agreed to.

The house having resumed, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, Earls Camden and Westmoreland, (the lords president and privy-seal) and the Duke of Montrose, took their seats before the throne as the royal commissioners.

The lord-chancellor having directed the deputy usher of the black rod to acquaint the commons their presence was required to hear the commission read, presently the speaker, with a numerous attendance of members, appeared at their lordships' bar, when the commission, for declaring the further purposes of parliament being assembled, was read by the clerk.

The lord-chancellor then addressed both houses in the following speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—In execution of the commission which has now been read to you, we are commanded by his royal highness the prince-regent to express, in the strongest manner, how deeply he laments, not only in common with all his majesty's loyal subjects, but with a personal and filial affliction, the great national calamity which has been the occasion of imposing upon his royal highness the duty of exercising, in his majesty's name, the royal authority of this kingdom.

"In conveying to you the sense which his royal highness entertains of the great difficulties attending the important trust which is reposed in him, his royal highness commands us to assure you, that he looks with the most perfect confidence to the wisdom and zeal of parliament, and to the attachment of a loyal and affectionate people, for the most effectual assistance and support; and his royal highness will, on his part, exert his utmost endeavours to direct the powers with which he is invested to the advancement of the prosperity, welfare, and security of his majesty's dominions.

"We are directed to inform you, that his royal highness has great satisfaction in being enabled to state, that fresh opportunities have been afforded, during the late campaign, for distinguishing the valour and skill of his majesty's forces both by sea and land.

"The capture of the islands of Bourbon and of Amboyna have still further reduced the colonial dependencies of the enemy.

"The attack upon the island of Sicily, which was announced to the world with a presumptuous anticipation of success, has been repulsed by the persevering exertions and valour of his majesty's land and sea forces.

"The judicious arrangements adopted by the officers commanding on that station, derived material support from the zeal and ardour which were manifested during this contest by the inhabitants of Sicily, and from the co-operation of the naval means which were directed by his Sicilian majesty to this object.

"In Portugal, and at Cadiz, the defence of which constituted the principal object of his majesty's exertions in the last campaign, the designs of the enemy have been hitherto frustrated.—The consummate skill, prudence, and perseverance of Lieutenant-general Lord Viscount Wellington, and the discipline and determined bravery of the officers and men under his command, have been conspicuously displayed throughout the whole of the campaign. The effect of those distinguished qualities, in inspiring confidence and energy into the troops of his majesty's allies, has been happily evinced by their general good conduct, and particularly by the brilliant part which they bore in the repulse of the enemy at Busaco. And his royal highness commands us further to state, that he trusts you will enable him to continue the most effectual assistance to the brave nations of the Peninsula, in the support of a contest which they manifest a determination to maintain with unabated perseverance; and his royal highness is persuaded, that you will feel that the best interests of the British empire must be deeply affected in the issue of this contest, on which the liberties and independence of the Spanish and Portuguese nations entirely depend.

"We have it likewise in command to acquaint you that discussions are now depending between this country and the United States of America; and that it is the earnest wish of his royal highness, that he may find himself enabled to bring these discussions to an amicable termination, consistent with the honor of his majesty's crown, and the maritime rights and interests of the united kingdom.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,—We are directed to acquaint you, that his royal highness the prince-regent has given his commands, that the estimates for the expenditure of the current year should be laid before you; and his royal highness has great satisfaction in acquainting you, that although the difficulties under which the commerce of this kingdom has laboured, have in some degree affected a part of his majesty's revenue, particularly in Ireland, yet that the revenue of Great Britain in the last year, though unaided by any new taxation, is greater than was ever known in any preceding year. And his royal highness trusts to your zeal and liberality to afford his majesty adequate supplies for the support of the great contest in which he is necessarily engaged.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—We are commanded by his royal highness to declare to you, that it is the most anxious wish of his heart, that he may be enabled to restore unimpaired into the hands of his majesty the government of his kingdom; and that his royal highness earnestly prays, that the Almighty may be pleased in his mercy to accelerate the termination of a calamity so deeply lamented by the whole nation, and so peculiarly afflicting to his royal highness himself."

In the house of lords, the Earl of Aberdeen moved an address to the regent's speech, which was unanimously carried. In the house of commons, the address, moved by Mr. Milnes, was also carried without a dissenting voice.

It was generally expected that a new administration would take place as soon as ever the regent was released from the restrictions; but to the great surprise (and, indeed, disappointment) of many, his royal highness took an early opportunity of announcing his determination to retain the present ministers in his service. The following are copies of letters which passed between the regent and the chancellor of the exchequer:—

"Carlton-house, February 4, 1811.

"The Prince of Wales considers the moment to be arrived, which calls for his decision, with respect to the persons to be employed by him in the administration of the executive government of the country, according to the powers vested in him by the bill passed by the two houses of parliament, and now on the point of receiving the sanction of the great seal.

"The prince feels it incumbent upon him, at this precise juncture, to communicate to Mr. Perceval, his intention not to remove from their stations those whom he finds there as his majesty's official servants. At the same time, the prince owes it to the truth and sincerity of character, which, he trusts, will appear in every action of his life, in whatever situation placed, explicitly to declare, that the irresistible impulse of filial duty and affection to his beloved and afflicted father, leads him to dread that any act of the regent might, in the smallest degree, have the effect of interfering with the progress of his sovereign's recovery.

"This consideration alone dictates the decision now communicated to Mr. Perceval.

"Having thus performed an act of indispensable duty, from a just sense of what is due to his own consistency and honor, the prince has only to add, that, among the many blessings to be derived from his majesty's restoration to health, and to the personal exercise of his royal functions, it will not, in the prince's estimation, be the least that that most fortunate event will at once rescue him from a situation of unexampled embarrassment, and put an end to a state of affairs ill calculated, he fears, to sustain the interests of the united kingdom, in this awful and perilous crisis, and most difficult to be reconciled to the genuine principles of the British constitution."

Downing-street, Feb. 5, 1811.

"Mr. Perceval presents his humble duty to your royal highness, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your royal highness's letter of last night, which reached him this morning.

"Mr. Perceval feels it his duty to express his humble thanks to your royal highness, for the frankness with which your royal highness has condescended explicitly to communicate the motives which have induced your royal highness to honor his colleagues and him with your commands for the continuance of their services, in the stations entrusted to them by the king. And Mr. Perceval begs leave to assure your royal highness, that in the expression of your royal highness's sentiments of filial and loyal attachment to the king, and of anxiety for the restoration of his majesty's health, Mr. Perceval can see nothing but additional motives for their most anxious exertions to give satisfaction to your royal highness, in the only manner in which it can be given, by endeavouring to promote your royal highness's views for the security and happiness of the country.

"Mr. Perceval has never failed to regret the impression of your royal highness, with regard to the provisions of the regency bill, which his majesty's servants felt it to be their duty to recommend to parliament. But he ventures to submit to your royal highness, that, whatever difficulties the present awful crisis of the country and the world may create in the administration of the executive government, your royal highness will not find them in any degree increased by the temporary suspension of the exercise of those branches of the royal prerogatives, which has been introduced by parliament, in conformity to what was intended on a former similar occasion; and that whatever ministers your royal highness might think proper to employ, would find in that full support and countenance which, as long as they were honoured with your royal highness's commands, they would feel confident they would continue to enjoy ample and sufficient means to enable your royal highness effectually to maintain the great and important interest of the united kingdom.

"And Mr. Perceval humbly trusts, that whatever doubts your royal highness may entertain with respect to the constitutional propriety of the measures which have been adopted, your royal highness will feel assured, that they could not have been recommended by his majesty's servants, nor sanctioned by parliament, but upon the sincere, though possibly erroneous conviction, that they in no degree trench upon the true principles and spirit of the constitution.

"Mr. Perceval feels it his duty to add, that he holds himself in readiness, at any moment, to wait upon your royal highness, and to receive any commands with which your royal highness may be graciously pleased to honor him."

The prince regent, as well during the debates in parliament, as in the conclusion, fully satisfied the public wishes; and, it will not be too much to add, even went beyond the public hopes. It was always indeed a part of his character to have a suitable filial affection for his father; but the administration of princes does not always follow their own peculiar character. They are too frequently the creatures of circumstance and connection. The public, therefore, though they had no distrust of the prince, possibly had a distrust and dislike of some of the persons reputed to be in his favor; they might impute to them a degree of ambition, and particular views of policy, which did not exactly square with the public voice. It must not, therefore, be concealed, that under these apprehensions, and with these prejudices, the public had kept an anxious and attentive eye upon the conduct of the prince. They expected, hoped, and feared, they knew not what; but certainly none of them expected that wise, temperate, and considerate decision, which had been announced.

The resolution of the prince not to dismiss his father's ministers,—not to change the face of affairs more than was absolutely necessary even to carry on the public business, had been taken briefly upon two views of the relative situation of his majesty and himself. As these points had an intimate connection with the then condition of Great Britain, they certainly merit a more detailed consideration.

The first of these points was, the actual situation of the king's health, and the degree of the probability of his speedy recovery. The decision of the prince was preceded by a deliberate examination of the physicians. The public papers announced this intention of his royal highness without knowing its purpose, imputing it merely to his filial anxiety. It afterwards appeared, from the event, that the examination was taken upon Sunday, and the consequent resolution nearly upon the following day. This led, therefore, to one important conclusion. The examination of the physicians convinced his royal highness that the state of his majesty was less afflictive than the opposition papers and speakers endeavoured to represent; or, in other words, that there were very reasonable hopes of his speedy recovery. In a private conference, the physicians were naturally more explicit and explanatory than in their previous parliamentary evidence. They considered themselves under a stronger obligation to speak precisely and explanatorily to a son examining them upon the real state of his father, than to parliament, putting them formally upon their oath. An oath is certainly the strongest possible security against falsehood, but it is not always the most effectual means of obtaining the truth. It produces a caution, a reserve, a timidity, which, under the apprehension of saying too much, stops short of saying enough. A better and more full notion may be generally procured from a familiar conference than from the most solemn justiciary inquiry upon oath. From some reason or other, this is more particularly the case in respect to medical evidence; and no doubt the conference of the physicians and the prince, at Carlton House, was better calculated to explain the nature of his majesty's malady, and the probability of his recovery, than their parliamentary evidence; and the resolution taken by the prince immediately after this examination, showed that the result of this examination was a conviction in the mind of his royal highness that his majesty's recovery was more near, and probable, than was generally imagined.

Another point of view, upon which the prince took his resolution to retain his father's ministers, was that he might not disturb the present system of things, and particularly the war of Portugal, in its mid progress. The war, at least the shape and form of it, belonged to these ministers. If any other set of men were called in, they must continue the same course, or alter it and commence another. If they continued the same course, and succeeded, they would have been accused of taking the reputation from their predecessors; if they failed, they would have incurred a suspicion that they had not warmly embraced measures which they were conscious were not their own. Their success would be without praise, and their failure would be put to the account of party feelings. On the other hand, if they departed from this usual policy, the departure would necessarily introduce an immense deal of confusion, and what they might have done from real principle and persuasion, would have been imputed to jealousy and counteraction. In this state of things, therefore, the prince doubtless concluded, that it would be the most prudent, as well as the most moderate conduct, to leave every thing in the state in which he found it. Under these circumstances, the ministers continued responsible for their own measures; and whatever might occur, could be imputed only to them.

Such, therefore, were the circumstances and he reasons upon which his royal highness took a resolution which at once gratified and surprized the public. 1st. He was unwilling to obtrude himself or testify any eagerness to assume the pomp and splendour belonging to his father, and therefore came forward merely to execute the duties of the crown, declining its lustre and power.

2dly. He was unwilling to enter upon a new plan of policy which he might not have time to finish; he was unwilling to interrupt the present course of things; he was unwilling, in a word, to act as owner, whilst, on account of the restrictions with which he was enthralled, he could alone consider himself in an office of trust.

Positions of the French Troops according to Lord Wellington's Official Dispatches.—Spanish Affairs.—Intercepted Letter from Joseph's Ambassador at Paris.—Coimbra evacuated by Colonel Trant.—Zeal and Activity of Lord Wellington.—Siege of Tortosa.

IN order to show the position of the French troops at the commencement of this year, the following are extracts of official dispatches from Marshal-general Lord Wellington to the Earl of Liverpool.

"Cartaxo, Jan. 5, 1811.

"My Lord,—The reinforcements to the enemy's army in this country, which were on the march in the valley of the Mondego, arrived upon the Alva at Murcella on the 24th, which river they crossed by a ford on the following day, and continued their march to join the army.

"Colonel Wilson, who had retired from Espinhal and crossed the Mondego upon hearing of the advance of these troops, lest he should be involved in an unequal contest in front and rear at the same time, repassed the Mondego on the 25th, and annoyed the enemy's rear on his march of the 25th and 26th, from the Alva towards Espinhal. He took some prisoners, and cut off some of their small detachments, which fell into the hands of the Ordenanza.

"The division which had marched to Pinhel, and the advanced-guard of which had been at Trancoso when I last addressed your lordship, was still at Pinhel on the 26th December, when I last heard from General Silveira, whose head-quarters were at Torrinha.

"I have letters from Cadiz to the 23d and 29th of December, stating that Marshal Soult had marched from the army engaged in the operations against that place, with 4,000 or 5,000 men, on the 20th and 21st of December.

"Generals Mendizabel and Ballasteros are still at Llerena and the neighbourhood of Monasterio, and Girard's division of Mortier's corps at Gualcanal.

"No material alteration has been made in the position of the enemy's army since I addressed your lordship last. The detachment which marched to Castello Branco returned immediately, and was sent either for the purpose of escorting a messenger, or to obtain intelligence. I have the honor to be, &c.

"Cartaxo, Jan. 12, 1811.

"My Lord,—Since I addressed your lordship on the 5th inst. I have learnt that the detachment of the enemy's troops which joined the army in the end of last month, consisted of eleven battalions of the 9th corps, and a body of troops, which, under the command of General Gardanne, had before attempted to penetrate through Beira Baxa. The whole are stated at 8,000 men, by some of the officers who saw them, but I should think they must be more.

"The other division of the 9th corps had not passed the frontier when I last received accounts of them; but I learn from an intercepted letter from General Drouet to General Claparede, that this division has been ordered to take a position at Guarda. Their advanced-guard broke up from the neighbourhood of Trancoso in the night of the 3d inst.

"There has been no alteration in the position of the enemy's army since I last addressed you, excepting that General Drouet's head-quarters have been fixed at Leyria with the troops which joined with him.

"The enemy continue to construct boats in the Zezere; and have shewn much jealousy of the measures adopted by our troops on the left of the Tagus, to command by their fire the communication between the Zezere and Tagus.

"I have now to inform you, that Marshal Mortier arrived at Ronquillo, with a division of the corps under his command, on the 3d instant. He has since continued to advance into Estremadura, having formed a junction with the division which had been at Guadalcanal, under the command of General Girard; and I am concerned to add, that I have just learnt that he obtained possession of Merida, and of the bridge over the Guadiana at that place, on the evening of the 8th inst. the Spanish troops having retired.

"They have left General Banastero's division on their left flank, between Xeres de los Cavalleros and Olivenza, with his communication open with Badajoz; and it is reported, that Mortier's corps is followed by other troops. I have the honour to be, &c.

It appeared evident, by the accounts which arrived from Spain, that Bonaparte meant to unite the entire peninsula to the French empire. No attention was paid to Joseph in any matter, and orders were transmitted directly to Soult, who appeared to hold a preference to Massena in the mind of Bonaparte, and to the military governors established in Spain.

But every doubt on the subject was removed by an intercepted letter published in the memorial Military Patriotic of the 25th December. It came from Azanza, Joseph's ambassador extraordinary at Paris, and was addressed to one of the ministers at Madrid. In it this courtier communicated, after many preambles, in which he discovered his previous fears and the bitterness of his heart, that he was invited to the house of Talleyrand, who observed to him that France had spent large sums and wasted many armies in the peninsula, and that she must repay herself and be compensated for sacrifices so great; that the blood of Napoleon had been ungrateful to him, and had not taken due care of his interests; that the debaucheries of Joseph, and the ignorance and caprice of his ministers, had prolonged a war which ought to have been terminated long ago; that Cabarras alone had done more mischief to the French cause than the battles of Baylen, of Talavera, &c.; and that, in short, both the peninsula and Italy should be incorporated with the French empire. Azanza submitted to him, that to change the dynasty, and to destroy the independence of Spain and the Spanish name, were very different things: that the inhabitants of the provinces beyond the Ebro had submitted to the government of Joseph without much disturbance; but, that no sooner had Bonaparte decreed the formation of military governors in those provinces, than a great insurrection broke out; that in consequence of the war of the peninsula not being terminated, the French generals had proceeded to treat the inhabitants in a cruel and despotic manner; that the best opportunities had been lost, from the plans of the campaign being ill combined and worse executed; that the insurgents had assembled the cortes, and were employed in forming an universal legislation for all parts of the monarchy; that in consequence of a novelty so pernicious, all parties would join that of the insurgents; that the latter would prefer death before slavery; that the war would become much more lasting; and that the English would not cease to assist them in such circumstances, &c. To all this, the ex-bishop of Autun replied, that he was not invited to throw doubts on a point that was already decided upon by the highest wisdom, and the most profound policy; and concluded with complimenting him on his henceforward belonging to the "great family."

On the 9th of January, Coimbra was occupied by Drouet. Colonel Trant found the enemy too strong for him, and therefore evacuated and retreated across the Vonga towards Porto.

The reinforcements received by Massena at this time were 9,000 infantry and only 300 cavalry, a large quantity of stores and a small park of artillery.

Every effort was used to reinforce Lord Wellington, while his lordship's exertions were truly laudable, as appears from the following private letter:—

"The activity and zeal displayed by Lord Wellington, is the theme of every loyal Portuguese and British soldier. His lordship takes his breakfast every morning at four o'clock, and is on horseback at five, reconnoitring his out-posts, as well as every position where his attendance may be necessary. He writes a great deal; and where secrecy is required, his lordship copies his dispatches himself. He is at all times very abstemious, and uniformly sleeps in his clothes on a couch. You will have heard that the reinforcements received by the French are a part of the 9th corps, under General Drouet, consisting of 15,000 men, with provisions, &c. Hitherto their arrival has caused no movement in our army; many, however, talk of the probability of a battle very soon. The enemy have thrown three bridges over the Zezere, in their rear, near Punhete, and are busily employed there in constructing barks, rafts, &c. which are seen by that part of our army stationed at and near Chamusca, on the other side of the river, where Marshal Beresford now is with 30,000 men; hence it is presumed that Massena, if he finds himself obliged to retreat, will attempt to cross the Tagus, and retire through Alentejo. You have before been informed, that lines were forming on the other side of that river, from Moiter to the south bank. One hundred pieces of cannon were sent over some time ago, and that position is daily made more formidable. All the galegos here are now become subject to be impressed for the army of this country, and every man capable of bearing arms (if native) is laid hold of for the same service; so that in the country we see nothing but military. The marines from the men of war now garrison this city. We have no other troops here except the Corpo de Commercio; even the caçadores (sharpshooters), consisting of very respectable inhabitants, have been marched off to the army long since, and have behaved very well in several skirmishes. In short, the greatest part of the country is in arms; and from all we see and hear, it is not too much to expect, that the issue of the present struggle will be fortunate, and glorious to the brave Portuguese troops, and add fresh laurels to the brows of our countrymen, serving in this just and meritorious cause."

The siege of Tortosa was truly to the honor of the Spanish name. The Spaniards at this time had the elements of a great people, but were depressed by a bad government. The following is an extract from the French journal of this siege, which was very voluminous.

"The engineers caused a road to be rapidly constructed over the mountains and rocks, which extend on the right bank of the Ebro, from Mequinenza to Xerta, in order that the 3d corps, charged with the siege of Tortosa, might be able to transport by land the field-artillery, the baggage, and every thing which could not come by the navigation of the Ebro.

"The general-in-chief, Count Suchet, for the purpose of completely insulating Catalonia from the rest of Spain, and of favoring the movements of the 7th corps, caused one of his divisions to advance in front of the tête-de-pont of Tortosa, with a corps upon Cenis, to observe the army of the Valencians; and constructed têtes-de-pont on the Ebro, in front of Xerta and Mora, in order to remain master of the approaches of the left bank and of the navigation of the river. We awaited in this position, till the month of December, the assembling of the troops who were to protect the siege from the enterprises of the Catalonians. During this time the corps of the army had to sustain a number of encounters with the Valencians, the Catalonians, and the garrison of Tortosa, in which the enemy, constantly beaten, lost about 4,000 men."

After detailing other preliminary operations, the journal thus described the fortress.

"Tortosa, washed by the Ebro, and with a chain of mountains at its back, is surrounded by a wall with bastions, of which one part is in the plain, and the other is raised on heights of granite, almost every where destitute of soil, about 200 feet high. The fortress has for its citadel, an old castle upon an elevated rock. When, in 1708, the French made their attack by the bastion Saint Pierre, which is on a height, they were obliged to form, almost throughout, their trenches with bags of earth, which they had brought, and they were twenty days in constructing their batteries. The Spaniards since then have strengthened this bastion with a good entrenchment, and have constructed in advance of it the fort of Orleans; they have also crowded the other heights with horned-works.

"The siege commenced on the 20th December, and the general-in-chief determined that the attack should be conducted upon the demi-bastion Saint Pierre, which rests upon the lower Ebro. But it was necessary to direct a false attack against fort Orleans, which enfiladed the lower ground. The trenches were therefore opened against this fort on the evening of the 19th. At day-break we were not completely covered with the parapets, and the balls of the enemy carried off the bags of the earth and the gabions; but the trenches were mostly maintained throughout. Captain Sea, of the engineers, a young officer of great promise, was killed by a ball which struck his head.

"In the night of the 20th, favored by its darkness and a violent wind which prevented the enemy from seeing or hearing, the labours of the trenches were conducted with such energy, that at day-break every thing was under cover. The enemy at last perceiving our works, opened a violent fire with all the artillery that could bear upon them; but this hail of bombs, chain-shot, balls, grenades, and stones thrown from mortars, did little damage, and did not drive away the workmen. The Spaniards attempted without success a sally in the plain; as they were enfiladed by the fire of the parallel of Orleans, and taken in reverse by the fire of the right bank, their sallies could not be dangerous against the parallel of Saint Pierre.

"In the night of the 21st the works were continually improved. At day-break the enemy opened a brisk fire, and caused us the loss of some men by the shells which he threw into the trenches. His artillerymen took a very good aim. On the left of the centre parallel there was thrice formed a battlement with bags of earth, for the purpose of placing a sentinel there, and thrice it was carried away with the head of the sentinel.

"In the night of the 22d, the enemy perceiving our labours by means of fire-balls which he threw into the air, kept up a constant fire from his covered-way, and overwhelmed us with a shower of chain-shot: it was necessary to remove the workmen four different times. We lost about twenty men. By day there was a brisk cannonade from the fortress: the works begun were completed.

"In the night of the 24th the firing was very violent: the enemy made sallies on almost all points, which dispersed the workmen employed in the attack of Fort Orleans. In the centre, the parallel was advanced within thirty toises of the place of arms of the bastion St. Pierre. The enemy made a sally from his tête-de-pont, which was easily repulsed. During the day the cannonade was brisk: in general, the besieged fired more than 1,000 shot in the twenty-four hours, and our daily loss is from twenty to thirty men.

"At eleven in the night of the 25th, the enemy opened a terrible fire of musketry and artillery: at the close of which he made a desperate sally against the parallel of attack on fort St. Pierre. The guard of the 44th regiment repulsed them with the bayonet, and made some prisoners. He continued his fire of chain-shot, &c. till one in the morning; when he attempted a new sally, which was also repulsed. The parallels from this time confined him too much to permit him to deploy many troops. During the day, the fire of the enemy was less vigorous than usual. The second parallels had been lined with sharpshooters placed behind battlements formed of bags of earth, who annoyed the Spanish artillerymen, and forced them to shut their embrasures.

"In the night of the 26th, it was wished to continue, by sap, the approach to the place of arms of the bastion St. Pierre. The enemy, after having thrown hand-grenades from the salient angle of his place of arms, all at once leaped over the pallasades of the covered-way, burst upon the head of the sap, and threw the workmen into confusion. The brave Clause, serjeant of the sappers, remained firm at the head of his party. He drove back above sixty Spaniards with grenades, and at the point of the bayonet, until he fell severely wounded. Captain Fourcauld, of the artillery, with his usual energy, repulsed the Spaniards to their place of arms, and soon drove them even from that. He was struck by a musket-shot. Lieutenant Lemer cier, of the engineers, whose behaviour was most gallant during the siege, had his arm broken; several sappers were wounded.

"In the day our working parties were so much annoyed by the enemy's artillery that they could not proceed. Such of the enemy as defended the covered-way, and the artillerymen through the embrasures, were equally annoyed by our sharpshooters from the second parallel.

"On the 27th, the enemy, by way of preparation for a general sally, before our batteries began to play, kept up an extraordinary fire. Captain Poussin, of the artillery, was killed by a grape shot in the forehead.

"At four in the afternoon, the enemy sallying forth by the gate del Rastro, advanced in force to take our parallels in reverse: but General Hubert, rushing at the head of the 6th light, and 116th, threw himself on the enemy at the point of the bayonet, with immense carnage. At the same time they attacked our parallels in front; they were vigorously repulsed from the height of Orleans, but on the plain they succeeded in driving us from where we had crowned the place of arms of the bastion St. Pierre; Lieutenant Jacquand, of the artillery, in vain endeavoured to drive them back, at the head of some sappers. This brave young man died by the bayonet, without quitting the lodgement he had made. Some Spaniards penetrated to the second parallel, where they were killed. The lodgement of the covered-way was immediately retaken. The Spaniards, however, had time to set fire to the gabions, and destroy some of the works. This sally cost the Spaniards 400 men.

"During the 28th all the batteries played: The demi-bastion, St. Pierre, enveloped in a girdle of fire, was crushed and silenced. The fire of the half-moon was also extinguished. The bastion of St. John had only one serviceable gun on the flank. The advanced redoubt of Orleans had still some guns in play. The battery, No. 1, was a good deal annoyed. Our batteries on the right bank, although a vigorous fire was kept up on them from the castle, the tête-de-pont, and las Tenasas, kept up their fire. Five of the boats which supported the bridge were sunk; the platform of the bridge, notwithstanding, did not separate; and it floated in such a manner as to afford a passage to a few stragglers.

"In the night of the 29th, the lodgement at the foot of the parapet of the covered-way belonging to the demi-bastion of St. Pierre was extended twenty toises. The counterscarp was crowned by a lodgement, which, commencing at the returning angle of the place of arms, was carried thirty toises beyond the traverse. Beyond the traverse the counterscarp was not lined, which shortened the siege by twenty-four hours. Advantage was taken of this defect in the fortification to immediately commence the descent and passage of the ditch, for the purpose of mining the scarp of the bastion; but the work undertaken was too much. The enemy commenced a brisk fire from two guns, and after having driven our sappers from the ditch, with grenades and shells, which they rolled down from the ramparts, they also threw some burning faggots, which were pitched and tarred; that set fire to our gabions. From that time, we restricted ourselves to a lodgement on the counterscarp, and the descent of the ditch was begun.

"At day-light, we discovered that the enemy had abandoned their tête-de-pont, after having set fire to whatever was combustible. They left us three pieces of cannon.

"On the night of the 31st, the descent of the ditch having been completed, the passage thereof was easily effected to the mine. The only obstruction to this operation was the discharge of some grenades and a few musket-shot. The miners met with a body of mason's-work harder than a rock. Their progress was consequently slow, although they were relieved every half-hour.

"The two lodgements of the covered-way were extended to the ditch of the flank of the bastion. During this operation we lost Capt. Hudry, of the engineers, an excellent officer, who was killed by a musket-ball in the head. The artillery began a breaching battery of four 24-pounders, at the left of the descent of the ditch, upon the brink of the counterscarp.

"The battery, No. 5, having effected a breach nearly practicable in the curtain, near the flank of the demi-bastion, St. Pierre, the place of arms was occupied for the purpose of taking advantage of the breach in the curtain on the day of the assault.

"The enemy appeared exceedingly alarmed at the operation of mining; at ten in the morning he hoisted the white flag, and the fire was suspended from all our batteries, but the works were continued. The conferences lasted until night without coming to an agreement as to the terms of capitulation.

"In the night of the 1st, the four-gun 24-pounder breaching-battery was ready. The miner continued his labours. Nothing new was undertaken. All the earth-work was finished, and we had only to wait the effect of the breaching-battery and the mine, and to rush to the assault.

"At day-break the breaching-battery, which was distant only ten toises from the fortification it was firing on, was rapidly sapping the bottom of the rampart. It effected two breaches, which were very practicable. The commander-in-chief issued his orders to the troops, and prepared to make the assault at two in the afternoon.

"Since the morning, three white flags were hoisted in the town and forts, but as the governor had availed himself of a similar opportunity on the preceding evening to make ridiculous proposals, our fire was not suspended in the least degree. The flags of truce were driven back into the town, and the general-in-chief required as a preliminary to receiving them, that one of the forts should be delivered up to us. At last, at one o'clock, our troops were admitted into the advanced works of the castle, and the general-in-chief immediately penetrated to the castle with some select companies. The breaches were, at the same time, taken possession of, and the garrison surrendered at discretion, at the very moment that the general-in-chief was about to give orders for the assault.

"Thus the fortress of Tortosa sustained seventeen days investment, thirteen nights of open trenches, and four days bombardment and cannonade. We had completely established ourselves at the bottom of the ditch; the mining operations had been carried on for two days, and there were three practicable breaches in the body of the place. The garrison could not have defended themselves an hour longer, without being put to the sword; they were therefore obliged to surrender at discretion.

"The garrison consisted of 9,000 men before the siege, in which they lost 1,200. The besieging army, which was 10,000 strong, only lost 300 men.

"We found in the fortress 177 pieces of artillery, and a great deal of ammunition and provisions. The enemy's artillery fired 20,000 rounds. Our besieging park consisted of 50 pieces, from which we only discharged 15,000 rounds in 13 nights. We completed a line of trenches, of the extent of 3,200 toises, in performing which we had the advantage of very fine weather, and nights without moonlight.

"The soldiers of the third corps, like the Roman soldiers, fought, and dug the earth with equal ardour. The officers of the infantry began to understand the art of war as applied to sieges. General Valec directed the artillery with a judgment and activity above all praise. The services of the engineer officers were enthusiastic. It was impossible to form a collection of better officers. Unfortunately five excellent engineer officers were killed, and several wounded.

Particulars of the Attack of the Isle of France.—Proclamation issued there in the Name of his Majesty George III.—Description of the Isle.—French Account, printed at the Isle of France.—Particulars of the Capture of Banda.

HAVING, among other captures by the British, slightly mentioned that of the Isle of France, in the third Chapter of this Book, we shall, in the present, give the particulars, which were not published in the London gazette till February 13.

A dispatch, of which the following was an extract, was at this period received by the Earl of Liverpool, from R. T. Farquhar, Esq. dated Port Louis, Isle of France, 7th of December, 1810:—

"I have the honor to inform your lordship, that on the 5th instant I assumed the government of these islands, under the sanction and authority of a commission issued by the right honourable the governor-general of India in council. The success of our naval and military operations has added a most important colony to the dominions of his majesty, and wrested from the enemy one of his most destructive means of annoying the British commerce to the eastward of the Cape of Good Hope.

"It is my intention to provide for the administration of the Isle of France and its dependencies, until his majesty's further pleasure shall be known, on the same principles as were adopted on the surrender of Bourbon; as the arrangements which I provisionally made there have met with the entire approbation of the right honorable the governor-general in council.

"I have to assure your lordship, that through the able and judicious arrangements made by the Honorable Lieutenant-general Abercromby, the transfer of the government has been effected in perfect tranquillity; and, I am happy to add, that the inhabitants have already ample reason to rejoice at a transition from a state bordering on famine and slavery, to the blessings of abundance and liberty, which are enjoyed by all those who have the happiness to live under British protection.

"I have the honor to inclose to your lordship a copy of the proclamation which I have issued, with a view to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants, until some more permanent arrangements can be effected."

Translation of the proclamation issued in the name of his majesty George the Third, king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"Whereas, his most gracious majesty the king has taken under his government the Isle of France; these are to make known to all the inhabitants of the said colony, Europeans, Creoles, planters, merchants, &c. that the regulations hitherto observed in the civil administration of justice, and of the police, will be preserved. The laws and customs, also, which are now in force, will be observed.

"The private property of the inhabitants will be strictly protected; and they are invited to bring to market as usual the various produce of their plantations and gardens. The English are come to establish a firm and perpetual friendship with the inhabitants of the Isle of France, who will have the means of disposing of their merchandize on the most favorable terms, and who will enjoy all the commercial advantages of the other subjects of his majesty. Another proclamation, hereafter to be promulgated, will explain the arrangements to be observed in the different departments of the government. It will at the same time detail the conditions and cases in which permission to trade will be granted. Every individual is directed to continue, till further orders, to fulfil his respective duty, and to obey the orders of his superiors. All public orders, and generally all public affairs, of whatever nature, will be issued and transacted in the name of his Britannic majesty. God save the king.

"Port Louis, Isle of France, Dec. 5, 1810.

"R. T. FARQUHAR, acting governor of the Isles of France, Bourbon, and their dependencies.

"By order, A. BARRY,

Chief secretary to the government.

"This proclamation shall be registered and printed."

Lieutenant Cator, acting as commander of his majesty's sloop the Otter, arrived in London, February 13, with dispatches from Vice-admiral Bertie, commander-in-chief of his majesty's ships and vessels at the Cape of Good Hope, to John Wilson Croker, esq. secretary to the Admiralty, of which the following are copies:—

"Africaine, in Port Louis, Isle of France, Dec. 6, 1810.

"Sir,—I have the honour to announce to you, for the information of their lordships, the capture of the Isle of France and its dependencies, comprehending the extirpation of the naval force of the enemy in these seas, and the subjugation of the last remaining colonial territory of France.

"By my communication addressed to you on the 12th of October last, and forwarded to England by the Otter, from Bourbon, I had the honor to acquaint you, that I was on the point of resuming the blockade of the Isle of France; I accordingly arrived off this port on the 19th, and, finding the whole of the enemy's ships in the harbour, and two only apparently in a state of forward equipment, I left Captain Rowley with the Boadicea, Nisus, and Nereide, (late La Venus, captured by Commodore Rowley) to watch the movement of the enemy; and, having previously detached the Ceylon and Staunch to convoy the division of troops from Bourbon to Rodriguez, I proceeded with the commander of the forces, (Major-general the Honorable John Abercromby) who had embarked in the Africaine, towards that anchorage. On the 24th I was joined by Rear-admiral Drury, with a division of his squadron, viz. Russell, Clorinde, Doris, Phaeton, Bucephalus, Cornelia and Hesper; and taking under my orders for the time being, the rear-admiral with the ships under his command, I was enabled to strengthen the blockading squadron, by detaching the Cornelia and Hesper for that purpose; and with the others made all sail for Rodriguez, where the squadron arrived on the 3d of November, and found lying there the division of troops from Bombay; on the 6th arrived the division from Madras, under convoy of the Psyche and Cornwallis. On the 8th Rear-admiral Drury sailed with the Russel, Phaeton, and Bucephalus, to resume his command in India; on the 12th arrived the division from Bourbon under convoy of the Ceylon.

"The divisions from Bengal and the Cape not arriving by the 20th, the season being so far advanced, and the anchorage (surrounded by reefs) by no means secure, more particularly for so large a number of ships, I determined on weighing with the whole fleet on the morning of the 22d, proposing the convoy should cruize to windward until joined by one or other of the divisions. Very fortunately intelligence was received on the night of the 21st, that the Bengal division, under convoy of the Illustrious, was in the offing. General Abercromby deemed it, as well as myself, adviseable they should not anchor; but that, having communicated with the convoy, and given them such supplies as they might essentially require, we should proceed to the attack of the Isle of France, without waiting the junction of the troops expected from the Cape. The whole fleet accordingly weighed from the anchorage, and on the morning of the 29th bore up for the point of debarkation it had been determined to occupy in Grande Baye, about twelve miles to windward of Port Louis, where the Africaine leading in, and the several ships of war following with the convoy, according to a previous arrangement, the whole fleet was at anchor by ten o'clock A. M. consisting of nearly seventy sail; and the army, with their artillery, stores, and ammunition, the several detachments of marines serving in the squadron, with a large body of seamen, disembarked the same day, without a single loss or accident; a division of ships still maintained a vigilant blockade of the port; another division remained for the protection of the convoy at the anchorage; and a third, under my immediate command, shifted their stations as circumstances required, to keep up a more effectual communication with the army as it advanced, and which was dependent for its supplies of provisions and stores wholly on the resources of the navy.

"On the 2d instant, the governor-general, De Caen, proposed terms of capitulation, and, commissioners being appointed on either side, a capitulation was signed and ratified on the morning of the 3d instant, at the British head-quarters.

"In a combined operation of this nature, the ultimate success of which must essentially, in a great degree, be made to depend upon a zealous and emulative co-operation and support through each gradation; and, in the present instance, where these features have been so eminently conspicuous in every rank, and in every situation and circumstance, the recommendation of particular individuals to their lordships' more immediate notice may be deemed superfluous.

"It is, however, from a sense of justice that I record the services of Captain Beaver, of his majesty's ship Nisus, whom I entrusted with the superintendence of the whole arrangements for the disposition and debarkation of the army, and whose abilities and experience on similar occasions particularly qualified him to undertake this important duty. Nor should I omit to bear testimony to the unwearied exertions of Captain Patterson, of his majesty's ship Hesper, and of Lieutenant B. Street, commanding the government armed-ship Emma, who were employed for many successive nights in sounding, and (as it has been proved) gained a perfect knowledge of the anchorage on the enemy's coast, and who were equally strenuous in their services in various ways on shore.

"I beg also to recommend to their lordships' notice, Lieutenant Edward Lloyd, who volunteered his services, under the immediate eye of the commander of the forces, and in this, as well as many former instances, has received the most honorable testimonies of his gallantry.

"From the absence of some of the ships, I have not been able to collect the returns of the number of marines and seamen landed, or of the loss, but I have the satisfaction to know it has been very inconsiderable.

"Various considerations have impelled me to dispatch the Menelaus with the least delay possible; and having entrusted these communications to the care of Captain Rowley, who will be the bearer of them to their lordships, I beg to refer their lordships to him for every further particular, and to add, that his long and arduous services on this station have established a just claim to any honorable distinction it may please their lordships or the country to bestow on him.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) "A. BERTIE."

Such were the naval details of this capture: the military operations were thus communicated by the honorable Major-general Abercromby, to the Earl of Liverpool:—

"I have the honor to inform your lordship, that the Isle of France surrendered, by capitulation, on the 3d inst. to the united force under the command of Vice-admiral Bertie and myself.

"I must refer your lordship for the particulars of the operations which led to this fortunate event to the copy of my official letter to the right ho-

BOOK IX. norable the governor-general, which, together CHAP. VI. with other documents, I have now the honor to transmit to your lordship.

"In conformity with the instructions which I had the honor to receive from Lord Minto, I have placed Mr. Farquhar in charge of the government; and I confidently trust, that, in having adopted this measure, I shall not incur the displeasure of his majesty's government.

"This dispatch will be delivered to your lordship by Captain Hewitt, my aide-de-camp; and I believe your lordship will find him perfectly qualified to afford you every information which you may require, in respect to the late operations of this force."

To the Right. Hon. Gilbert Lord Minto, &c.

"My lord,—I had the honor to inform your lordship, in my dispatch of the 21st ult. that although the divisions from Bengal and the Cape of Good Hope had not arrived at the rendezvous, it had been determined that the fleet should proceed to sea on the following morning, as from the advanced season of the year, and the threatening appearance of the weather, the ships could no longer be considered secure in their anchorage at Rodriguez; and I did myself the honor to state to your lordship, the measures which it was my intention to pursue, even if we should still be disappointed in not being joined by so large a part of the armament.

"Early on the morning of the 22d, Vice-admiral Bertie received a communication from Captain Broughton, of his majesty's ship Illustrious, announcing his arrival off the island with the convoy from Bengal. The fleet weighed at daylight, as had been originally arranged, and in the course of that day a junction having been formed with this division, the fleet bore up for the Isle of France.

"The greatest obstacles opposed to an attack on this island, with a considerable force, have invariably been considered to depend on the difficulty of effecting a landing, from the reefs which surround every part of the coast, and the supposed impossibility of being enabled to find anchorage for a fleet of transports.

"These difficulties were fortunately removed by the indefatigable exertions of Commodore Rowley, assisted by Lieutenant Street, of the Staunch gun-brig, Lieutenant Blackiston, of the Madras engineers, and the masters of his majesty's ships Africaine and Boadicea. Every part of the leeward side of the island was minutely examined and sounded, and it was discovered that a fleet might anchor in the narrow passage formed by the small island of the Gunners' Coin and the main land; and that at this spot there were openings through the reef, which would admit several boats to enter abreast. These obvious advantages fixed my determination, although I regretted that circumstances would not allow of the disembarkation being effected at a shorter distance from Port Louis.

"Owing to light and baffling winds, the fleet did not arrive in sight of the island until the 28th; and it was the morning of the following day, before any of the ships came to an anchor.

"Every arrangement for the disembarkation having been previously made, the first division, consisting of the reserve, the grenadier company of the 59th regiment, with two six-pounders and two howitzers, under the command of Major-general Warde, effected a landing in the bay of Mapon, without the smallest opposition, the enemy having retired from Fort Mariastri, situated at the head of Grand Bay, and the nearest port to us which they occupied.

"As soon as a sufficient part of the European force had been formed, it became necessary to move forward, as the first five miles of the road lay through a very thick wood, which made it an object of the utmost importance not to give the enemy time to occupy it.

"Lieutenant-colonel Smyth having been left with his brigade to cover the landing-place, with orders to follow next morning, the column marched about four o'clock, and succeeded in gaining the more open country, without any efforts having been made by the enemy to retard our progress; a few shot only having been fired, by a small piquet, by which Lieutenant-colonel Keating, Lieutenant Ash, of his majesty's 12th regiment, and a few men of the advanced-guard, were wounded. Having halted for a few hours during the night, the army again moved forward before day-light, with the intention of not halting till arrived before Port Louis; but the troops having become extremely exhausted, not only from the exertion which they had already made, but from having been almost totally deprived of water, of which this part of the country is destitute, I was compelled to take up a position at Moulin à Poudre, about five miles short of the town.

"Early the next morning, Lieutenant-colonel McLeod, with his brigade, was detached to seize the batteries at Tombeau and Tortue, and open a communication with the fleet; as it had been previously arranged that we were to draw our supplies from those two points.

"The main body of the army, soon after it had moved off its ground, was attacked by a corps of the enemy, which, with several field-pieces, had taken a strong position, very favorable for attempting to make an impression on the head of the column, as it showed itself at the end of a narrow road, with a thick wood on each flank. The European flank battalions, which formed the advanced-guard, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, of the 33d regiment, and under the general direction of General Warde, formed with as much regularity as the bad and broken ground would admit of, charged the enemy with the greatest spirit, and compelled him to retire with the loss of his guns, and many killed and wounded. This advantage was gained by the fall of Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, a most excellent and valuable officer, as well as Major O'Keefe, of the 12th regiment, whom I have also every reason sincerely to regret.

"In the course of the forenoon the army occupied a position in front of the enemy's lines, just beyond the range of cannon-shot. On the following morning, while I was employed in making arrangements for detaching a corps to the southern side of the town, and placing myself in a situation to make a general attack, General de Caen proposed to capitulate. Many of the articles appeared to Vice-admiral Bertie and myself to be perfectly inadmissible; but the French governor having, in the course of the same day, acceded to our terms, a capitulation for the surrender of this colony and its dependencies was finally concluded.

"Your lordship will perceive, that the capitulation is in strict conformity with the spirit of your instructions, with a single exception, that the garrison is not to be made prisoners of war.

"Although the determined courage and high state of discipline of the army, which your lordship has done me the honor to place under my command, could leave not the smallest doubt in my mind in respect to the issue of an attack upon the town, I was nevertheless prevailed upon to acquiesce in this indulgence being granted to the enemy, from the desire of sparing the lives of many brave officers and soldiers, out of regard to the interests of the inhabitants of this island, having long laboured under the most degrading misery and oppression, (and knowing confidentially your lordship's further views in regard to this army), added to the late period of the season, when every hour became valuable; I considered these to be motives of much more national importance, than any injury that could arise from a small body of troops, at so remote a distance from Europe, being permitted to return to their own country, free from any engagement. In every other particular, we have gained all which could have been acquired, if the town had been carried by assault.

"During the course of this short service, the enemy has not afforded an opportunity to the army in general for displaying the ardent zeal and animated courage with which every individual is inspired; but it is nevertheless my duty to represent to your lordship, in the strongest terms, the merits of every corps under my command. The officers and men (European as well as native) have cheerfully and patiently submitted to the greatest fatigues and privations. During the advance of the army, the troops were unable, for the space of twenty-four hours, to procure a sufficient supply of water; but this trying circumstance did not produce a single murmur, or the smallest mark of discontent or disapprobation.

"I felt myself particularly indebted to Lieut.-colonels Picton, Gibbs, Kelso, Keating, M'Leod, and Smyth, who commanded the different brigades, as well as to Major Taynton, the senior officer of the artillery, of whose services I was deprived by a wound which he received on the day the army occupied a position before this town.

"Although I have every reason to be satisfied with the zeal of the heads of departments, I feel it a particular duty incumbent upon me to express, in the most pointed manner, the obligations which I owe to Dr. Harris, the superintending-surgeon, and to the medical staff in general, for their unremitting attention, in discharge of the important duty reposed in them.

"I have received every assistance from Lieutenant Gregory, my military secretary, and the whole of my personal staff.

"To Major Caldwell, of the Madras engineers, and who accompanied me from India, I am indebted for the most able and assiduous exertions. Since his arrival amongst these islands he has been indefatigable in procuring the necessary information, in respect to the defence of this colony, and through his means I was put in possession of an accurate plan of the town, some time previous to the disembarkation of the army; and I trust your lordship will permit me to recommend to your lordship's protection this valuable and experienced officer.

"It is not in my power to do justice to the merits of Major-general Warde; I have on every occasion received from him the most cordial co-operation and assistance; and during the short operations of the army, he was constantly at the head of the column directing the advanced-guard, and animating the soldiers by his personal example.

"The most perfect harmony and cordiality have subsisted between the navy and army; and I have received every assistance from Vice-admiral Bertie, and the squadron under his command.

"The arrangements connected with the disembarkation were conducted in the most able and judicious manner by Captain Beaver, of his majesty's frigate Nisus; and during the subsequent operations of the army, I am indebted to him for his unremitting attention and assiduous exertions in landing the necessary stores and provisions.

"To Captain Briggs, of his majesty's ship Clorinde, and to Captain Lye, of the Doris, who were employed under the orders of Captain Beaver, my most grateful acknowledgments are due for the services they performed, as well as to the officers and seamen under their command.

"A body of seamen was landed from the fleet, under the command of Captain Montague; the exertions which were used to bring forward the guns through a most difficult country were such as to attract the admiration of the whole army, and fully entitle Captain Montague, Lieutenant Lloyd, of the Africaine, and every officer and sailor, to the encomiums I can pass on their conduct.

"The battalion of marines, under the command of Captain Liardet, supported the reputation of this distinguished corps.

"This dispatch will be delivered to your lordship by my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant M'Murdo, of the Bombay establishment, who will afford your lordship any further information you may require respecting the late operations of the army. I have &c.

(Signed) "J. ABERCROMBY, Major-gen."

The Isle of France, according to the admeasurement of the Abbé de la Caille, is not more than thirty-one leagues in circumference, about eleven in length, and seven in breadth, having a surface which measures 432,680 acres. It is described as extremely healthy, fertile, and abounding with the most romantic scenery.

The population of the contiguous isles of France and Bourbon is said to have been 121,000 in the year 1799, of whom a great proportion were negro slaves; and the military force consisted of 5,000 men. Raynal stated, that in the year 1765, the population of the Isle of France was as follows:—1,469 white people, besides the troops; 1,587 Indians or free negroes; and 11,881 slaves. Since that period the population might have increased very considerably.

The principal harbour of the island is Port Louis, which is situated in 20. 10. south lat. and 55: long. east from Paris. The tides are not very perceptible, those of the equinox rising not more than three feet. The soil of the island is very diversified. Although by its climate it is adapted for all colonial productions, it did not equally answer all the different kinds of cultivation which the inhabitants endeavoured to naturalize. The plantations of coffee were the first adopted; but other objects of cultivation, such as cotton, having appeared more profitable, coffee did not become so general as it would otherwise have been. The natives pretend that their coffee is superior to that of Moka. The cotton, in its turn, was neglected, because the cultivation of indigo became more popular. Several sugar plantations had succeeded. One of their governors, a M. Poivre, formerly found means to introduce plants of the nutmeg, cloves, &c. from the Dutch spice islands. This experiment, however, did not prove successful; for Raynal declared, that most of the plants died, and the rest were not likely to bear fruit.

The principal advantage which the French derived from the island was, that it served as a point from which British commerce might be successfully annoyed in the Indian seas. The fatal experience of the East India Company, and of the private traders on the coasts of Coromandel and Malabar, proved that nothing could be better adapted for attaining that object. It served as the place of rendezvous for French frigates, where they could be refitted, and where they might retire with their plunder. It was a depôt of captured produce, and in this view was resorted to by American traders, who brought that produce to Europe which the French were unable to convey in their own merchantmen. The destruction of such a nest of marauders was the principal advantage that could be derived from the conquest. In the hands of the English, it was a station of some importance.

The Abbé Raynal gave the following view of the political and commercial advantages of this important island:—

"The Isle of France must always be allowed to be one of the most valuable possessions for any nation desirous of trading to Asia. It is situated in the African seas, just at the entrance of the Indian ocean. As it lies a little out of the common track, its expeditions can be carried on with greater secrecy. Those who wish it was nearer our continent, do not consider that if it were so, it would be impossible to reach the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel in a month's time, and the most distant gulphs in two months at most, which is an inestimable advantage to a nation who, like the French, have no sea-port in India. This island, though in the same latitude as the barren and scorching coasts of Africa, is temperate and healthy. The soil is stony, but tolerably fertile. Experience has shewn that it will produce most of the necessaries, and even of the luxuries, of life. Whatever it may want, may be supplied from Madagascar and from Bourbon, where the inhabitants have retained their simplicity of manners, and a taste for husbandry.

"Great Britain sees with a jealous eye her rivals possessed of a settlement which may prove the ruin of her flourishing trade with Asia. At the breaking out of a war, her utmost efforts will certainly be aimed at a colony that threatens her richest treasures. What a misfortune for France, should she suffer herself to be deprived of it!"

A French account, printed at the Isle of France, of the capture or destruction of some English frigates at the Isle de la Passe, spoke of that temporary triumph of the French marine in a very vaunting style, and represented the patriotic ardour of the colonists in a light which the event by no means justified. A few extracts will shew the short-lived exultation of the French on the occasion:—

“The Isle of France alone, amid the numerous colonies of England, closely blockaded for several years by a maritime force far superior to its own, deprived of the greater part of the succours which the mother-country had endeavoured to send out, provoked by insolent proclamations thrown profusely on its coasts, read with disdain the promises of the enemy, smiled with indignation at his threats, and replied only by cries of victory. Inhabitants, merchants, artisans, all forgot their peaceful occupations, all took up arms, and demanded, with loud cries, to be led where danger called them. General DECAEN, satisfied with their zeal, had only to moderate their impetuous ardour.

“The Isle of Bonaparte (Bourbon) was taken; but this success of the enemy, far from dismaying the colony of the Isle of France, appeared to inspire it with new energy. In all quarters of the island numerous corps of colonial light troops were formed, strong batteries were erected on the most important points, and a formidable line of defence announced to the enemy the resistance he would have to surmount should he dare to attack.”

The account then described the capture of the Isle de la Passe, at the entrance of Port Imperial, and the terrible battle which took place between the English frigates and those of the French in the interior of that harbour, and which ended in the capture or destruction of four of the former: and concluded with the following reflections on the result of the engagement:

“The immense advantages which result from this exploit, superior to any which have honored the French marine for a long time, it is easy to appreciate. The enemy, disconcerted in his plans, has now only two frigates around our isle, which every where fly before our victorious ships; the transports which are sent him from India and the Cape fall straight into the hands of our cruizers; three of them have been already captured, and three corvettes or advice-boats have met the same fate. Two thousand prisoners are crowded in the depôts of the colony, and will themselves carry to the Cape, to India, and even to England, the recital of their disasters. One general, and more than fifty officers of all ranks, have been diverted from their destination, and are at the disposal of the captain-general, with six naval captains, and a multitude of officers in the same line. Thus, he who wished to terrify or seduce us, fears in his turn lest our frigates, appearing off his isle, should awake in the hearts of its brave inhabitants the love of their sovereign, and that of their country. He is afraid, lest they should follow the example which is offered to them by the colonists of the Isle of France: the Isle of Bourbon is peopled by brave men, whose valour has humbled more than once the English flag in India, and only awaits, to be re-animated, the reinforcements of every kind which are promised by the great Napoleon.

“The success which we have just gained is a sure guarantee of the efforts which the Emperor of the French will make to assist us. Then shall we be in a condition, not only to defend ourselves with vigour, but also to drive the enemy from the isle which he has taken by surprize; and to pursue him amidst his possessions in India, almost every where without defence, against the attacks of our heroes.”

The capture of the Isle of Banda was one of those dauntless coups de main, for which British seamen are so much distinguished. It is remarkable that not a single life was lost in this enterprise, though the enemy had about 1,000 to 180. The following are the particulars of this extraordinary capture, as related by the Lieutenant of the Baracouta:

“The Caroline, Piedmontaise, and Baracouta, arrived off Banda on the 8th of August, and hove-to, at a considerable distance from the land, to avoid being seen; a hope which was frustrated by some fishing-boats. At ten at night, being four miles from the harbour, the boats were hoisted out, and assembled alongside the Caroline, containing 390 men.

“At twelve the boats shoved off, under the command of Captain Cole, the weather being then tolerably fine: it soon, however, became dark and squally, attended with a boisterous sea, which occasioned the separation of the boats; and on arriving at the appointed rendezvous, Captain Cole found the original force diminished to 180 men. After remaining until three o’clock, in hopes of being joined by the missing boats, it became necessary to push on for Banda Neira, still three miles off, or return to our ships, mortified and disappointed.

“Captain Cole fortunately determined to go on, and on approaching the shore, we found, by several alarm-guns being fired, that the enemy were expecting us. The badness of the weather, which had before acted against us, now became our protection, for the boats grounded undiscovered in a heavy squall of wind and rain within 100 yards of a battery of ten 24-pounders, which was stormed in the rear; the sentinel was killed by a pike, and sixty men were disarmed without firing a pistol.

“After leaving a guard in the battery, the storming party, headed by Captain Kench, and the reserve by Captain Cole, proceeded to Fort Belgica, by a narrow path on the skirts of the town. The bugle was then sounding the alarm of our landing. The enemy in Belgica reserved their fire until we got close to the walls. The scaling-ladders were then placed between the guns, and mounted with a rapidity exceeding all belief, notwithstanding a very smart fire from the citadel and the surrounding bushes, both very ill-directed.

"After gaining possession of the lower works, the ladders were hauled up and placed against the inner wall; the interval occasioned by this seemed to give the enemy fresh courage; but when they saw the ladders firmly fixed, they seemed panic-struck, and fled in all directions, leaving the colonel-commandant and ten men killed, and two captains and thirty men prisoners.

"The guns near which the ladders were placed fortunately burnt priming, owing to the heavy rains, and thus we found ourselves in possession of this strong citadel, without the loss of a single man, just in time for the sun to rise on the British flag, and to shew us our commanding situation; having Fort Nassau and the town immediately under our guns. A flag of truce was dispatched to the governor, offering protection to private property on the surrender of the island, which was refused; however, a shot from Belgica, and a threat of storming the town and forts, produced an immediate and unconditional surrender, and 700 disciplined troops and 300 militia grounded their arms to us.

"Captain Cole's feelings at this moment must have been, in unison with his followers, proudly grateful. The enemy had notice of the squadron's approach at six o'clock in the afternoon, and dispatched a great part of their force to the place where Admiral Rainier landed; an event which Captain Cole had foreseen.

"The enemy, taking advantage of the flag of truce which he had flying in Belgica, opened a fire on the shipping just entering the harbour, but a few shot from that commanding fort drove them from their guns. Fortunately the nature of the attack required no firing from the assailants, as the boats grounded at some distance from the shore, and the men had to wade up to the middle in water. The enemy were drawn up at their guns, with lighted matches.

"Banda Neira and its dependencies export 900,000*l.* worth of spices annually to Batavia; we found about 400,000*l.* worth of spices at the time of the capture.

"The Piedmontaise remains at Banda, in charge of the island, until the Indian government send to garrison it. We are now on our way to Admiral Drury, with dispatches; and the Caroline is making arrangements to supply provisions from the neighbouring islands.

General Silveira's Success.—Battle of Castellegos.—Surrender of the Fortress of Olivenza to the French.—Action at Badajoz.—Patriotism of Arragon and La Mancha.—Oppressions and Depredations of the Enemy.—A Division of the French defeated at Catalonia.—Siege of Pardalleiros.—Capture of Badajoz by the Enemy.—Important Victory of Barrosa by General Graham.

At the commencement of the year, General Silveira's head-quarters were at Pezo da Ragon. For nineteen days they had found means to retard the progress of an enemy's division three times stronger than their own, from Pihel to Lamego. After always keeping the enemy within view, and having fought three several actions uniformly with success, General Silveira retired to the right bank of the Douro; on the 13th evacuating Lamego, at the time when the enemy were entering the town. The general made good his retreat without the loss of a man or of any baggage, bringing off 140 sick soldiers, who were found in the hospital at Lamego, four pieces of artillery, and thirty-five cart-loads of ammunition. Being without the means of transport, the sick and the ammunition were carried on the backs of the soldiers. On the 14th the enemy came down to the Douro in great force, but they soon retired. The 15th they spent in robbing the vicinity.

At this time General Ballasteros's head-quarters were at Sanliviarde Guardana. The Spaniards under this general had been defeated at Castellegos; but they conducted themselves not only with valor, but with military skill as appears from General Ballasteros's dispatch to the general-in-chief:

Excellent Sir,—On the morning of the 25th inst. the enemy presented themselves by the road of San Bartolome, in number 7,000 infantry and 700 horse, with ten pieces of artillery, commanded by Count Gazen. I immediately took up a position on the heights of Castellejos, and formed my first line-of-battle, composed of the vanguard, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel D. Ramon Albuquerque, the Sena regiment of infantry, under the orders of Don J. Butler, and that of Pravia, directed by Don F. Mondas. The reserve, in battalions en masse, consisting of the provincial regiments of Leon, Congas de Teneo, Castropol, and Infusto, detaching upon the flanks and front three companies of sharpshooters. The cavalry, composed of the provisional regiments of Santiago and Usares, were situated upon the right of the reserve, and in this form waited the attack. The enemy soon commenced it upon the left and centre of the lines, and the battle was desperately fought by both parties. The ground had been disputed three hours, when I perceived the fire of my first line slackened, and that it was necessary to detach two strong columns to its support, which arrived opportunely to refresh the troops who had so long contended. The enemy, in consequence of this operation, moved forward their reserve, and the fire became more brisk and better maintained; but, as his forces were triple to mine, and his artillery well-directed, without our having any to answer it, I was obliged to abandon my positions, and draw back the troops to the reserve that had advanced. Here again the battle was renewed, when the enemy suffered the greatest loss by the firmness and serenity with which our valiant troops received them. Finding nothing more remained to be done, that the line had been five hours exposed to the fire without a single soldier moving, and that night was approaching, I disposed my retreat in regiments, by eschellons, without the enemy daring to advance a single step, so great was the loss they had sustained. Whilst the infantry were covering themselves with glory, by acting in the manner just stated, the cavalry manœuvred with the enemy, and repeatedly charged them, following my instructions, and protecting my right flank during the action and in the retreat. In a word, the battle of Castellejos has immortalized the names of these valiant defenders of their country. The loss of the enemy is not less than from 1,500 to 2,000, killed, wounded, and prisoners, and my soldiers have presented me with more than twenty horses, taken in the action. All the chiefs, officers, and soldiers, have so nobly performed their duties, that I would be deficient both in honor and duty, if I did not recommend them to your majesty, as meriting the rewards which the country has destined to those who so repeatedly and gloriously defend it.

(Signed) F. BALLASTEROS.

Sanliviarde Guardana, Jan. 27, 1811.

On the 22d of January, the fortress of Olivenza surrendered to the enemy, and on the same day the garrison marched out—an event rather surprising, as, according to the statement of the commander-in-chief, neither provisions nor ammunition were wanting to enable it to hold out till the arrival of divisions from Portugal; and only a few hours before, the governor had written in the most animated terms.

On the 23d, it was known that some troops of the enemy were marching by Truxillo, and afterwards that they had arrived at Merida, in number about 3,000 men. On the 24th some small detachments of the enemy approached Badajoz, but they were put to flight by the sharpshooters of Islo. The next day some columns of both foot and horse shewed themselves, with some cannon. The fire of the guerillas continued the whole day, and till the night was well advanced; some balls passed over the top of the wall. The Spaniards had several wounded, and four or five killed. The loss of the enemy was considerable.

On the 27th the 1st division of the 4th army cantoned in Algeiras, and its environs, put itself in motion. The vanguard, under the command of Don Juan de la Cruz de Mouigeon, attacked, in the morning of the 29th, the French corps of Medina Sidonia, consisting of 800 infantry, 150 cavalry, and three pieces of artillery, who defended the town with obstinacy; but after two hours fighting were dislodged, and leaving the streets full of dead bodies and wounded, retreated to post themselves in the road to Chiclana. In the mean time the Guerilla party of Don Antonio Garcia Veas, destined to cover the Spanish right flank, took possession of Paterna. The volunteer squadron of Ubrique, under its commander Don Gregorio Fernandez, attacked Areas; and the reserve of the division commanded by the marquis manœuvred opportunely to support the operations of the vanguard. When the enemy took his position in the road to Chiclana, the commander-general of the division, Don Francisco Begines de los Rios, gave orders to suspend the pursuit, and placed in front Guerillas, who kept up a firing till night approached. He then, in conformity to his instructions, ordered a retreat, which the darkness, the heavy rain, and the presence of the enemy, rendered difficult and laborious. More than 100 French, killed and wounded, with a number of officers, thirty prisoners,

During the siege of Cadiz, the patriots of Arragon compelled the French to evacuate Benararre.

The extortions committed in the quarters of Catalayud and Alcanaz, the reducing of the town of Beceyte, and the demands of Suchet, strengthened more and more the aversion of the Aragonese towards their oppressors. The love of freedom continued to do wonders in Navarre and Rioja. Fresh advantages were obtained by the celebrated Epöz. In old Castile, the two partizans, Merion and Tapia, were incessantly harassing the enemy; and the provincial junta of Burgos were indefatigable in their endeavours to foment the valour and patriotism of the Castilians. The resolution of the inhabitants in the province of Soria was daily strengthened by the atrocities committed by their enemies: all the youth eagerly enlisted to augment the defenders of the just cause.

The French had set fire to Molina, Villed Cifuentes, and Trillo, but these conflagrations served only to augment the constancy of the natives, and their detestation for the French yoke. After some partial actions at Cagalludo, Alienza, and Jaduque, the lieutenants of the Empecinado fought against the French in Villanego and Valdaraceta on the 22d of January, and on the bridge of Itirnon on the 3d of February, and did considerable damage to the enemy.

Since the loss of Tortosa, the French shewed no wish to penetrate into the kingdom of Valencia, for the defence of which the most energetic measures were taken. The general quarters of the Valencian army were at Murviedro.

The patriotic parties of La Mancha continued as active as ever against the enemy, and the latter pursued his system of destruction and plunder with unabated vigour.

An important advantage was obtained over a division of the French army in Catalonia. Marshal Macdonald had put his army in motion for the purpose of attacking the Marquis Campo-Verde, preparatory to laying siege to Tarragona. An engagement took place Jan. 25, and the following was the dispatch from his excellency the commander-in-chief to the junta of Catalonia.

"To the Marquis of Campo-Verde.

"It is now five in the afternoon, and yet our troops have not ceased to pursue the enemy. The whole Italian division, composed of the 1st and 2d light infantry regiments, the 4th and 6th of the line, and a battalion of the 5th, with the 24th regiment of dragoons and a company of dismounted volites, have been beaten and completely destroyed. The action has been bloody, but it has been so favorable on our side, that it has left me nothing to desire.

"The enemy's division, under the command of Generals Fontana, Palombini, and Eugeni, marched from Valls this morning at nine, in the direction of this point, in order to attack me. On the first advices I marched to meet them with my small division, and in the plain between Valls and Pla the battle commenced. The divisions fought in line for three hours, till the enemy, being reinforced, marched 4,000 men towards the town of Figuerola, with design to attack our right flank. On perceiving this movement, I ordered the regiments of Ultonia, of Ferdinand VII. and the light battalion of Valencia to attack them in the town, which they executed, dislodging the enemy, and pursuing him to the immediate vicinity of Valls. The cavalry charged by the high-road which leads to the above town, and though the enemy's horse were 500 strong, it was impossible for them to resist: part of them fled with precipitation, and the rest were cut to pieces on the field.

"Leisure and a more convenient opportunity are wanting to particularise the valour and enthusiasm with which our troops fought. He only who was present in the action can form an idea of the intrepidity with which the royal hussars of Granada and the royal hussars of Valencia charged the enemy: the victory was decided by the valour of these two corps, led on by their brave chiefs, Colonel D. Ambrosio Foraster, and Lieutenant-colonel D. Eugenio Maria Yebra. The corps of infantry, which formed the column of attack, are not less worthy of commemoration; they behaved to my full satisfaction, as well as the light battalion of Tarragona, which manœuvred with the greatest steadiness, under the orders of its distinguished commander, Lieutenant-colonel O'Ryan.

"The loss of the enemy is not less than 600 men, without reckoning the prisoners, who are still bringing in; a great many horses, muskets, knapsacks, &c. have been collected.

"On our side, we have sustained such loss as might be looked for on similar occasions. I have not received returns from the different corps, but I calculate that our loss does not exceed 150 in killed and wounded. Our army will pass the night in Pla, and before morning measures shall be taken to attack the enemy, in pursuance of the directions which your excellency has given me. God preserve your excellency, &c.

"Field of battle, PEDRO SANSFIELD."

Jan. 15. 1811.

The retreat was effected in the best order, without the loss of a single man. The enemy displayed no military talents, or, being far superior in numbers, they might have prevented any one from retreating.

Badajoz still continued the scene of warfare. On the 6th of February, the Portuguese cavalry having been unsupported in their passage of the Evora, were obliged to retire across the Evora, in which operation they sustained some loss. The whole of the cavalry and infantry were then drawn into the fort of Badajoz; and on the 7th, they made a sortie upon the enemy, in which they succeeded in obtaining possession of one of the enemy's batteries, but they were obliged to retire again, and, unfortunately, the guns in the battery were not spiked, or otherwise destroyed or injured. Their loss was about eighty-five officers and 500 soldiers killed and wounded, including the Brigadier-general Don Carlos D'Espagne among the latter. The Spanish troops behaved remarkably well upon this occasion.

While the troops were in Badajoz, the French cavalry again crossed the Evora, and interrupted the communication between that place and Elvas, and Campo Major. They came out of Badajoz, however, on the morning of the 9th, and the French cavalry were obliged to retire across the Evora. The troops afterwards took up a position on the heights between the Caya, the Evora, and the Guadiana, by which they kept open the communication between Badajoz and the country on the right of the latter river.

The enemy continued the siege; and, on the night of the 11th, they attacked the redoubt of Pardalleirus, which they carried; but they had not, on the 13th, been able to establish themselves within the redoubt, on account of the fire from the body of the place. They constructed a work on the left bank of the Guadiana, below the place, to fire upon the bridge of communication with the right bank, but the fire of this work had but little effect. They made no progress in the operations of the siege; but their position on the right of the Guadiana gave them great advantages.

On the 19th the French attacked General Mendizabel in the position which he had taken on the heights of St. Christoval, near Badajoz, and totally defeated him. The enemy had to cross the Guadiana and the Evora, but surprised the Spanish army in their camp, which was standing, and was taken, with baggage and artillery.

At length the Spanish corps (late Romana's) under the command of General Carrera, received an overthrow at Badajoz. They were about 7,000 strong, and General Madden had a strong corps of Portuguese cavalry. The Spaniards had posted themselves on the north of the Guadiana, near fort Christoval, between the Abaraquena and the road to Campo Major. Soult was besieging Badajoz on the south side: he threw a bridge over the Guadiana on the left of Ba-dajoz, and having crossed the Abaraquena, without opposition, destroyed the Spaniards in their camp. Carrera and Mendizabel escaped; General Vara, and another general, nephew to Godoy, were taken.

An important victory, however, was obtained soon after over the French by General Graham. In February the general landed, with about 4,500 men, at Algesiras, and having marched for Tariffa, arrived there on the 26th.

The dispatch of General Graham to the Earl of Liverpool, relative to this glorious victory, is so clear and circumstantial as to preclude the necessity of any other account:

Isla de I zon, March 6, 1811.

"My Lord,—Captain Hope, my first aid-de-camp, will have the honor of delivering this dispatch, to inform your lordship of the glorious issue of an action fought yesterday by the division under my command, against the army commanded by Marshal Victor, composed of the two divisions Rufin and Laval.

"The circumstances were such as compelled me to attack this very superior force. In order as well to explain to your lordship the circumstances of peculiar disadvantage under which the action was begun, as to justify myself from the imputation of rashness in the attempt, I must state to your lordship, that the allied army, after a night-march of sixteen hours from the camp near Veger, arrived in the morning of the 5th on the low ridge of Barrosa, about four miles to the southward of the mouth of the Santi Petri river. This height extends inland about a mile and a half, continuing on the north the extensive heathy plain of Chiclana. A great pine-forest skirts the plain, and circles round the height at some distance, terminating down to Santi Petri; the intermediate space between the north side of the height and the forest being uneven and broken.

"A well-conducted and successful attack on the rear of the enemy's lines near Santi Petri, by the van-guard of the Spanish army, under Brigadier-general Ladrizabel, having opened the communication with the Isla de Leon, I received General la Pena's directions to move down from the position of Barrosa to that of the Torre de Bermesa, about half way to the Santi Petri river, in order to secure the communication across the river, over which a bridge had been lately established. This latter position occupies a narrow woody ridge, the right on the sea-cliff, the left falling down to the Almanza creek, on the edge of the marsh. A hard sandy beach gives an easy communication between the western points of these two positions.

"My division being halted on the eastern slope of the Barrosa height, was marched about 12 o'clock through the wood towards the Ber-mesa, (cavalry patrols having previously been sent towards Chiclana, without meeting with the enemy). On the march I received notice that the enemy had appeared in force on the plain, and was advancing towards the heights of Barrosa.

"As I considered that position as the key of that of Santi Petri, I immediately counter-marched, in order to support the troops left for its defence; and the alacrity with which this manœuvre was executed served as a favorable omen. It was however impossible, in such intricate and difficult ground, to preserve order in the columns, and there never was time to restore it entirely.

"But before we could get ourselves quite disentangled from the wood, the troops on the Barrosa hill were seen returning from it, while the enemy's left wing was rapidly ascending. At the same time his right wing stood on the plain, on the edge of the wood, within cannon-shot. A retreat in the face of such an enemy, already within reach of the easy communication by the sea-beach, must have involved the whole allied army in all the danger of being attacked during the unavoidable confusion of the different corps arriving on the narrow ridge of Bermesa nearly at the same time.

"Trusting to the known heroism of British troops, regardless of the numbers and position of their enemy, an immediate attack was determined on. Major Duncan soon opened a powerful battery of ten guns in the centre. Brigadier-general Dilkes, with the brigade of guards, Lieutenant-colonel Browne's (of the 28th) flank battalion, Lieutenant-colonel Norcott's two companies of the 2d rifle corps, and Major Acheson, with a part of the 67th foot, (separated from the regiment in the wood) formed on the right.

"Colonel Wheatly's brigade, with three companies of the Coldstream Guards, under Lieutenant-colonel Jackson (separated likewise from his battalion in the wood), and Lieutenant-colonel Barnard's flank battalion, formed on the left.

"As soon as the infantry was thus hastily got together, the guns advanced to a more favorable position, and kept up a most destructive fire.

"The right wing proceeded to the attack of General Rufin's division on the hill, while Lieutenant-colonel Barnard's battalion and Lieutenant-colonel Bushe's detachment of the 20th Portuguese, were warmly engaged with the enemy's tirailleurs on our left.

"General Laval's division, notwithstanding the havoc made by Major Duncan's battery, continued to advance in very imposing masses, opening his fire of musketry, and was only checked by that of the left wing. The left wing now advanced, firing; a most determined charge, by the three companies of guards, and the 87th regiment, supported by all the remainder of the wing, decided the defeat of General Laval's division.

"The eagle of the 8th regiment of light infantry, which suffered immensely, and a howitzer, rewarded this charge, and remained in possession of Major Gough, of the 87th regiment. These attacks were zealously supported by Colonel Belsen with the 28th regiment, and Lieutenant-colonel Prevost with a part of the 67th.

"A reserve formed beyond the narrow valley, across which the enemy was closely pursued, next shared the same fate, and was routed by the same means.

"Meanwhile the right wing was not less successful: the enemy, confident of success, met General Dilkes on the ascent of the hill, and the contest was sanguinary, but the undaunted perseverance of the brigade of guards, of Lieutenant-colonel Browne's battalion, and of Lieutenant-colonel Norcott's and Major Acheson's detachment, overcame every obstacle, and General Rufin's division was driven from the heights in confusion, leaving two pieces of cannon.

"No expressions of mine could do justice to the conduct of the troops throughout. Nothing less than the almost unparalleled exertions of every officer, the invincible bravery of every soldier, and the most determined devotion of the honor of his majesty's arms in all, could have achieved this brilliant success, against such a formidable enemy, so posted.

"In less than an hour and a half from the commencement of the action, the enemy was in full retreat. The retiring divisions met, halted, and seemed inclined to form: a new and more advanced position of our artillery quickly dispersed them.

"The exhausted state of the troops made pursuit impossible. A position was taken on the eastern side of the hill; and we were strengthened on our right by the return of the two Spanish battalions that had been attached before to my division, but which I had left on the hill, and which had been ordered to retire.

"These battalions (Walloon guards and Ciudad Real) made every effort to come back in time, when it was known that we were engaged.

"I understand, too, from General Whittingham, that with three squadrons of cavalry he kept in check a corps of infantry and cavalry that attempted to turn the Barrosa height by the sea. One squadron of the 2d hussars, king's german legion, under Captain Busche, and directed by Lieutenant-colonel Ponsonby, (both had been attached to the Spanish cavalry,) joined in time to make a brilliant and most successful charge against a squadron of French dragoons, which was entirely routed.

"An eagle, six pieces of cannon, the general of division Rufin, and the general of brigade, Rosseau, wounded and taken; the chief of the staff,

General Bellegrade, an aid-de-camp of Marshal Victor, and the colonel of the 8th regiment, with many other officers, killed, and several wounded and taken prisoners; the field covered with the dead bodies and arms of the enemy, attest that my confidence in this division was nobly repaid.

"Where all have so distinguished themselves, it is scarcely possible to discriminate any as the most deserving of praise. Your lordship will, however, observe how gloriously the brigade of guards, under Brigadier-general Dilkes, with the commanders of the battalions Lieutenant-colonel the Hon. C. Onslow, and Lieutenant-colonel Sebright wounded, as well as the three separated companies under Lieutenant-colonel Jackson, maintained the high character of his majesty's household troops. Lieutenant-colonel Browne, with his flank battalion, Lieutenant-colonel Norcott, and Major Acheson, deserve equal praise.

"And I must equally recommend to your lordship's notice Colonel Wheatly, with Colonel Belson, Lieutenant-colonel Prevost, and Major Gough, and the officers of the respective corps composing his brigade.

"The animated charges of the 87th regiment were most conspicuous; Lieutenant-colonel Barnard (twice wounded), and the officers of his flank battalion, executed the duty of skirmishing in advance with the enemy in a masterly manner, and were ably seconded by Lieutenant-colonel Busche, of the 20th Portuguese, who, (likewise twice wounded,) fell into the enemy's hands, but was afterwards rescued. The detachment of this Portuguese regiment behaved admirably throughout the whole affair.

"I owe too much to Major Duncan, and the officers and corps of the royal artillery, not to mention them in terms of the highest approbation; never was artillery better served.

"The assistance I received from the unwearied exertions of Lieutenant-colonel Macdonald, and the officers of the adjutant-general's department, of Lieutenant-colonel the Hon. C. Cathcart, and the officers of the quarter-master-general's department, of Captain Birch and Captain Nicholas, and the officers of the royal engineers, of Captain Hope, and the officers of my personal staff, (all animating by their example,) will ever be most gratefully remembered. Our loss has been severe: as soon as it can be ascertained by the proper return, I shall have the honor of transmitting it; but much as it is to be lamented, I trust it will be considered as a necessary sacrifice, for the safety of the whole allied army.

"Having remained some hours on the Barrosa heights, without being able to procure any supplies for the exhausted troops, the commissariat mules having been dispersed on the enemy's first attack of the hill, I left Major Ross, with the detachment of the 3d battalion of the 95th, and withdrew the rest of the division, which crossed the Santa Petri river early the next morning.

"I confidently trust that the bearer of this dispatch, Captain Hope, (to whom I refer your lordship for further details) will be promoted, on being permitted to lay the eagle at his majesty's feet.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"THOMAS GRAHAM, Lieutenant-general."

"P. S. I beg leave to add, that two Spanish officers, Captains Miranda and Naughton, attached to my staff, behaved with the utmost intrepidity.

T. G."

The merit of this victory will be best understood by recalling to mind the circumstances under which the battle was fought. La Pena had detached General Graham in advance from Vesper to Bermesa. The British army had made this march, which is sixteen hours in length, during the night, and had taken no rest, till they had reached the heights of Barrosa, and even then only rested whilst they were posting the Spanish troops. After this short repose, about an hour, they again pushed on for Bermesa. The ground between Barrosa and Bermesa is a rough plain, succeeded by a wood. The English had passed over the plain and reached the wood, when notice was brought that the enemy was in motion towards the heights of Barrosa. General Graham gave instant orders for a counter-march, and to hasten towards the heights, which orders were immediately executed. It was soon, however, perceived, that the French, anticipating them, had already gained them, and that the Spaniards had retired.

The force of the enemy which had thus seized the heights, and which were posted there to maintain them, amounted to not less than 3,500 men, under General Rufin. Another body of 4,000 was drawn up on the left of Rufin to oppose the approach of the English. The total, therefore, of the French force opposed to the English, and to the English alone, was about 7,500 men, being considerably more than double the force of General Graham. The French regiments, moreover, were the flower of the French service, and had received honorary distinctions from the French emperor in reward of their previous services and experienced gallantry. The description of the enemy, indeed, is as important a feature in the value and importance of this victory as even their superiority of number. It is a matter of no great difficulty for a disciplined force to carry a victory over new levies, but it requires a great portion of courage to oppose the united advantages of a superiority of number and of greater experience. The victory of General Graham, therefore, was com-

BOOK IX. plete in these two points. He triumphed over greater numbers, and he triumphed over a description of force which had been formed by successive years in the field.

CHAP. VII.

1811.

The battle, moreover, was fought with every possible disadvantage, as to position and locality on the side of the English. The English had to attack the enemy in their own position. They had to fight for ground which belonged to themselves, and which they had lost only from the weakness (not to give it a worse name) of the Spanish General.

Motions of thanks were unanimously voted by both houses of parliament severally to Lieutenant-general Graham, to Brigadier-general Dilkes, and officers, and non-commissioned officers and men, under his command; also to the German and Portuguese troops employed with them at the battle of Barrosa.

CHAPTER VIII.

Disastrous Retreat of Marshal Massena.—Victorious Pursuit of the French, by the British Army.—Consequent Actions.—Siege of Campo Major.—Action at the Upper Coa.—Surrender of Olivenza to Marshal Sir William Beresford.—A smart Affair at Los Santos.—Gratitude of the Portuguese, for the Successes of the Allied Armies.—Battles of Almeida and Albuera.

ON the night of February 5, Marshal Massena retired from his position at Santarem, and its neighbourhood, and directed his march towards the Mondego, having one corps on the road of Espinel, General Loison's division on the road of Anciao, and the remainder towards Pombal. On the 9th the enemy collected in front of Pombal, where they were attacked with great gallantry by several detachments of cavalry and the light brigade of infantry under General Pack, and retired in the night. On the 12th they took up a strong position at the end of a defile between Redinha and Pombal. They were attacked in this position on the 12th, by the light infantry brigade and the cavalry; the other troops being in reserve. The troops formed with great accuracy and celerity. Major-general Sir Brent Spencer led the line against the enemy's position on the heights, from which they were immediately driven, with the loss of many killed, wounded, and prisoners.

The enemy then retired to the position of Condexa, and the division under Major-general Picton immediately passed through the mountains on the enemy's left, and caused them to remove from the strong positions of Condexa. Lord Wellington was immediately enabled to communicate with Coimbra, and made prisoners a detachment of the enemy's cavalry on the road.—The enemy took up a position at Call Nova on the 14th, and the 4th division under Major-general Cole having turned their position on the left, and the light division under Brigadier-general Pack and Sir William Erskine having turned it on the right, the enemy were obliged to abandon all the positions which they successively took up in the mountains, and their rear-guard was driven back on Miranda de Corvo, on the river Eca, with loss of killed, wounded, and prisoners.

On the evening of the 14th, the strong position of Miranda de Corvo was turned by a British corps under Major-general Cole. The enemy, upon abandoning it, destroyed a great number of carriages, buried and destroyed much ammunition, and the road throughout the march from Miranda was strewn with carcasses of men and animals.

The enemy, on the 15th, took up a strong position, which they were afterwards forced to abandon with considerable loss. The colonel of the 39th regiment was here made prisoner. In the night the enemy destroyed the bridge over the Ceira, and retreated to another position between that and the Alva.

In order to mask his departure, Massena, in addition to other attempts to deceive, set fire to a convent, which burnt for several hours. The French commenced their retreat in three columns. They pursued their route till the 21st, when they had reached Galiza, with the allied army close in their rear. During this march, there were about six slight actions or skirmishes, in all of which the allied troops behaved with uniform valor. The French marshal stood on the defensive, but still sustained great loss. The chief action was on the 12th, when the allied army had upwards of 200 killed, wounded, and missing. The Portuguese caçadores greatly distinguished themselves on this occasion.

During the 18th and 19th of March, the French endeavoured to make a stand in the Sierra de Moira, but they were driven from that position with the loss of 6,000 prisoners: On the 21st they reached Galiza. The British head-quarters were at Pombeira on the 11th, and at Algazil on the 20th. The cavalry and light troops continued in sight of the French rear-guard, and the movement of the allied army along the skirts of the Estrella, which flank the positions in the valley of the Mondego, afforded new impediments to their retreat.

Marshal Soult moved in the middle of the month towards Seville, at the head of 4,000 infantry and 1,500 cavalry. No considerable force was left in the town of Badajoz, which had been captured by the enemy. The siege of Campo Major (which place the French had taken a few days before), continued during the 19th, 20th and 21st. A breach having been effected, the place capitulated on the morning of the 21st. The garrison, in number about 250, militia, remained prisoners of war. The French force before the place consisted of 4,000 infantry and 500 cavalry.

About the beginning of April, the enemy occupied the Upper Coa, having his right at Rovina and guarding the fort of Rapoilla de Coa with a detachment at the bridge of Ferrerias, and his left at Sabugal, and the 8th corps was at Alfayates. The right of the British army was opposite Sabugal, and the left at the bridge of Ferrerias.

The militia under General Trant, and Colonel Wilson crossed the Coa below Almeida, in order to threaten the communication of that place with Ciudad Rodrigo and the enemy's army.

The river Coa is difficult of access throughout its course; and the position which the enemy had taken was very strong, and could be approached only by its left.

The troops were therefore put in motion on the morning of the 3d, to turn the enemy's left above Sabugal, and to force the passage of the bridge of that town; with the exception of the 6th division, which remained opposite the 6th corps, which was at Rovina; and one battalion of the 7th division, which observed the enemy's detachment at the bridge of Ferrerias.

The 2d corps were in a strong position, with their right upon a height immediately above the bridge and town of Sabugal, and their left extending along the road to Alfayates, to a height which commanded all the approaches to Sabugal from the fords of the Coa, above the town. The 2d corps communicated by Rindo with the 6th corps at Rovina.

It was intended to turn the left of this corps; and with this view the light division and the cavalry, under Major-general Sir W. Erskine and Major-general Slade, were to cross the Coa by two separate fords upon the right, the cavalry upon the right of the light division; the 3d division, under Major-general Picton, at a ford on their left, about a mile above Sabugal; and the 5th division, under Major-general Dunlop, and the artillery, at the bridge of Sabugal.

Colonel Beckwith's brigade of the light division were the first that crossed the Coa, with two squadrons of cavalry upon their right. Four companies of the 95th, and three companies of Colonel Elder's caçadores, drove in the enemy's picquets, and were supported by the 43d regiment. At this moment a rain-storm came on, which rendered it impossible to see any thing; and these troops having pushed on in pursuit of the enemy's picquets, came upon the left of the main body, which it had been intended they should turn.

The light troops were driven back upon the 43d regiment, and as soon as the atmosphere became clear, the enemy having perceived that the body which had advanced were not strong, attacked them in a solid column, supported by cavalry and artillery. These troops repulsed the attack, and advanced in pursuit upon the enemy's position, where they were attacked by a fresh column on their left, and were charged by the 1st hussars on their right. They retired and took post behind a wall, from which post they again repulsed the enemy; and advanced a second time in pursuit of them, and took from them a howitzer.—They were, however, again attacked by a fresh column with cavalry, and retired again to their post, where they were joined by the other brigade of the light division, consisting of the two battalions of the 52d regiment and the 1st caçadores. These troops repulsed the enemy; and Colonel Beckwith's brigade and the 1st battalion of the 52d regiment again advanced upon them. They were attacked again by a fresh column, supported by cavalry, which charged their right, and they took post in an inclosure upon the top of the height, from whence they could protect the howitzer which the 43d had taken; and they drove back the enemy.

The enemy were making arrangements to attack them again in this post, and moved a column on their left, when the light infantry of Major-general Picton's division, under Lieutenant-col. Williams, supported by the Hon. Major-general Colville's brigade, opened their fire upon them.

At the same moment the head of Major-general Dunlop's column crossed the bridge of the Coa, and ascended the heights on the right flank of the enemy; and the cavalry appeared on the high ground in the rear of the enemy's left, and the enemy retired across the hills towards Rendo, leaving the howitzer in the possession of those who had so gallantly gained and preserved it, and about 200 killed on the ground, and six officers, and 300 prisoners.

Although the operations of this day were, by unavoidable accidents, not performed in the manner intended, the action that was fought by the light division, by Colonel Beckwith's brigade principally, with the whole of the 2d corps was considered one of the most glorious that British troops were ever engaged in.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. VIII.

The 43d regiment, under Major Patrickson, particularly distinguished themselves, as did that part of the 95th regiment, in Colonel Beckwith's brigade, under the command of Major Gilmour, and Colonel Elder's caçadores; the 1st battalion 52d regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Ross, likewise shewed great steadiness and gallantry when they joined Colonel Beckwith's brigade. Throughout the action the troops derived great advantage from the assistance of two guns of Captain Bull's troop of horse-artillery, which crossed at the ford with the light division, and came up to their support.

It was impossible for any officer to conduct himself with more ability and gallantry than Colonel Beckwith. The action was commenced by an unavoidable accident to which all operations are liable; but having been commenced, it would have been impossible to withdraw from the ground without risking the loss of the object of the movements; and it was desirable to obtain possession, if possible, of the top of the hill, from which the enemy had made so many attacks, with advantage, on the first position taken by the 43d regiment. This was gained before the 3d division came up.

When the firing commenced, the 6th corps broke up from their position at Rovina, and marched towards Rendó. The two corps joined at that place and continued their retreat to Alfayates, followed by the British cavalry, part of which was that night at Soito.

The enemy continued their retreat that night and the next morning; and entered the Spanish frontier on the 4th. Lord Wellington sent six squadrons of cavalry, under Major-general Sir W. Erskine, on the 7th, towards Almeida, to reconnoitre that place, and drive in any parties which might be in that neighbourhood, and to cut off the communication between the garrison and the army. He found a division of the 9th corps at Junca, which he drove before him across the Turou and Duas Casas; and he took from them many prisoners. Captain Bull's troop of horse-artillery did great execution upon this occasion. The enemy withdrew in the night across the Agueda.

The allied army took up their position upon the Duas Casas, which Brigadier-general Craufurd occupied with his advanced-guard, in the latter part of the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo; having their advanced posts upon Gallegos and upon the Agueda. The militia are at Cinco Villas and Malpartida. The enemy had no communication with the garrison of Almeida, from whence they lately withdrew the heavy artillery employed in the summer in the siege of that place.

On the south of the Tagus, Marshal Sir W. Beresford was preparing to dislodge the French from under the walls of Badajoz, where they had formed an entrenched camp. As a preliminary operation he had caused Olivença to be summoned.

Marshal Sir W. Beresford was not able to effect his passage across the Guadiana as soon as he expected; and the enemy introduced some provisions into Badajoz and Olivença. Sir W. Beresford's advanced-guard crossed the Guadiana on the 4th of April; and a squadron of the 13th light dragoons, which were on picket under Major Morres, were surprised, on the night of the 6th, by a detachment of the enemy's cavalry from Olivença. The whole squadron, with the exception of twenty men, were taken prisoners. The enemy afterwards retired entirely from Estremadura, leaving small garrisons in Badajoz and Olivença.

Marshal Sir William Beresford took a position to invest both Badajoz and Olivença. On the 14th of April the garrison of Olivença, consisting of 310 men, surrendered at discretion to General Cole, and was marched to Elvas.

Marshal Mortier, with 4,000 men, was in the neighbourhood of Llerena, having detached a moveable column, under General Martinieze, by the way of Almaraz, towards Toledo. General Beresford, with that part of the allied army which did not form the siege of Badajoz, was in the neighbourhood of Santa Martha.

The corps of General Ballasteros had its headquarters in Segura di Leone on the 12th; his cavalry was at Zafra on the 13th, on which day Lord Wellington left Villa Fermosa, on the Coa, to join the army in Estremadura.

A smart affair with the enemy's cavalry, amounting to 800 men, took place at Los Santos, a village about two miles from Zapa. Sir Wm. Beresford headed the Portuguese cavalry himself, charged the French horse, broke their line, and pursued them four leagues at a hard gallop. They took 200 prisoners, and seventy-three horses, (exclusive of the killed) and scarcely lost a man or horse. They also obtained a prize more valuable, 4,000 rations of bread and the same quantity of brandy.

The brilliant successes of the allied army were celebrated by every demonstration of joy which could mark the gratitude of the Portuguese for the exertions of the British in their behalf, and the satisfaction inspired by the salvation of their country. Te Deum was sung in the churches; the city was illuminated; and, shortly after, the following letters were addressed to Lord Wellington and Marshal Beresford, by the government and the minister:

Most illustrious and most excellent Lord Viscount Wellington, K. B. Marshal-general, Commander-in-chief.

"Your excellency's dispatch, dated the 9th instant, having been laid before us, and your excellency's glorious and transcendent services in the course of the present campaign having been duly considered, we have high satisfaction in testifying our just admiration of the exalted achievements which have immortalized your excellency's name, sustained the honor of the combined armies, and delivered this kingdom, the third time, from the oppression of our enemies.

"The conduct of the army having justified the confidence of their chief, and fulfilled the expectations of the allied nations, we are desirous that your excellency do make known to the whole army, that the government and the country are amply repaid for their exertions and sacrifices by the wisdom, valour, and discipline displayed by the generals, officers, and privates, of which that army is composed.

"We will lay before his royal highness, in the distinctest manner, the events which have taken place; recommending to his royal notice the services of an army which has covered itself with glory under your excellency's command.

"Your excellency cannot fail of deriving high gratification from the result of your plans and labours, which, crowned with the most eminent success and public opinion, leave nothing wanting to satisfy the heart of the illustrious warrior by whom they were conceived and accomplished.

"May God preserve your excellency.

Most illustrious and most excellent Sir William Carr Beresford, K. B. Marshal Commander-in-chief of the Portuguese Army.

"The combined armies having driven the enemy beyond the northern and southern frontier with as much glory to the forces allied as advantage to the just cause they defend, the governors of the kingdom have authorised me to acknowledge, in their name, the high and distinguished services for which the Portuguese nation is indebted to your excellency in quality of marshal commander-in-chief of her armies.

"If the success of arms be the result of valour and discipline, to your excellency it is attributable that troops, only the other day mostly recruits, have been enabled to conduct themselves like experienced veterans, and to deserve so eminently of their sovereign and their country.

"The government will lay before his royal highness, with an especial recommendation, the merits and glorious achievements of his army, and desire that your excellency do make known to the whole of that army, in the most impressive manner, the high estimation in which their services are held.

"The army have amply fulfilled the expectations of their country; and so long as she shall preserve the recollection of events so glorious, the distinguished chief who disciplined and commanded that army will ever be present to her grateful memory.

"I have particular satisfaction in communicating the sentiments of the governors of the kingdom towards your excellency, being precisely those I have ever invariably entertained.

"May God preserve your excellency.

Lord Wellington having received information that the enemy were increasing their force on the Agueda, arrived there on the 28th of April. The enemy had, on the 23d, attacked the piquets of the allied army on the Azaoa; but were repulsed with great gallantry. On this occasion Lieutenant Pritchard and seventeen men were wounded. The enemy repeated their attack on the 27th, and were again repulsed.

On the 1st of May they reconnoitred the bank of the Agueda, with eight squadrons of cavalry, and three battalions of infantry; they did not make any attempt to pass the river, nor did they attack the piquets on the bridge of Marialva. They collected a large force at Ciudad Rodrigo, and Marshal Massena and the head-quarters of the army were at that place. The river Agueda was not fordable for infantry, but it was for cavalry.

Intelligence having reached Lord Wellington, that the Prince of Essling had held a council of war at Ciudad Rodrigo on the 1st of May, which was attended by twenty-six generals, and the French having, in the course of the last few days, made several demonstrations on the left bank of the Agueda, it was supposed that he meditated an attempt to relieve Almeida, or at least to bring off the garrison, which was now known to be much straitened for provisions. Next day the enemy (consisting of the 2d, 6th, and 8th corps, together with all the cavalry which could be collected in the adjacent provinces of Lion and Castile) having crossed the Agueda, the British divisions marched out of their cantonments, and on the 3d the whole of the army, under the immediate command of Lord Wellington, was concentrated on the plains of Argania, near the village of Villa Formosa, two leagues in front of Almeida, and four from Ciudad Rodrigo.

About two in the afternoon, the enemy, whose line extended along the edge of a thick wood, pushed forward several corps of sharp-shooters, with a view to obtain possession of the village of Fuente Donora, which was defended most obstinately by the light troops; but the French, from their superiority in numbers, became masters of this important point, where, however, they remained but a short time, when they were dislodged by the 71st regiment, under Colonel Cadogan, at the point of the bayonet. This was a little before dusk, when the firing ceased. Next morning the enemy renewed his attempts upon the village, and supported his advance with heavy artillery, but every effort proved ineffectual.

At day-break on the 5th, it was perceived that the enemy had removed the whole of his cavalry, and several heavy columns of infantry, towards the right of the allied army, and their numbers giving them confidence, the French cavalry charged the British, who were compelled to retire, but frequently faced about and made several desperate charges upon the enemy. Meantime the 7th division, under General Houston, was warmly engaged with a superior body of infantry, and in consequence, was directed to fall back upon the guards, which were posted on the right of the 1st division, flanked by Captain Lawson's brigade of nine-pounders and some light cavalry.

This movement was executed in a most deliberate manner, every inch of ground being disputed with the enemy. The two foreign corps in this division, the Duke of Brunswick Oel's infantry, and the Chasseurs Britanniques, behaved with the utmost gallantry, and completely checked the advance of the French cavalry by several well-directed volleys.

Previous to this, the enemy had opened a tremendous fire upon the first line of infantry; every shot went over, doing execution in the second line.

About eleven, the picquet of the guards, under Lieutenant-colonel Hill, which was skirmishing in front of the brigade with the enemy's light troops, was charged by a body of cavalry, whom he twice repulsed, but, being reinforced, they returned to the charge in such numbers that further resistance was unavailing, and Colonel Hill was compelled to surrender himself a prisoner, after seeing most of his officers and men cut down. The engagement continued until the close of day, and the enemy, whose force in the field consisted of 40,000 infantry, and 5,000 cavalry, was not enabled to gain a single advantage, or make an impression upon any part of the British line. Their loss in front of Fuentes Donora, which was the principal object of attack, and the possession of which was of the utmost consequence to either army, was immense, 600 being killed in the village alone. The loss of the British was also severe, but not so great as might have been expected from the length of time the troops remained under fire.

After the cavalry retired, in the early part of the morning, the British line stood as follows:—the seventh division (Houston's) was on the right, next to the first division (Sir B. Spencer's) having the light division on the left, and beyond were those of Generals Picton, A. Campbell, and Sir W. Erskine. Brigadier-general Pack remained with the Queen's regiment, and a brigade of Portuguese infantry, watching the fortress of Almeida, from whence a few guns were fired, probably as signals in the course of the morning.

The hostile armies remained in front of each other on the two following days. Not a shot was fired; but working parties were employed in throwing up field-works to strengthen the right of the British line. In the afternoon of the 7th, the French and British were mutually employed in burying their dead, which was effected without either party offering the smallest molestation to the other. About ten P. M. a heavy firing was heard in the direction of Almeida, followed by several explosions. The French army having been reinforced by the arrival of Marshal Bessieres, with 3,000 of the imperial guard, it was confidently expected in the British camp that the enemy would renew his attack; but at day-break on the 8th, they had the satisfaction to see the French videttes gallop off, and soon after several columns of infantry in motion to the rear.

In the course of the 6th, Col. Trant arrived on the left with a body of Portuguese militia, and the corps of Don Julian Sanchez took a share in the action and checked the movements of the enemy on the right.

The result of Marshal Massena's attempts to raise the siege of Almeida ended in establishing, upon the firmest foundation, the character of the British arms, and added fresh laurels to those which already adorned the brow of the illustrious British chief.

Lord Wellington, in the action of May 5, was in the utmost danger of being made prisoner: his aid-de-camp, Captain Fitzclarence, was actually taken, but was rescued, with the loss of the sword which the prince-regent had presented to him.

After this Almeida was left to its fate, and the siege of Badajoz commenced. The French were driven from the heights of Engracia on the 8th, and obliged to take shelter in the fort of St. Christovoa. This exploit was performed by Portuguese troops alone.

The sanguinary battle of Albuera was fought on the 16th. The French commenced the attack at nine o'clock in the morning of the 16th. Their principal effort was made on the right of the allies, where the Spaniards were posted, supported by two British regiments, the buffs and 57th. The Spaniards behaved well, although, at one time, from the heaviness of the fire; they gave way a little. The British regiments then pushed through them, with a most tremendous fire of musketry, which stopped the French. Unfortunately, from the eagerness of British soldiers, they advanced too far, which gave an opportunity to a regiment of Polish cavalry to charge them on the flank, killing great numbers, and making some few prisoners. Just at this time the Poles were attacked by a regiment sent to reinforce, and the Poles were obliged to retreat. The left wing of the French army soon after gave way, and the slaughter was then dreadful. While this was passing on the right, they began an attack on the centre, where the brigade was posted, which, after a sanguinary conflict, also ended in the complete defeat of the French. The enemy owed the safety of their army to the superiority of their cavalry alone; had it not been for them, they would have been annihilated.

The French army was at least 30,000, of which 4,000 were cavalry; it was clearly ascertained that they lost 10,000. The allies consisted of 8,000 British, 10,000 Spaniards, and 9,000 Portuguese, including 2000 cavalry. They lost of English and Portuguese 4,500, and 2,500 Spaniards. The field of battle was literally covered with dead, lying in heaps in every part. A body of British cavalry charged a column commanded by Soult, and putting it to the rout, he very narrowly escaped. Immediately afterwards the English were closed upon in the rear, and facing about, cut their way back again, leaving half their men dead on the field. Upwards of 700 wounded were left by the enemy, and he was so pressed by the cavalry, that he was obliged to abandon more to their fate. Marshal Soult boasted, in general orders to his army on leaving Seville, that he was going to meet and defeat the British, and likewise repeated the same verbally to his troops. A copy of this order was found on General Werle, who was killed, and the latter was affirmed by deserters and prisoners.

The following is Marshal Beresford's account of this battle, addressed to Lord Wellington, and transmitted to London by his lordship:

"Albuera, May 18, 1811.

"My Lord,—I have infinite satisfaction in communicating to your lordship, that the allied army, united here under my orders, obtained on the 16th instant, after a most sanguinary contest, a complete victory over that of the enemy, commanded by Marshal Soult, and I shall proceed to relate to your lordship the circumstances.

"In a former report I have informed your lordship of the advance of Marshal Soult from Seville, and I had, in consequence, judged it wise entirely to raise the siege of Badajoz, and prepare to meet him with our united forces, rather than, by looking to two objects at once, to risk the loss of both. Marshal Soult, it appears, had been long straining every nerve to collect a force which he thought fully sufficient to his object for the relief of Badajoz; and for this purpose he had drawn considerable numbers from the corps of Marshal Victor and General Sebastiani, and also, I believe, from the French army of the centre. Having thus completed his preparations, he marched from Seville on the 10th instant, with a corps then estimated at 15,000 or 16,000 men, and was joined on descending into Estremadura by the corps under General Latour Maubourgh, stated to be 5,000 men. His Excellency General Blake, as soon as he learnt the advance of Marshal Soult, in strict conformity to the plan proposed by your lordship, proceeded to form his junction with the corps under my orders, and arrived at Valverde in person on the 14th inst. where, having consulted with his excellency and General Castanos, it was determined to meet the enemy, and to give him battle.

"On finding the determination of the enemy to relieve Badajoz, I had broken up from before that place, and marched the infantry to the position in front of Valverde, except the division of the Honourable Major-general G. L. Cole, which, with 2,000 Spanish troops, I left to cover the removal of our stores.

"The cavalry, which had, according to orders, fallen back as the enemy advanced, was joined at Santa Martha by the cavalry of General Blake; that of General Castanos, under the Count de Penne Villamur, had been always with it.

"As remaining at Valverde, though a stronger position, left Badajoz entirely open, I determined to take up a position (such as could be got in this widely open country) at this place; thus standing directly between the enemy and Badajoz.

"The army was therefore assembled here on the 15th instant.—The corps of General Blake, though making a forced march to effect it, only joined in the night, and could not be placed in its position till the morning of the 16th instant, when General Cole's division, with the Spanish brigade under Don Carlos d'Espagne, also joined, and a little before the commencement of the action.—Our cavalry had been forced on the morning of the 15th inst. to retire from Santa Martha and joined here. In the afternoon of that day the enemy appeared in front of us. The next morning our disposition for receiving the enemy was made, being formed in two lines, nearly parallel to the river Albuera, on the ridge of the gradual ascent rising from that river, and covering the roads to Badajoz and Valverde; though your lordship is aware, that the whole face of this country is every where passable for all arms.

"The enemy, on the morning of the 16th, did not long delay his attack; at eight o'clock he was observed to be in movement, and his cavalry was seen passing the rivulet of Albuera, considerably above our right; and shortly after he marched out of the wood opposite to us a strong force of cavalry, and two heavy columns of infantry, pointing them to our front, as if to attack the village and bridge of Albuera: during this time, under cover of his vastly superior cavalry, he was filing the principal body of his infantry over the river beyond our right, and it was not long before his intention appeared to be to turn us by that flank, and cut us off from Valverde. Major-general Cole's division was therefore ordered to form an oblique line to the rear of our right, with his own right thrown back: and the intention of the enemy to attack our right becoming evident, I requested General Blake to form part of his first line, and all his second, to that front, which was done.

"The enemy commenced his attack at nine o'clock, not ceasing, at the same time, to menace our left; and after a strong and gallant resistance of the Spanish troops, he gained the heights upon which they had been formed: meanwhile the division of the Honourable Major-general William Stewart had been brought up to support them; and that of Major-general Hamilton brought to the left of the Spanish line, and formed in contiguous close columns of battalions, to be moveable in any direction. The Portuguese brigade of cavalry, under Brigadier-general Otway, remained at some distance on the left of this, to check any attempt of the enemy below the village.

"As the heights the enemy had gained raked, and entirely commanded our whole position, it became necessary to make every effort to retake and maintain them; and a noble one was made by the division of General Stewart, headed by that gallant officer. Nearly at the beginning of the enemy's attack, a heavy storm of rain came on, which, with the smoke from the firing, rendered it impossible to discern any thing distinctly. This, with the nature of the ground, had been extremely favourable to the enemy in forming his columns, and in his subsequent attack.

"The right brigade of General Stewart's division, under Lieutenant-colonel Colborne, first came into action, and behaved in the most gallant manner; and finding that the enemy's column could not be shaken by fire, proceeded to attack

it with the bayonet; and while in the act of charging, a body of Polish lancers (cavalry) which the thickness of the atmosphere and the nature of the ground had concealed, and which was, besides, mistaken by those of the brigade, when discovered, for Spanish cavalry, and therefore not fired upon, turned it; and being thus attacked unexpectedly in the rear was unfortunately broken, and suffered immensely. The 31st regiment, being the left one of the brigade, alone escaped this charge, and under the command of Major L'Estrange, kept its ground, until the arrival of the 3d brigade, under Major-general Hoghton. The conduct of this brigade was most conspicuously gallant; and that of the 2d brigade, under the command of the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel Abercromby, was not less so: Major-general Hoghton, cheering on his brigade to the charge, fell pierced by wounds. Though the enemy's principal attack was on this point of the right, he also made a continual attempt upon that part of our original front at the village and bridge, which were defended in the most gallant manner by Major-general Baron Allen, and the light infantry brigade of the German Legion, whose conduct was, in every point of view, conspicuously good. This point now formed our left, and Major-general Hamilton's divisions had been brought up there; and he was left to direct the defence of that point, whilst the enemy's attacks continued on our right, a considerable proportion of the Spanish troops supporting the defence of this place. The enemy's cavalry, on his infantry attempting to force our right, had endeavoured to turn it; but, by the able manœuvres of Major-general the Honorable William Lumley, commanding the allied cavalry, though vastly inferior to that of the enemy in number, his endeavours were foiled. Major-general Cole, seeing the attack of the enemy, very judiciously bringing up his left a little, marched in time to attack the enemy's left, and arrived most opportunely to contribute, with the charges of the brigades of General Stewart's division, to force the enemy to abandon his situation, and retire precipitately, and to take refuge under his reserve; here the fusileer brigade particularly distinguished itself. He was pursued by the allies to a considerable distance, and as far as I thought it prudent, with his immense superiority of cavalry; and I contented myself with seeing him driven across the Albuera.

"I have every reason to speak favorably of the manner in which our artillery was served and fought; and Major Hartman commanding the British, and Major Dickson commanding the Portuguese, and the officers and men, are entitled to my thanks. The four guns of the horse-artillery, commanded by Captain Lefebvre, did great execution on the enemy's cavalry; and one brigade of Spanish artillery (the only one in the field) I saw equally gallantly and well served; we lost in the misfortune which occurred to the brigade commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Colborne (whom General Stewart reports to have acted, and was then acting, in a most noble manner, leading on the brigade in admirable order) one howitzer, which the enemy, before the arrival of the gallant General Hoghton's brigade, had time to carry off, with 200 or 300 prisoners of that brigade. After he had been beaten from this his principal attack, he still continued that near the village, on which he never could make any impression, or cross the rivulet, though I had been obliged to bring a very great proportion of the troops from it, to support the principal point of attack; but the enemy seeing his main attack defeated, relaxed in his attempt there also. The Portuguese division of Major-general Hamilton, in every instance, evinced the utmost steadiness and courage, and manœuvred equally well with the British.

"Brigadier-general Harvey's Portuguese brigade, belonging to General Cole's division, had an opportunity of distinguishing itself when marching in line across the plain, by repulsing, with the utmost steadiness, a charge of the enemy's cavalry.

"It is impossible to enumerate every instance of discipline and valour shewn on this severely contested day—but never were there troops that more valiantly or more gloriously maintained the honor of their respective countries. I have not been able to particularize the Spanish divisions, brigades, or regiments that were particularly engaged, because I am not acquainted with their denominations or names; but I have great pleasure in saying that their behaviour was most gallant and honorable; and though, from the superior number and weight of the enemy's force, that part of them that were in the position attacked were obliged to cede the ground, it was after a gallant resistance, and they continued in good order to support their allies; and I doubt not, his excellency General Blake will do ample justice on this head, by making honorable mention of the deserving.

"The battle commenced at nine o'clock, and continued without interruption till two in the afternoon, when the enemy having been driven over the Albuera, for the remainder of the day there was but cannonading and skirmishing.

"It is impossible by any description to do justice to the distinguished gallantry of the troops, but every individual most nobly did his duty, and which will be well proved by the great loss we have suffered through repulsing the enemy; and it was observed, that our dead, particularly the 57th regiment, were lying, as they had fought, in ranks, and every wound was in the front.

"The Honorable Major-general William Stewart most particularly distinguished himself, and conducted much to the honor of the day; he received two contusions, but would not quit the field. Major-general the Honorable G. L. Cole is also entitled to every praise; and I have to regret being deprived for some time of his services, by the wound he has received. The Hon. Lieutenant-colonel Abercromby, commanding the 2d brigade, 2d division, and Major L'Es-trange, 31st regiment, deserve to be particularly mentioned; and nothing could exceed the conduct and gallantry of Colonel Inglis, at the head of his regiment. To the Hon. Major-general William Lumley, for the very able manner in which he opposed the numerous cavalry of the enemy, and foiled him in his object, I am particularly indebted. To Major-general Hamilton, who commanded in the left, during the severe attack upon our right, I am also much indebted; and the Portuguese brigade of Brigadier-generals Fouseca and Archibald Campbell deserve to be mentioned. To Major-general Allen, and to the excellent brigade under his orders, I have much praise to give; and it is with great pleasure I assure your lordship, that the good and gallant conduct of every corps, and of every person, was in proportion to the opportunity that offered for distinguishing themselves. I know not an individual who did not do his duty.

"I have, I fear, to regret the loss to the service of Colonel Collins, commanding a Portuguese brigade, his leg having been carried off by a cannon-shot. He is an officer of great merit; and I deeply lament the death of Major-general Hoghton, and of those two promising officers, Lieutenant-colonel Sir William Myers, and Lieutenant-colonel Duckworth.

"It is most pleasing to me to inform your lordship, not only of the steady and gallant conduct of our allies, the Spanish troops, under his excellency General Blake, but also to assure you that the most perfect harmony has subsisted between us; and that General Blake not only conformed in all things to the general line proposed by your lordship, but in the details; and in whatever I suggested to his excellency, I received the most immediate and cordial assent and co-operation; and nothing was omitted, on his part, to ensure the success of our united efforts; and during the battle he most essentially, by his experience, knowledge, and zeal, contributed to its fortunate result.

"His excellency the Captain-general, Castanos, who had united the few troops he had in a state to be brought into the field, to those of General Blake, and placed them under his orders, assisted in person in the field; and not only on this, but on all occasions, I am much indebted to General Castanos, who is ever beforehand in BOOK IX. giving whatever can be beneficial to the success of the common cause.

CHAP. VIII. "Though I unfortunately cannot point out the 1811. corps, or many of the individuals of the Spanish troops that distinguished themselves, yet I will not omit to mention the names of General Val-lesteros, whose gallantry was most conspicuous, as of the corps he had under his command; and the same of General Zayas and of Don Carlos D'Espagne. The Spanish cavalry have behaved extremely well; and the Count de Penne Villamur is particularly deserving to be mentioned.

"Our loss in this hard-contested day is very severe. The loss of the enemy, though I cannot know what it is, must be still more severe. He has left on the field-of-battle about 2,000 dead, and we have taken from 900 to 1,000 prisoners. He has had five generals killed and wounded; of the former, generals of division Werle and Pesim; and Gazan and two others amongst the latter. His force was much more considerable than we had been informed of, as I do not think he displayed less than from 20 to 22,000 infantry, and he certainly had 4,000 cavalry, with a numerous and heavy artillery. His overbearing cavalry cramped and confined all our operations, and with his artillery saved the infantry, after its rout.

"He retired after the battle to the ground he had been previously on, but occupying it in position; and on this morning, or rather during the night, commenced his retreat on the road he came, towards Seville, and has abandoned Badajoz to its fate. He left a number of his wounded on the ground he had retired to, and to which we are administering what assistance we can. I have sent our cavalry to follow the enemy, but in that arm he is too powerful for us to attempt any thing against him in the plains he is traversing.

"Thus we have reaped the advantage we proposed from our opposition to the attempts of the enemy; and whilst he has been forced to abandon the object for which he has almost stripped Andalusia of troops, instead of having accomplished the haughty boasts with which Marshal Soult harangued his troops on leaving Seville, he returns there with a curtailed army, and what perhaps may be still more hurtful to him, with a diminished reputation.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

Phillipon, the governor, made so sure of the defeat of the allies, that he had absolutely prepared a house for Soult; and, in order of that general's approach with the army intended for their destruction, he had ordered the whole town to be illuminated.

CHAPTER IX.

Naval Affairs.—Gallant Resistance of Lieutenant Williams.—Unsuccessful Attempt to destroy the Convoy at Palamos.—Gallant Engagement at Lissa.—Various Captures.—Conquest of the Island of Ternate.—Sufferings and Exertions of the Brevedagerin.—Action between his Majesty's Ship Little Belt and the American Frigate President.—Gallant Repulse of a French Privateer.—Actions off Boulogne.

THE British navy still retained its usual sovereignty, notwithstanding continual depredations were committed by the enemy's privateers, particularly in the channel. The risk at the channel was at length considered so great, that it was with the utmost difficulties any insurances could be effected, as the merchants and others concerned in shipping could not afford to give premiums adequate to indemnify the underwriters.

Several gallant exploits were, however, performed at this period, by the British navy, the most important of which shall be particularized in the present chapter.

The following is a copy of a letter from Lieutenant Williams, of his majesty's cutter Entrepreneur.

"On the 12th of December, at eight in the morning, I observed four vessels at anchor under the Castle of Paro, between Malaga and Almeria Bay. It being a dead calm, at nine they got under weigh, sweeping towards us, and at half-past ten they hoisted French colours, and commenced firing on us. Our guns could not reach them till 11 a. m. when we began our fire; one vessel on our starboard-bow, the other on the starboard-quarter, and two right astern; the enemy keeping up a tremendous fire of round and grape-shot, which we returned with double vigour, with round and grape-shot, and musketry. About twelve o'clock the enemy shot away our main-topmast, peak, balyards, and block; fore-geers, fore-halyards, and jib-tye; and two of our star-board guns disabled, by the stock of one and the carriage of the other being broken. The enemy seeing us in this disabled state, attempted to board us, but with the courage that every true Englishman is possessed with, we repulsed them; we now kept up a well-directed fire with the two foremost guns and musketry. The enemy made a second attempt, but with the usual courage was again repulsed. By this time one man was killed and four wounded. I then ordered the starboard-sweeps to be manned, and pulled the cutter's head round, it still being calm, and a swell from the S. W. We got our larboard guns to bear on them, and with two well-directed broadsides, and three cheers, three of them sheered off. I was now informed our canister and musket-ball was all expended; but, nevertheless, with two well-directed broadsides, double shot, we carried away the largest of the two's fore-mast and bowsprit. At this moment they attempted to board a third time, but they were again repulsed, and that with great loss on their side; but by this exertion two of our larboard guns were dismounted. The enemy's fire began to slacken; we then gave three cheers, and with two of our guns double-shotted, raked them, which must have made great slaughter; and at half-past two the enemy was taken in tow by two row-boats, who towed them in-shore; we still firing on them with our two guns until three o'clock, when they were out of our reach; we then manned our sweeps, and towed the cutter's head towards the offing, and began to clear the wreck, and by five o'clock we had our main-sail, jib, and fore-sail set, but they were more like riddles than sails, after four hours hard-fought action. The enemy's force, which I learnt from a Danish vessel which had been laying alongside them in Almeria Bay, consisted of one with three latten sails, two long eighteen-pounders, six guns, and seventy-five men; another, three latten sails and jib, five guns, and forty-five men; two others, two sails, two guns, and twenty-five men each. I was short of my complement four men, and had the master's mate and six men away in a detained vessel, leaving the total number on-board thirty-three, out of which we had only one killed, and ten wounded."

Much valour, though not attended with adequate success, was displayed in an attempt to destroy the convoy at Palamos. The following was the letter on this subject, from Captain Rogers, of his majesty's ship the Kent:

"The Cambrian hove in sight, which immediately determined me to attempt the destruction of the convoy at Palamos. I had great reliance in Captain Fane's knowledge of the place;

and as the reinforcement the French had received in Catalonia gave me no hope of assistance from General O'Donnell, who had full occupation for his troops, I felt that I should be deficient in my duty if I did not employ the means in my power with energy, to effect the important service of depriving Barcelona and the French army of the supplies which this convoy would convey to them. I gave it, Sir, every consideration, with the anxiety natural to responsibility, and the more I reflected the more my mind was fortified with hopes of success. I therefore formed my plan, and Captain Fane did me the favor to volunteer the command of 350 seamen, 250 marines, and two field-pieces, selected from the ships under my orders, and well-appointed for this desirable service. The enemy's vessels lay in the mole, and consisted of a very fine new national ketch, mounting fourteen guns, with sixty men, two xebecs of three guns each, and thirty men, and there were eight merchant vessels under their convoy, all laden with provisions for Barcelona; they were protected by two 24-pounders, one in a battery which stood high over the mole, and the other with a 13-inch mortar in a battery, on a very commanding height; there were also, from the information I received, about 250 soldiers in the town. From light winds it was near one o'clock in the afternoon of the 13th, before the ships could get far enough into the bay to put the men ashore, and they were soon after landed on the beach, in the finest order, under cover of the Sparrow-hawk and Minstrel sloops, without harm, the enemy having posted themselves in the town, supposing we should be injudicious enough to go into the mole without dislodging them; soon after, our men moved forward to take the town and batteries in the rear; the enemy withdrew to a windmill on the hill, where they remained almost quiet spectators of our people taking possession of the batteries and the vessels in the mole; the mortar was spiked, and the cannon thrown down the heights into the sea; the magazine blown up: the whole of the vessels burnt and totally destroyed, save two, which were brought out; in short, the object had succeeded to admiration, and at this time with the loss of no more than four or five men from occasional skirmishing: but I am sorry to relate, that in withdrawing our post from a hill, which we occupied to keep the enemy in check until the batteries and vessels were destroyed, I fear that our people retired with some disorder, which encouraged the enemy, who had received a reinforcement from St. Felice, to advance upon them, and, by some unhappy fatality, instead of directing their retreat to the beach where the Cambrian, Sparrow-hawk, and Minstrel lay, to cover their embarkation, the brave but thoughtless and unfortunate men came through the town

down to the mole; the enemy immediately occupied the walls and houses, from which they kept up a severe fire upon the boats crowded with men, and dastardly fired upon and killed several who had been left on the mole, and were endeavoring to swim to the boats. Nothing could exceed the good conduct of Captain Pringle, of the Sparrow-hawk, Captain Campbell, of the Minstrel, and Lieutenant Conolly, first of the Cambrian, (who commanded that ship in the absence of Captain Fane,) both in the landing and withdrawing the men, and the officers in the launches with carronades, and the two mortar-boats of the Cambrian; indeed the officers and men of all the boats distinguished themselves beyond all praise in going to the mole to bring off the men who had been left behind. In performing this arduous service they suffered much, but I had the satisfaction to perceive the fire of their carronades and mortars upon the enemy was very destructive. I feel a delicacy in noticing the exertions and gallantry of an individual where most appear to have an equal claim, but it is due to Mr. George Godfrey, my first lieutenant, whose exertions both on shore and in the boats bringing off the men were conspicuous. Unfortunately, Captain Fane, as I am informed, was at the mole, giving directions to destroy the vessels, when our men were withdrawn from the post on the hill; he remained there with firmness to the last, and is among the missing, but I have received a satisfactory account that he is well. I feel, Sir, with unfeigned grief, that our loss has been severe, but had it not been for the indiscretion of the people straggling from their post and coming into the town, contrary to my caution, the enemy would not have dared to approach them, and the loss would have been very inconsiderable, compared with the importance of the service performed. The French had entered Catalonia with an army of 10,000 men, with little means of subsistence, and as I was ordered to this coast for the express purpose of depriving the enemy of their expected supplies, I considered that some energy and enterprise were necessary to accomplish it; the force I employed was fully adequate to this service, and I confided the execution of it to an officer of reputation; I therefore cannot reproach myself, as my conduct would have been censured if I had not undertaken it, although I must ever deeply regret the severe loss.

The capture of eleven of the enemy's vessels was thus detailed by Captain Whitby:—

His Majesty's Ship Cerberus, Feb. 13.

"Having completed the water of his majesty's ships under my command at Lissa, on the 9th inst. I proceeded to reconnoitre the coast of Italy with this ship and Active, in hopes of intercepting vessels which were reported to have sailed from Ancona for Corfu, and taken shelter in various harbours along the coast during the southerly winds just set in.

"On the morning of the 12th instant we discovered several vessels lying under the town of Ortano, and as the wind was light, the boats of both ships were dispatched, under the orders of Lieutenant Dickinson (first of the Cerberus) to bring them out if practicable. On the near approach of the boats to the vessels a fire of great guns and small arms was instantly opened from an armed trabaccolo (which was not till then observed), and soldiers posted on the beach and hills commanding the bay; our boats formed in close order, gave three hearty cheers, and in a few minutes cleared all before them, the men from the vessels and the troops on shore running in all directions.

"To prevent any annoyance whilst the prizes were bringing out, Lieutenant Dickinson landed with the marines under Lieutenant Mears, of that corps, embarked in the Active, and a division of small-arm men under Mr. James Rennie, master's mate of this ship, taking a strong position on the hills, and planting the British flag at the very gates of the town, whilst the launches, under Lieutenants Haye and Campston, with the barge of the Active, under Mr. James Gibson, master's mate of that ship, were employed in covering them with the carronades. This judicious and advantageous movement was of the greatest service to those employed at the sea-side, as it kept the soldiers and inhabitants who had collected in great force in check, and allowed the work which had been so ably undertaken to be most fully completed; as, in addition to the convoy, consisting of ten sail (under the vessel armed with six guns), which was found in the harbour laden with grain, oil, &c. two large magazines, filled with all sorts of naval and military stores, destined for the garrison of Corfu, (and which it is said they stand in much need of,) was most completely destroyed by fire; and I feel convinced the enemy will suffer most severely by this capture, as they must have been some time in making so large a collection. As I believe you are unacquainted with the situation of Ortano, I must beg leave to state it, and you will then be able to form your own opinion of the difficulties that existed, and to which our men and boats were necessarily exposed.

"The harbour is formed by a large pier running out into the sea, and connected with a range of hills leading to the town, which stands on the top of the highest, completely commanding the vessels in the bay and the road up to it, so that the marines, to gain the strong post they had, and to prevent being exposed to the severe fire of musketry, were obliged to climb up the rocks by their hands, with a prospect of falling down a precipice every step they took.

"Having detailed to you, Sir, the particulars of this service, I have much pleasure in adding that our loss has been only four wounded; and when it is considered that they were exposed to a teasing fire from the bushes and houses, from ten in the morning until three in the afternoon, it will, I trust, be thought trifling in comparison with the annoyance the enemy have received by the capture and destruction of their magazines and vessels.

"I cannot speak too highly of the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Dickinson on this occasion; the style in which he boarded the trabaccolo, armed with six guns and full of men, with the gig of this ship, supported by the barge under Mr. Rennie, (of whom he speaks in the highest terms of praise,) forms only a small part of his merit; his arrangements being so well made and so promptly executed by those under him, were such as to have ensured the most complete success, could it have been possible for the enemy to have collected any additional regular force with that already opposed to them.

"No language I can make use of is strong enough to express the zeal and conduct of every person concerned.

"I feel particularly indebted to Captain Gordon for the judicious manner his ship was placed, by which means he prevented any body of the enemy from forming in the rear of our men, and the promptitude and zealous co-operation I have constantly experienced from him since we have been serving together.

"Enclosed is a list of the vessels captured and destroyed.—I have the honor to be, &c.

"To George Eyre, esq. captain of his majesty's ship Magnificent, senior officer," &c.

Here followed a list of eleven vessels captured.

The French frigates (Emily, forty guns, Adrian, forty, and Dromedaire, twenty,) which had escaped from Toulon, were pursued by Captain Otway, of the Ajax, who succeeded in cutting off the Dromedaire, a very fine frigate ship of 800 tons. The other two frigates narrowly escaped from Captain Chamberlayne.

The French national brig, La Cannoniere, of ten 4-pounders, one 24-pound carronade, and four swivels, with a complement of seventy-seven men, was chased by Captain Atchison, of his Majesty's brig Scilla, who got possession of a sloop, one of her convoy.

The conquest of the Island of Ternate was effected by the Dover, Captain Tucker, having on board a detachment of troops from Amboyna, under Captain Forbes. The reduction of this island was boldly accomplished July 28.

The French frigate, Entreprenante, of thirty-two guns, after a gallant action, struck to the British sloop of war Atalanta, Captain Hickey. The Atalanta had one killed and four wounded; the Entreprenante had thirty killed and wounded.

The capture of the five French privateers, and the destruction of a sixth, at Sidonia, deserves particular notice. Sidonia is about twenty miles from Cadiz, and well situated both for affording protection to this species of naval warfare, and facilitating the capture of any merchant-vessels going into Cadiz; in which service these privateers had been too successful. Their capture had also long been an object of desire, from a suspicion that their crews were principally deserters from the British ships lying in Cadiz Bay, Americans, and others. They were small cutter-rigged vessels, with sweeps; and when they undertook any considerable enterprise, seventy French dragoons (in garrison at Sidonia) were embarked on-board them. Captain Price, of the Sabine, provoked by their daring intrusions, anchored his ships as close as possible into the roadstead, and, in the night, dispatched the boats manned with volunteers to attack them, under the command of Lieutenant Usherwood, assisted by Lieutenant Finnucane and Mr. Settle, master. They succeeded most admirably: each boat took a privateer. The prisoners taken had been marched from Antwerp.

Captain Brisbane, of his majesty's ship Belle Poule, being off the coast of Istria, with his majesty's ship Alceste in company, at ten a. m. discovered and chased a large French brig of war of eighteen guns, which shortly afterwards hauled into the small harbour of Posenza. Having received intelligence that such a vessel might be expected conveying supplies of all descriptions for the French frigates at Ragusa, which had escaped from the recent gallant action off Lissa, the captain left no means untried to capture or destroy her. After reconnoitering her position, and consulting the pilots and a most intelligent officer on-board, Mr. Thomas Boardman, acting-lieutenant of the Acorn, who, from his general local knowledge of the Adriatic, had handsomely volunteered his services for the cruise, Captain Brisbane found it impracticable for the frigates to enter the harbour, there being only fifteen feet water in it, but that the brig might nevertheless be cannonaded with effect where she was then lying. Accordingly, at three p. m. both ships stood in, within a cable's length of the rocks at the entrance of the harbour, and opened an animated fire on her, and a battery under which she lay, and in an hour obliged her to haul ashore under the town out of reach of the shot. The ships were frequently hulled by the battery, but sustained no other damage but what could be
